PREFACE

THE present collection is intended to serve as a supplement to a general course in the history of English literature, from its beginnings to the end of the Victorian era. With our modern methods of teaching, which insist upon some knowledge of the works of the authors, in addition to the study of literary history and biography, collections of this kind have become almost indispensable. In the rapid survey of the whole extent of English literary history, which is often undertaken before any careful and minute study of an especial author, or period, or literary form, is begun, the student is apt to find himself confused and discouraged by references to authors whose names mean nothing to him, and to works with whose very titles he is unfamiliar. Many of the books referred to are expensive, or, for some other reason, not readily accessible;<sup>1</sup> some of these are only obtainable in an English which repels him by its strangeness, or which he finds wholly unintelligible. In any case, to master all of the works mentioned in such a general course would be the labor not of a college year, but of a life time. Even if it were possible, such omnivorous reading would be far from desirable in this early stage of literary study. One whose immediate purpose is to fix clearly in his mind the topography of a whole continent, who seeks to see distinctly the general trend of its coast-line, the general disposition of its great mountain ranges, its rivers, and its plains, will do well to disregard for the time the windings of some obscure and tributary stream. The familiar words of Bacon have lost none of their force by frequent repetition: "Some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention." A few pages are enough to give one a very fair notion of the general character of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, and a chapter or two of Bede's Ecclesiastical History will at least help to make that book something more than a disembodied title, and clothe it with the form and substance of reality. That such a method of approach is, and should be, a mere preliminary to fuller studies, is obvious enough: that it is a wise, almost a necessary, preliminary, few sensible persons will, I think, be disposed to deny.

To represent a vast, varied, and ancient literature like the English,—a literature practically limitless,—in a book of reasonable compass, and in a manner at all adequate to the student's needs, is no easy task. The present collection is the result of more than twenty years of effort and experiment. As long ago as 1892, I published a volume containing a number of representative English masterpieces in prose and verse, with a setting of historical and biographical comment. This was followed by a collection of Standard English Poems, from Spenser to Tennyson; a companion book of Standard English Prose, from Bacon to Stevenson; and a collection of Early English Poems, translated or modernized in collaboration with Dr. J. Duncan Spaeth, of Princeton University. The three books last named have been used freely in the making of the present collection; but while many of the old selections have been retained, I have taken advantage of this opportunity for revision and rearrangement, so that the present book is not a mere consolidation of its predecessors into one volume, but virtually a new collection. In the interests of proportion, some of the poetical selections in the Old and Middle English periods have been omitted; illustrations of English prose before Bacon have been introduced; while many new selections, most of them from 18th and 19th century authors, have also been added. So much space has been saved by increasing the size of the page, and by greatly reducing the length of the notes, that the amount of text in the present volume is materially greater than that in its three predecessors combined.

In a book of this character, the needs of the teacher must be the first consideration. To be practically useful, such a supplementary collection as this must include at least a large proportion of the authors usually considered or incidentally referred to in the class-room; it must contain, at least, certain famous poems, with which every cultivated reader is familiar; and it must contain, at least, well-known passages from the monumental masterpieces of prose. To supply these needs, one must be content to follow in the well-beaten track, made smooth by innumerable anthologists; he must, of necessity, provide again those inevitable masterpieces which no well regulated anthology could possibly be without.

But, when this primary requirement has been met (as fully and faithfully as space and the personal limitations of the editor allow), there still remains a wide field for liberty of choice. The treasures of English literature are practically inexhaustible; we can say of it, as the English Chancellor said of the law, "the Lord forbid, that any man should know it all." When the paramount needs of teacher and student shall have been satisfied, an editor will do well, I think, in the interest of freshness and variety, to give some hint of the queer nooks and less-trodden paths that wait to be explored. We are sometimes prone to become a trifle narrow and conventional in our literary judgments, to regard not so much what we like as what we are expected to like, and to pay too exclusive a reverence to the "canonical books." We must remember, moreover, that a book like the present is, after all, intended to awaken and foster a love of literature in readers whose taste is at best immature. While such a book ought certainly to give the inevitable and indispensable masterpieces, we should remember that for some the real quickener of the spirit may prove to be a comparatively obscure and little-regarded work, long relegated, perhaps, to the literary apocrypha. "The appreciation of Lycidas," said Mark Pattison, with a rare wisdom, "is the last reward of a consummated scholarship."

While I have not made any very daring innovations, I have, accordingly, not hesitated to follow my own judgment, and include some authors and selections, both ancient and modern, not usually found in a book of this kind. For instance, in the earlier literature, the thirteenth, early fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries (times fuller of vital literature than we are apt to realize), have been represented with comparative fullness; while in recent times, I have included such writers as John Richard Green, F. W. H. Myers, Leslie Stephen, and two living authors, Frederic Harrison and Austin Dobson, who, as I had resolved to exclude contemporary authors, were not strictly eligible. The choice of selections must be of necessity a compromise between the often conflicting claims of many requirements; but, so far as I could do so in justice to other needs, I have tried to make a book that would be not merely "educational,"—in our restricted sense,—but one that could be read with interest and pleasure.

On the other hand, especial care has been taken to make the book practically helpful and suggestive on the historical side. Besides the chronological arrangement, the division into literary periods, the insertion of biographical dates, and such obvious aids to the student, wherever it was practicable the selections have been so chosen, that the authors speak for themselves, and reveal their own characters, or the plan and purpose of their works. Thus, Bede, Alfred, Layamon, Geoffrey of Monmouth, Caxton, Burton, and many others, tell us directly about their lives, their characters, or the making of their books. We learn of Spenser's hot anger at the intrigues and procrastinations of the Court, from his own lips; we listen to Greene's tragic self-reproaches; while Milton's unconquerable nobility of spirit under the chastisement of blindness and disappointment, and Scott's no less splendid fortitude, lie open to us, with no medium of critic or commentator between their souls and ours. To study literary history in such a fashion is to drink from the fountain-head.

Care has also been taken to introduce selections illustrative of literary history, and, so far as possible, to make one selection explain or supplement another. For instance, we can follow up our reading of Cædmon's Hymn and Bede's Death Song, with Bede's story of Cædmon, and with Cuthbert's Letter on the Death of Bede; we can study Dr. Johnson in his prose and poetry, we can see him through the eyes of Boswell "in his habit as he lived," or again, we can look back and, with Macaulay and Carlyle, regard both Johnson and Boswell in that perspective which time only can supply. Many of the biographical and critical selections can be made in this way to serve a double purpose, for when one great author writes of another, he tells us something not only of his subject but of himself. Or again, we can see how the same experience, or the same problem, has impressed different minds. As we read the account of the fire of London in Evelyn or in Pepys, we see something more than confusion, terror, and burning houses,—we see with an equal distinctness the contrasted natures of the two men. Or if we would understand the widely different impressions made upon thoughtful men by the material progress and scientific spirit of the last century, we can gain some notion of it by contrasting the utterances of Macaulay and Newman, of Huxley and of Ruskin and Carlyle. Hence, while a general adherence to chronology in the arrangement of the selections was manifestly advisable, the order in which the selections are read may be modified by the teacher at his discretion, for many selections may be found to belong together in spirit and to be separated only by the accident of time.

As the book is intended primarily for students who are approaching the subject from the purely literary side, all the selections from the Old and Middle English periods (with the single exception of Chaucer) have been translated or modernized. For a few of the renderings I have gone to Tennyson, Henry Morley, or others; some of them have been made by Dr. Percy V. D. Shelly for the present book; but by far the greater number are versions, made by Dr. J. Duncan Spaeth or by myself, which have already appeared in the Early English Poems. In any case, the object has been to furnish the student with a version which, while it gives the meaning of the original, preserves something, at least, of its illusive spirit and its poetic form. Every one agrees, that to be good a translation must be accurate; but many confuse the deeper faithfulness to one's original, with a merely servile and literal accuracy, forgetting that, especially in translating poetry, there is an obligation to be faithful to the spirit as well as to the letter, and that the letter without the spirit is dead.

Translation or modernization was necessary if the earlier literature were to be made generally accessible, but the original texts have been changed as little as was consistent with this object, and in many cases obsolete words or quaint and unusual expressions have been retained and explained. In order that the student may have some idea of the nature and extent of these changes, and have some concrete reminder of the slow growth of the language, short passages from the earlier authors are given in the appendix in their original form.

To give the reader ready access to the author, it was not enough to clear away the barriers of an unfamiliar language, there were also obscure allusions, involved or ambiguous expressions, or other difficulties, which it was necessary to explain. In such cases the necessary explanation has been given at the foot of the page. I have tried to make these notes as few in number, as brief and as unobtrusive as I possibly could. Except in a few cases, I have confined myself to a short explanation of some real difficulty in the text. Biographical and critical matter has been introduced very sparingly, and I have often refrained from giving the source of a quotation, believing that the formal reference to an ancient and little-read book was of no real help to the student. The traditional commentator is not unlike the traditional policeman, always on hand except when he is really needed, and the middle path between the too-little and the too-much is a hard one to hit or to follow.

The practice of giving complete works, rather than fragments or "extracts," has been followed in this book, as in its predecessors, wherever circumstances allowed. But to hold rigidly to this practice in all cases (and especially where one is dealing with prose) would entail too great a sacrifice. Most of the selections are, however, either literally or essentially complete; while in cases where this was impracticable, I have tried to make the selection intelligible by explanatory notes, or by an abstract of the portion omitted. As the drama and fiction could not be adequately represented by extracts, and as it was obviously impossible to give an entire novel or play, it seemed best to leave these two important divisions of literature unrepresented. I have, however, given a few passages, not scenes,—from the Elizabethan dramatists, which can be read purely as poetry, and, for the convenience of the teacher, I have inserted a short specimen of a Miracle, and of a Moral play in the appendix.

One personal conviction it may, perhaps, be permissible for me to express here, for a preface is a spot which even an impersonal editor can call his own. The chief business of the teacher of English literature is to lead the student to read the right things in the right way. The student must be taught to interpret, possibly "to contradict and to confute," but he must, above all, be taught to enjoy. The range of his enjoyment must be widened; his taste must be made more catholic, excluding nothing that is really significant or really excellent of its kind; yet he must be taught to discriminate, and trained to prefer in all sincerity the good to the inferior, and even above the good, to set the best. To this supreme object, all others, however curious or praiseworthy, must, after all, be made subordinate and contributory. The historical development of the literature, the lives, the characters, the personal peculiarities of authors, the "chatter about Harriet," the study of philology, the study of dates, or "sources," the problems of text and authorship, all such things, fascinating and important as they undeniably are, must be regarded as means to an end, for, as Tennyson said of Knowledge,—they are “the second not the first.”

This business of teaching people to read is really a matter of incalculable, of national, importance to us in America. I doubt whether there was ever a country on the face of the earth which contained such multitudes of people who knew how to read, and so few true readers; a country which contained so few who were illiterate, and so many who were uneducated. With all this we have quite unparalleled opportunities for the reader. We teach him the mechanical process of reading, and we establish innumerable agencies to provide him with reading matter at a small cost, or at no cost at all. We have a great host of writers, who produce books without number, yet we make but a trifling contribution to the permanent literature of the world. I suspect that the true reader is almost as rare as the great writer, and I suspect that to teach a child to read without teaching him to prefer a good book to a bad one, is very like giving a boy a loaded gun without showing him how to use it. Such a situation, and I do not think it is over-stated, imposes a heavy but an honorable responsibility upon the teacher of English. It is his task, subordinating all merely curious researches and vain disputations, to teach as many as he can among this multitude of un-read readers, to know and to delight in the best literature. “We need to be reminded every day,” says Frederic Harrison, “how many are the books of inimitable glory, which, with all our eagerness after reading, we have never taken in our hands.” Many works of this enduring and “inimitable glory” have been brought together here, gathered from the noblest utterances of more than a thousand years. If a book of this kind helps the teacher to bring these glories nearer to the minds and lives of his students, if it helps any reader in school or out, to come into closer and more human relations with great literature, it has its place and part (small as it may be) in an immeasurably important work.

My indebtedness to others is too great to be specifically acknowledged. I cannot, however, omit a word of especial gratitude to my friend Dr. Percy V. D. Shelly, of the University of Pennsylvania, who, besides contributing several translations from Old English and Latin, has worked with me faithfully in the preparation of this book.

ENGLISH PROSE AND VERSE

I. FROM THE BEGINNING TO THE NORMAN CONQUEST

A CHARM<sup>1</sup> FOR BEWITCHED LAND

(From the translation by J. D. SPAETH)

Erce,<sup>2</sup> Erce, Erce, Mother of Earth, 49
 May the Almighty, Lord Everlasting,
 Grant thee fields, green and fertile,
 Grant thee fields, fruitful and growing,
 Hosts of Spear-shafts, shining harvests,
 Harvest of Barley the broad,
 Harvest of Wheat the white, 55
 All the heaping harvests of earth!
 May the Almighty Lord Everlasting,
 And his holy saints in heaven above,
 From fiend and foe defend this land,
 Keep it from blight and coming of harm, 60
 From spell of witches wickedly spread!
 Now I pray the Almighty who made this world,
 That malice of man, or mouth of woman
 Never may weaken the words I have spoken.
 Hail to thee Earth, Mother of men! 67
 Grow and be great in God's embrace,
 Filled with fruit for the food of men!

CHARM FOR A SUDDEN STITCH<sup>1</sup>

(Translated by J. D. SPAETH)

Take feverfew, and plantain, and the red nettle that grows, into the house. Boil in butter. Say:—

Loud was their cry as they came o'er the hill;
 Fierce was their rage as they rode o'er the land.
 Take heed and be healed of the hurt they have done thee.

Out little spear if in there thou be! 4

My shield I lifted, my linden-wood shining,
 When the mighty women mustered their force,

And sent their spear-points spinning toward me.

I'll give them back the bolt they sent,
 A flying arrow full in the face.

Out little spear if in there thou be! 10

Sat a smith,
 A hard blade hammered.

Out little spear if in there thou be!
 Six smiths sat,

Fighting spears forged they. 15

Out spear, out!

No longer stay in!

If any iron be found herein,

The work of witches, away it must melt.

<sup>3</sup> Stitch, or rheumatism, was supposed to be caused by little spears or darts, shot by a god, elf, or hag.

Be thou shot in the fell,<sup>2</sup> 20

Be thou shot in the flesh,

Be thou shot in the blood,

Be thou shot in the bone,

Be thou shot in the limb,

Thy life shall be shielded. 25

Be it shot of Esé,<sup>3</sup>

Be it shot of Elves,

Be it shot of Hags,

I help thee surely.

This for cure of Esa<sup>4</sup>-shot, 30

This for cure of Elf-shot,

This for cure of Hag-shot,

I help thee surely.

Witch fly away to the woods and the mountains. 34

Healed be thy hurt! So help thee the Lord.

BEOWULF

THE FIGHT WITH GRENDEL'S MOTHER

(Translated by J. D. SPAETH)

[The Hero Beowulf grew up at the Court of his uncle Hygélac, King of the Geats or Jutes. Hearing how Heorot, the great Hall of the Danish King Hrothgar, was ravaged by a night-prowling monster named Grendel, Beowulf sailed with a chosen band to Hrothgar's kingdom, and offered to rid the Danes of their enemy. Alone and weaponless he fought with and killed Grendel in Heorot, and it was supposed that the Hall was again safe. But Grendel's mother, a wolfish water-wife, bent on revenge, broke into the Hall and carried off the King's best Thane. The next morning Beowulf, who had slept elsewhere, heard what had happened, and asked if he might undertake a second and more perilous adventure. Before going, the King describes to him the haunts of the monster.]

"I have heard my people, the peasant folk 1345

Who house by the border and hold the fens,

Say they have seen two creatures strange,

Huge march-stalkers,<sup>1</sup> haunting the moorland,

Wanderers outcast. One of the two

Seemed to their sight to resemble a woman; 1350

The other manlike, a monster misshapen,

But huger in bulk than human kind,

Trod an exile's track of woe.

The folk of the fen in former days

Named him Grendel. Unknown his father, 1355

Or what his descent from demons obscure.

Lonely and waste is the land they inhabit,

Wolf-cliffs wild and windy headlands,

Ledges of mist, where mountain torrents

Downward plunge to dark abysses, 1360

And flow unseen. Not far from here

<sup>4</sup> Creatures that stalk along the Marches, or Borders.

O'er the moorland in miles, a mere expands:
 Spray-frosted trees o'erspread it, and hang O'er the water with roots fast wedged in the rocks.

There nightly is seen, beneath the flood, 1365
 A marvellous light. There lives not the man
 Has fathomed the depth of the dismal mere.
 Though the heather-stepper, the strong-horned stag,

Seek this cover, forspent with the chase,
 Tracked by the hounds, he will turn at bay, 1370
 To die on the brink ere he brave the plunge,
 Hide his head in the haunted pool.

Wan from its depths the waves are dashed,
 When wicked storms are stirred by the wind,
 And from sullen skies descends the rain. 1375
 In thee is our hope of help once more.

Not yet thou hast learned where leads the way
 To the lurking-hole of this hatcher of outrage.
 Seek, if thou dare, the dreaded spot!
 Richly I pay thee for risking this fight, 1380
 With heirlooms golden and ancient rings,
 As I paid thee before, if thou come back alive."

Beowulf spoke, the son of Ecgtheow:
 "Sorrow not gray-beard, nor grieve o'er thy friend!

Vengeance is better than bootless mourning.
 To each of us here the end must come 1386
 Of life upon earth: let him who may Win glory ere death. I deem that best,
 The lot of the brave, when life is over.

Rise, O realm-ward, ride we in haste, 1390
 To track the hag that whelped this Grendel.

I tell thee in truth, she may turn where she will,
 No cave of ocean nor cover of wood,
 No hole in the ground shall hide her from me.
 But one day more thy woe endure, 1395

And nurse thy hope as I know thou wilt."
 Sprang to his feet the sage old king,
 Gave praise to God for the promise spoken.

And now for Hrothgar a horse was bridled,
 A curly-maned steed. The king rode on, 1400
 Bold on his charger. A band of shield-men Followed on foot. Afar they saw Footprints leading along the forest.

They followed the tracks, and found she had crossed

Over the dark moor, dragging the body 1405
 Of the goodliest thane that guarded with Hrothgar

Heorot Hall, and the home of the king.
 The well-born hero held the trail;

Up rugged paths, o'er perilous ridges,
 Through passes narrow, an unknown way. 1410
 By beetling crags, and caves of the nicors.<sup>2</sup>

He went before with a chosen few,
 Warriors skilled, to scan the way.

Sudden they came on a cluster of trees
 Overhanging a hoary rock, 1415

A gloomy grove; and gurgling below,
 A stir of waters all stained with blood.

Sick at heart were the Scylding chiefs,
 Many a thane was thrilled with woe,
 For there they beheld the head of Æscherë 1420
 Far beneath at the foot of the cliff.

They leaned and watched the waters boil
 With bloody froth. The band sat down,
 While the war-horn sang its summons to battle.
 They saw in the water sea-snaikes a many, 1425
 Wave-monsters weird, that wallowed about.

At the base of the cliff lay basking the nicors,
 Who oft at sunrise ply seaward their journey,
 To hunt on the ship-trails and scour the main,
 Sea-beasts and serpents. Sudden they fled, 1430
 Wrathful and grim, aroused by the hail

Of the battle-horn shrill. The chief of the Jutes,
 With a bolt from his bow a beast did sunder
 From life and sea-frolic; sent the keen shaft
 Straight to his vitals. Slow he floated, 1435
 Uprturned and dead at the top of the waves.

Eager they boarded their ocean-quarry;
 With barb-hooked boar-spears the beast they gaffed,

Savagely broached him and brought him to shore,
 Wave-plunger weird. The warriors viewed

The grisly stranger. But straightway Beowulf
 Donned his corslet nor cared for his life. . . 1442

To Hrothgar spoke the son of Ecgtheow: 1473
 "Remember O honored heir of Healfdenë,

Now that I go, thou noble king,
 Warriors' gold-friend, what we agreed on,
 If I my life should lose in thy cause,
 That thou wouldst stand in stead of my father,
 Fulfil his office when I was gone.

Be guardian thou, to my thanes and kinsmen,
 My faithful friends, if I fail to return. 1481

To Hygélac send, Hrothgar beloved,
 The goodly gifts thou gavest to me.
 May the Lord of the Jutes, when he looks on this treasure,

May Hrethel's son, when he sees these gifts,
 Know that I found a noble giver, 1486
 And joyed while I lived, in a generous lord.

This ancient heirloom to Unferth give,
 To the far-famed warrior, my wondrous sword
 Of matchless metal, I must with Hrunting<sup>3</sup> 1490
 Glory gain, or go to my death."

After these words the Weder-Jute lord
 Sprang to his task, nor staid for an answer.
 Swiftly he sank 'neath the swirling flood;
 'Twas an hour's time ere he touched the bottom. 1495

Soon the sea-hag, savage and wild,
 Who had roamed through her watery realms at will,

For winters a hundred, was 'ware from below
 An earthling had entered her ocean domain.

Quickly she reached and caught the hero; 1500
 Grappled him grimly with gruesome claws.

Yet he got no scratch, his skin was whole;
 His battle-sark shielded his body from harm.

In vain she tried, with her crooked fingers,
 To tear the links of his close-locked mail. 1505

Away to her den the wolf-slut dragged Beowulf the bold, o'er the bottom ooze.
 Though eager to smite her, his arm was helpless.

Swimming monsters swarmed about him,
 Dented his mail with dreadful tusks. 1510
 Sudden the warrior was 'ware they had come
 To a sea-hall strange and seeming hostile,
 Where water was not nor waves oppressed,
 For the caverned rock all round kept back
 The swallowing sea. He saw a light, 1515
 A flicker of flame that flashed and shone.
 Now first he discerned the sea-hag monstrous,
 The water-wife wolfish. His weapon he raised,
 And struck with his sword a swinging blow.
 Sang on her head the hard-forged blade 1520
 Its war-song wild. But the warrior found
 That his battle-flasher refused to bite,
 Or maim the foe. It failed its master
 In the hour of need, though oft it had cloven
 Helmets, and carved the casques of the doomed
 In combats fierce. For the first time now 1526
 His treasure failed him, fallen from honor.
 But Hygelac's earl took heart of courage;
 In mood defiant he fronted his foe.
 The angry hero hurled to the ground, 1530
 In high disdain, the hilt of the sword,
 The gaudy and jewelled; rejoiced in the strength
 Of his arm unaided. So all should do
 Who glory would find and fame abiding,
 In the crash of conflict, nor care for their lives.
 The Lord of the Battle-Jutes braved the encounter; 1536
 • The murderous hag by the hair he caught;
 Down he dragged the dam of Grendel
 In his swelling rage, till she sprawled on the floor.
 Quick to repay in kind what she got, 1540
 On her foe she fastened her fearful clutches;
 Enfolded the warrior weary with fighting;
 The sure-footed hero stumbled and fell.
 On his prostrate body she squatted enormous;
 Unsheathed her hip-knife, shining and broad,
 Her son to avenge, her offspring sole. 1546
 But the close-linked corslet covered his breast,
 Foiled the stroke and saved his life.
 All had been over with Ecgtheow's son,
 Under the depths of the Ocean vast, 1550
 Had not his harness availed to help him,
 His battle-net stiff, and the strength of God.
 The Ruler of battles aright decided it;
 The Wielder all-wise awarded the victory:
 Lightly the hero leaped to his feet. 1555
 He spied 'mongst the arms a sword surpassing,
 Huge and ancient, a hard-forged slayer,
 Weapon matchless and warriors' delight,
 Save that its weight was more than another
 Might bear into battle or brandish in war; 1560
 Giants had forged that finest of blades.
 Then seized its chain-hilt the chief of the Scyldings;
 His wrath was aroused, reckless his mood,
 As he brandished the sword for a savage blow.
 Bit the blade in the back of her neck, 1565
 Cut the neck-bone, and cleft its way Clean through her body; she sank to the ground;
 The sword was gory; glad was the hero.
 A light flashed out from the inmost den,
 Like heaven's candle, when clear it shines 1570

From cloudless skies. He scanned the cave,
 Walked by the wall, his weapon upraised;
 Grim in his hand the hilt he gripped.
 Well that sword had served him in battle.
 Steadily onward he strode through the cave,
 Ready to wreak the wrongs untold,
 That the man-beast had wrought in the realm of the Danes. . . . 1579
 He gave him his due when Grendel he found 1589
 Stretched as in sleep, and spent with the battle.
 But dead was the fiend, the fight at Heorot
 Had laid him low. The lifeless body
 Sprang from the blows of Beowulf's sword,
 As fiercely he hacked the head from the carcass.

But the men who were watching the water with
 Hrothgar 1595
 Suddenly saw a stir in the waves,
 The chop of the sea all churned up with blood
 And bubbling gore. The gray-haired chiefs
 For Beowulf grieved, agreeing together
 That hope there was none of his home-returning
 With victory crowned, to revisit his lord. 1601
 Most of them feared he had fallen prey
 To the mere-wolf dread in the depths of the sea.
 When evening came, the Scyldings all 1604
 Forsook the headland, and Hrothgar himself
 Turned homeward his steps. But sick at heart
 The strangers sat and stared at the sea,
 Hoped against hope to behold their comrade
 And leader again.

Now that goodly sword
 Began to melt with the gore of the monster; 1610
 In bloody drippings it dwindled away.
 'Twas a marvellous sight: it melted like ice,
 When fetters of frost the Father unlocks,
 Unravels the ropes of the wrinkled ice,
 Lord and Master of months and seasons. 1615
 Beheld in the hall the hero from Juteland Treasures unnumbered, but naught he took,
 Save Grendel's head, and the hilt of the sword,
 Bright and jeweled,—the blade had melted,
 Its metal had vanished, so venomous hot 1620
 Was the blood of the demon-brute dead in the cave.

Soon was in the sea the slayer of monsters;
 Upward he shot through the shimmer of waves;
 Cleared was the ocean, cleansed were its waters,
 The wolfish water-hag wallowed no more; 1625
 The mere-wife had yielded her miserable life.
 Swift to the shore the sailors' deliverer
 Came lustily swimming, with sea-spoil laden;
 Rejoiced in the burden he bore to the land.
 Ran to meet him his mailed comrades, 1630
 With thanks to God who gave them their leader
 Safe again back and sound from the deep.
 Quickly their hero's helmet they loosened, Unbuckled his breastplate. The blood-stained waves
 Fell to a calm 'neath the quiet sky. 1635 Back they returned o'er the tracks with the footprints,
 Merrily measured the miles o'er the fen,
 Way they knew well, those warriors brave;

Brought from the holm-cliff the head of the monster;

'Twas toil and labor to lift the burden,
Four of their stoutest scarce could carry it
Swung from a spear-pole, a staggering load. 1638
Thus the fourteen of them, thanes adventurous, 1641

Marched o'er the moor to the mead-hall of Hrothgar.

Tall in the midst of them towered the hero;
Strode among his comrades, till they came to the hall.

In went Beowulf, the brave and victorious, 1645
Battle-beast hardy, Hrothgar to greet.

Lifting by the hair the head of Grendel,
They laid it in the hall, where the heroes were carousing,

Right before the king, and right before the queen;

Gruesome was the sight that greeted the Danes.

BEOWULF'S LAST FIGHT AND DEATH

[Beowulf left with the Danes his grisly trophies of battle, the head of Grendel, his huge forequarter, and the hilt of the giant sword with its mystical runic inscription. Loading his boat with the gifts of Hrothgar, he and his comrades sailed away home. After the death of Hygelac and his son, Beowulf became king of the Jutes, and ruled over them fifty years. In his old age his people were harried by a fire-dragon whom the hero went out to fight. It seems that an outlaw, banished and flying for shelter, had come upon a treasure hid in a deep cave or barrow, guarded by a dragon. Long years before, an earl, the last of his race, had buried the treasure. After his death the dragon, sniffing about the stones, had found it and guarded it three hundred years, until the banished man discovered the place, and carried off one of the golden goblets. In revenge the dragon made nightly raids on Beowulf's realm, flying through the air, spitting fire, burning houses and villages, even Beowulf's hall, the "gift-stool" of the Jutes. Beowulf had an iron shield made against the dragon's fiery breath, and with eleven companions, sought out the hill-vault near the sea. Before attacking the monster he spoke these words to his comrades:]

Beowulf said to them, brave words spoke he:

"Brunt of battles I bore in my youth, 2512
One fight more I make this day.

I mean to win fame defending my people,
If the grim destroyer will seek me out, 2515

Come at my call from his cavern dark."
Then he greeted his thanes each one,

For the last time hailed his helmeted warriors,
His comrades dear. "I should carry no sword,

No weapon of war 'gainst the worm should bear,
If the foe I might slay by strength of my arm,
As Grendel I slew long since by my hand. 2522

But I look to fight a fiery battle,
With scorching puffs of poisonous breath.

For this I bear both breastplate and shield; 2525
No foot will I flinch from the foe of the barrow.

Wyrd is over us, each shall meet
His doom ordained at the dragon-cliff!

Bold is my mood, but my boast I omit
'Gainst the battle-fier. Abide ye here, 2530

Heroes in harness, hard by the barrow,
Cased in your armor the issue await:

Which of us two his wounds shall survive.
Not yours the attempt, the task is mine.

'Tis meant for no man but me alone 2535
To measure his might 'gainst the monster fierce.

I get you the gold in glorious fight,
Or battle-death bitter shall bear off your lord."

Uprose with his shield the shining hero,
Bold 'neath his helmet. He bore his harness

In under the cliff; alone he went, 2541
Himself he trusted; no task for faint-heart.

Then saw by the wall the warrior brave,
Hero of many a hard-fought battle,

Arches of stone that opened a way; 2545
From the rocky gate there gushed a stream,

Bubbling and boiling with battle-fire.
So great the heat no hope was there

To come at the hoard in the cavern's depth,
Unscathed by the blast of the scorching dragon.

He let from his breast his battle-cry leap, 2551
Sworn with rage was the royal Jute,

Stormed the stout-heart; strong and clear
Through the gloom of the cave his cry went ringing. 2555

Hate was aroused, the hoard-ward knew

The leader's hail. Too late 'twas now
To parley for peace. The poisonous breath

Of the monster shot from the mouth of the cave, Reeking hot. The hollow earth rumbled.

The man by the rock upraised his shield, 2560
The Lord of the Jutes, 'gainst the loathly dragon.

Now kindled for battle the curled-up beast;

The king undaunted with drawn sword stood,
( 'Twas an heirloom olden with edge of lightning)

Each was so fierce he affrighted the other. 2565
Towering tall 'neath tilted shield,

Waited the king as the worm coiled back,
Sudden to spring: so stood he and waited.

Blazing he came in coils of fire
Swift to his doom. The shield of iron 2570

Sheltered the hero too short a while,—
Life and limb it less protected

Than he hoped it would, for the weapon he held
First time that day he tried in battle;

Wyrd had not willed he should win the fight.
But the Lord of the Jutes uplifted his arm, 2576

Smote the scaly worm, struck him so fierce
That his ancient bright-edged blade gave way,

Bent on the bone, and bit less sure
Than its owner had need in his hour of peril. 2580

That sword-stroke roused the wrath of the cave-guard;

Fire and flame afar he spirted,
Blaze of battle; but Beowulf there

No victory boasted: his blade had failed him,
Naked in battle, as never it should have, 2585

Well-tempered iron! Nor easy it was
For Ecgtheow's heir, honored and famous,

This earth to forsake, forever to leave it;
Yet he must go, against his will
Elsewhere to dwell. So we all must leave 2590
This fleeting life.—Erelong the foes
Bursting with wrath the battle renewed.
The board-ward took heart, and with heaving breast

Came charging amain. The champion brave,
Strength of his people, was sore oppressed, 2595
Enfolded by flame. No faithful comrades
Crowded about him, his chosen band,
All æthelings' sons, to save their lives,
Fled to the wood. One of them only
Felt surging sorrow; for nought can stifle 2600
Call of kin in a comrade true;

Wiglaf his name, 'twas Weohstan's son
Shield-thane beloved, lord of the Scyflings Ælifer's kinsman. When his king he saw
Hard by the heat under helmet oppressed, 2605
He remembered the gifts he had got of old,
Lands and wealth of the Wægmunding line,
The folk-rights all that his father's had been;
He could hold no longer, but hard he gripped
Linden shield yellow and ancient sword. . . . 2610
For the first time there the faithful thane, 2652
Youthful and stalwart, stood with his leader,
Shoulder to shoulder in shock of battle.
Nor melted his courage, nor cracked his blade,
His war-sword true, as the worm found out 2655
When together they got in grim encounter.

Wiglaf in wrath upbraided his comrades,
Sore was his heart as he spake these words:
"Well I mind when our mead we drank 2660
In the princely hall, how we promised our lord
Who gave us these rings and golden armlets,
That we would repay his war-gifts rich,
Helmets and armor, if haply should come
His hour of peril; us hath he made 2665
Thanes of his choice for this adventure;
Spurred us to glory, and gave us these treasures
Because he deemed us doughty spearmen,
Helmeted warriors, hardy and brave.
Yet all the while, unhelped and alone, 2670
He meant to finish this feat of strength,
Shepherd of men and mightiest lord
Of daring deeds. The day is come,—
Now is the hour he needs the aid
Of spearmen good. Let us go to him now, 2675
Help our hero while hard bestead
By the nimble flames. God knows that I
Had rather the fire should ruthlessly fold
My body with his, than harbor me safe.
Shame it were surely our shields to carry 2680
Home to our lands, unless we first
Slay this foe and save the life
Of the Weder-king. Full well I know
To leave him thus, alone to endure,
Bereft of aid, breaks ancient right. 2685
My helmet and sword shall serve for us both,
Shield and armor we share to-day."

Waded the warrior through welter and reek;
Buckler and helmet he bore to his leader;
Heartened the hero with words of hope: 2690
"Do thy best now, dearest Beowulf,

Years ago, in youth, thou vowedst
Living, ne'er to lose thine honor,
Shield thy life and show thy valor.
I stand by thee to the end!" 2695
After these words the worm came on,
Snorting with rage, for a second charge;
All mottled with fire his foes he sought,
The warriors hated. But Wiglaf's shield
Was burnt to the boss by the billows of fire;
His harness helped not the hero young. 2701 Shelter he found 'neath the shield of his kinsman,

When the crackling blaze had crumbled his own:
But mindful of glory, the mighty hero
Smote amain with his matchless sword. 2705
Down it hurtled, driven by anger,
Till it stuck in the skull, then snapped the blade,
Broken was Nægling, Beowulf's sword, Ancient and gray. 'Twas granted him never
To count on edge of iron in battle; 2710
His hand was too heavy, too hard his strokes,
As I have heard tell, for every blade
He brandished in battle: the best gave way,
And left him helpless and hard bestead.
Now for a third time neared the destroyer; 2715
The fire-drake fierce, old feuds remembering,
Charged the warrior who wavered an instant;
Blazing he came and closed his fangs
On Beowulf's throat; and throbbing spirts
Of life-blood dark o'erdrrenched the hero. 2720

Then in the hour of utmost peril,
The stripling proved what stock he came of;
Showed his endurance and dauntless courage.
Though burnt was his hand when he backed his kinsman,
With head unguarded the good thane charged,
Thrust from below at the loathly dragon, 2726
Pierced with the point and plunged the blade in,
The gleaming-bright, till the glow abated
Waning low. Ere long the king
Came to himself, and swiftly drew 2730
The war-knife that hung at his harness' side,
And cut in two the coiled monster.
So felled they the foe and finished him bravely,
Together they killed him, the kinsmen two,
A noble pair. So needs must do 2735
Comrades in peril. For the king it proved
His uttermost triumph, the end of his deeds
And work in the world. The wound began,
Where the cave-dragon savage had sunk his teeth,

To swell and fever, and soon he felt 2740
The baleful poison pulse through his blood,
And burn in his breast. The brave old warrior
Sat by the wall and summoned his thoughts,
Gazed on the wondrous work of the giants:
Arches of stone, firm-set on their pillars, 2745
Upheld that hill-vault hoar and ancient.

Now Beowulf's thane, the brave and faithful,
Dashed with water his darling lord,
His comrade and king all covered with blood
And faint with the fight; unfastened his helmet.
Beowulf spoke despite his hurt, 2751
His piteous wound. Full well he knew

His years on earth were ended now,
 His hours of glad life gone for aye,
 His days allotted, and death was near: 2755
 "Now would I gladly give to a son
 These weapons of war, had Wyrd<sup>1</sup> but granted
 That heir of my own should after me come,
 Sprung from my loins. This land have I ruled
 Fifty winters. No folk-king dared, 2760
 None of the chiefs of the neighboring tribes,
 To touch me with sword or assail me with terror
 Of battle-threats. I bided at home,
 Held my peace and my heritage kept,
 Seeking no feuds nor swearing false oaths. 2765
 This gives me comfort, and gladdens me now,
 Though wounded sore and sick unto death.
 As I leave my life the Lord may not charge me
 With killing of kinsmen. Now quickly go,
 Wiglaf beloved, to look at the hoard, 2770
 Where hidden it rests 'neath the hoary rock.
 For the worm lies still, put asleep by his wound,
 Robbed of his riches. Then rise and haste!
 Give me to see that golden hoard,
 Gaze on the store of glorious gems, 2775
 That easier then I may end my life,
 Leave my lordship that long I held."

Swiftly, 'tis said, the son of Weohstan
 Obeyed the words of his bleeding lord, Maimed in the battle. Through the mouth of the cave 2780

Boldly he bore his battle-net in.
 Glad of the victory, he gazed about him;
 Many a sun-bright jewel he saw;
 Glittering gold, strewn on the ground,
 Heaped in the den of the dragon hoary, 2785
 Old twilight-flier,—flagons once bright,
 Wassail cups wondrous of warriors departed
 Stript of their mountings, many a helmet
 Ancient and rusted, armlets a many,
 Curiously woven. (Wealth so hoarded, 2790
 Buried treasure, will taint with pride, Him that hides it, whoever it be.)
 Towering high o'er the hoard he saw
 A gleaming banner with gold inwoven,
 Of broidure rare, its radiance streamed 2795
 So bright, he could peer to the bounds of the cave,
 Survey its wonders; no worm was seen.
 Edge of the sword had ended his life.
 Then, as they say, that single adventurer Plundered the hoard that was piled by the giants 2800
 Gathered together old goblets and platters,
 Took what he liked; the towering banner
 Brightest of beacons he brought likewise. . . . 2776
 So Wiglaf returned with treasure laden 2783
 The high-souled hero hastened his steps,
 Anxiously wondered if he should find 2785
 The lord of the Weders alive where he left him Sapped of his strength and stretched on the ground.

As he came from the hill he beheld his comrade,
 His lord of bounty, bleeding and faint,
 Near unto death. He dashed him once more
 Bravely with water, till burden of speech 2791
 Broke from his breast, and Beowulf spoke,

<sup>1</sup> The Goddess of Fate.

Gazing sad at the gold before him:
 "For the harvest of gold that here I look on,
 To the God of Glory I give my thanks. 2795
 To the Ruler Eternal I render praise
 That ere I must go he granted me this,
 To leave to my people this priceless hoard.
 'Twas bought with my life; now look ye well
 To my people's need when I have departed. 2800
 No more I may bide among ye here.
 Bid the battle-famed build on the foreland
 A far-seen barrow when flames have burnt me.
 High o'er the headland of whales it shall tower,
 A beacon and mark to remind my people. 2806
 And sailors shall call it in years to come
 Beowulf's Barrow as back from afar
 O'er the glooming deep they drive their keels."

The great-hearted king unclasped from his neck 2810

A collar of gold, and gave to his thane,
 The brave young warrior, his bright-gilt helmet,
 Breastplate and ring. So bade him farewell:
 "Thou art the last to be left of our house.
 Wyrd hath o'erwhelmed our Wægmunding line,
 Swept my kinsmen swift to their doom, 2816
 Earls in their prime. I must follow them."
 These words were the last that the warrior gray
 Found in his heart ere the flames he chose.
 Swift from his bosom his soul departed 2820
 To find the reward of the faithful and true.

CÆDMON'S HYMN

(c. 670)

(Translated by P. V. D. SHELLY)

Now shall we hymn high heaven's Ward,
 The might of the Maker, His mind's desire,
 The works of the Father; how of wonders each one
 He, Lord everlasting, laid the foundation.
 First He framed for the first-born of men. 5
 Heaven for a roof, holy Creator.
 Shaped He then earth, Shield of mankind,
 God immortal, and made thereafter
 Fields for the folk, Father almighty.

BEDE'S DEATH-SONG

(Translated by P. V. D. SHELLY)

No man becomes, before death calls him,
 Wiser in thought than then he needs be
 Well to consider, ere the thread's severed,
 What to his ghost, of good or of evil,
 After the death-day is destined by doom. 5

THE DROWNING OF THE EGYPTIANS

(From the Exodus.<sup>1</sup> Translated by J. D. SPAETH.)

The host was harrowed with horror of drowning;
 Sea-death menaced their miserable souls. 448

The slopes of the hill-sides were splashed with blood.

There was woe on the waters, the waves spat gore; 450

They were full of weapons, and frothed with slaughter.

Back were beaten the bold Egyptians, Fleed in fear; they were filled with terror.

Headlong they hastened their homes to seek. Less bold were their boasts as the billows rolled o'er them, 455

Dread welter of waves. Not one of that army Went again home, but Wyrd from behind Barred with billows their backward path. Where ways had lain, now weltered the sea,

The swelling flood. The storm went up 460 High to the heavens; hugest of upraors Darkened the sky; the dying shrieked With voices doomed. The Deep streamed with blood. Shield-walls were shattered by shock of the tempest.

Greatest of sea-deaths engulfed the mighty, 465 Captains and troops. Retreat was cut off

At the ocean's brink. Their battle-shields gleamed

High o'er their heads as the heaped-up waters Compassed them round, the raging flood.

Doomed was the host, by death hemmed in, 470 Suddenly trapped. The salty billows

Swept with their swirling the sand from their feet,

As the Ocean cold to its ancient bed, Through winding channels the churning flood,

Came rolling back o'er the rippled bottom, 475 Swift avenger, naked and wild.

With slaughter was streaked the storm-dark air; The bursting deep with blood-terror yawned,

When He who made it, by Moses' hand Unbitted the wrath of the raging flood; 480

Wide it came sweeping to swallow the foe; Foamed the waters, the fated sank;

Earth was o'erwhelmed, the air was darkened; Burst the wave-walls, the bulwarks tumbled;

The sea-towers melted, when the Mighty One smote 485

The pride of the host, through the pillar of fire, With holy hand from heaven above.

The onslaught wild of the angry main None might oppose. He appointed their end

In the roaring horror. Wroth was the sea: 490 Up it rose, down it smote, dealing destruction.

Slaughter-blood spread, the sea-wall fell, Upreared on high, the handiwork of God,

When the ocean He smote with His ancient sword,

Felled the defence of the foam-breasted waves. With the death-blow deep, the doomed men slept. 496

The army of sinners their souls gave up, The sea-pale host, ensnared and surrounded,

When the dark upheaval o'erwhelmed them all, Hugest of wild waves. The host sank down, Pharaoh and his folk, the flower of Egypt 501 Utterly perished. The enemy of God

Soon discovered, when the sea he entered,

That the ocean's master was mightier than he. By the strength of His arm He decided the battle, Wrathful and grim. He gave the Egyptians 506

Thorough reward for that day's work. Not one of that host to his home came back;

Of all those warriors not one returned To bring the news of the battle's end, 510

To tell in the towns the tidings of woe, Their husbands' doom to the heroes' wives,

How sea-death swallowed the stately host,— No messenger left. The Lord Almighty

Confounded their boasting; they fought against God. 515

Cynewulf<sup>1</sup>

THE VOYAGE OF LIFE

(From The Crist. Translated by J. D. SPAETH.)

Our life is likest a long sea-voyage: 850 O'er the water cold in our keels we glide,

O'er Ocean's streams, in our stallions of the deep

We drive afar. 'Tis a dreary waste Of ceaseless surges we sail across,

In this wavering world, o'er wind-swept tracts Of open sea. Anxious the struggle, 856

Ere we bring at last our barks to land, O'er the rough sea-ridges. Our rescue is near;

The Son of God doth safely guide us, Helps us into our harbor of refuge; 860

Shows from the deck the sheltered waters Where smoothly to anchor our ancient chargers,

Hold with the hawsers our horses of the deep. Then fix we our hope on that haven of safety

That the Prince of Glory prepared for us all, 865 The Ruler on high, when He rose to heaven.

DOOMSDAY

(From The Crist. Translated by J. D. SPAETH.)

Lo! on a sudden, and all unlooked for, In the dead of the night, the day of the Lord

Shall break tremendous on man and beast,

O'erwhelming the world and the wide creation, As a ruthless robber, ranging at night, 871

Who strides through the dark with stealthy pace,

And suddenly springs on sleep-bound heroes, Greeted with violence his victims unguarded.

A mighty host on the mount of Sion 875 Shall gather together glad and rejoicing

The faithful of the Lord, they shall find their reward.

With one accord from the quarters four, And uttermost ends of the earth at once,

Glorious angels together shall blow 880 Their shattering trumpets; the trembling earth

Shall shake and sink, as they sound together,

Piercing strong to the starry track.
 Their music swells from the South and North,
 From East and from West, o'er the world's wide round. 885
 They wake from the dead to the day of judgement

The children of men, with their challenge dread.
 Out of their ancient earth and mold,
 Forth from their sleep profound they wake them.

Howling with fear they shall huddle and flock,
 Moaning and groaning, aghast with terror, 891
 Bewailing the deeds that were done in the body.

Eye hath not seen a sight more awful,
 To men shall appear no portent more dread:
 Sinners and saints in strange confusion, 895 Mingled together shall mount from their graves,

The bright and the black: for both shall arise,
 Some fair, some foul, as foreordained
 To different home, of devils or angels.

From South and East o'er Sion's top, 900
 In sudden radiance the sun shall flame
 From the throne of God; more gleaming-bright,
 Than man may imagine, or mind conceive.
 Resplendent it shines, as the Son of God
 Dazzling breaks through the dome of heaven.
 Glorious appears the presence of Christ, 906
 The King as He comes through the clouds in the East,
 Merciful and mild in mind to his own,
 But with altered mood of anger toward the wicked:
 Unlike His looks for the lost and the blest. 910

The greedy spirit of consuming flame
 Shall leap o'er the land, and the lofty halls;
 With the terror of fire shall fill the world.
 The battle-thirsty flame shall blaze afar,
 Devouring the earth, and all therein. 915
 Strong-built walls shall split and crumble;
 Mountains shall melt, and the mighty cliffs
 That buttress the earth 'gainst battering waves,
 Bulwarks upreared 'gainst the rolling billows,
 Shall fall on a sudden. The sweep of the fire
 Shall leave no bird nor beast alive. 921
 The lurid flame shall leap along the world
 Like a raging warrior. Where the waters flowed
 In a bath of fire the fish shall be stifled;
 Sundered from life, their struggles over, 925
 The monsters of the deep no more shall swim.
 Like molten wax the water shall burn.
 More marvels shall appear than mind may conceive,
 When tempest and whirlwind o'erwhelm the earth,

And rocks are riven by the roaring blast. 930
 Men shall wail, they shall weep and lament,
 Groan aghast with grovelling fear.
 The smoke-dark flame o'er the sinful shall roll,
 The blaze shall consume their beakers of gold,
 All the ancient heirlooms of kings. 935
 The shrieks of the living aloud shall resound
 Mid the crack of doom, their cry of fear,

Their howl of despair, as they struggle to hide.
 No guilty wretch shall refuge find,
 Not one shall escape the scorching flame; 940
 On all it shall seize, as it sweeps through the world.

It shall leap and run and ruthlessly bore
 In the bowels of the earth, it shall burn aloft,
 Till the ancient stains of earthly sin
 By the purging billows are burnt away. 945

THE RUIN<sup>1</sup>

(Translated by STOPFORD A. BROOKE)

Wondrous is its wall of stone. Weirds<sup>2</sup> have shattered it!
 Broken are the burg-steads! Crumbled is the giants' work.
 Fallen are the roof beams; ruined are the towers;
 All undone the door-pierced towers; frozen dew is on their plaster!
 Shorn away and sunken down are the sheltering battlements, 5
 Undereaten of Old Age! Earth is holding in its clutch
 These, the power-wielding workers; all forsworn are they, forlorn in death are they!
 Hard the grip was of the ground, while a hundred generations
 Move away of men. Long its wall abode
 Through the rule that followed rule, ruddy stained, and gray as goat, 10
 Under storm-skies steady! Steep the court that fell,
 Still it falleth . . . (skilful ancient work it was)!
 Strong in rede,<sup>3</sup> (the builder strengthened), strong of heart, in chains he bound
 All the wall-uprights with wires, wondrous-wrought together!
 Brilliant were the burg-steads, burn-fed houses<sup>4</sup>
 many; 15
 High the heap of hornèd gables, of the host a mickle sound,
 Many were the mead-halls, full of mirth of men,
 Till the strong-willed Wyrd whirled that all to change!
 In a slaughter wide they fell, woeful days of bale came on;
 Famine-death fortook fortitude from men; 20
 All their battle bulwarks bare foundations were!
 Crumbled is the castle-keep; those have cringed to earth
 Who set up again the shrines! So the halls are dreary,
 And this courtyard's wide expanse! From the raftered woodwork

<sup>4</sup> Houses fed by springs of water. This passage, and the reference to the hot baths in lines 34-35 support the view that the city was Bath, where the ruins of Roman baths may still be seen.

(See) the roof has shed its tiles! To ruin sank the market-place, 25
 Broken up to barrows; many a brave man there, Glad of yore, and gold-bright, gloriously adorned,
 Hot with wine and haughty, in war-harness shone;—
 Saw upon his silver, on set gems and treasure,
 On his welfare and his wealth, on his winsome jewels, 30
 On this brightsome burg of a broad dominion!—
 There the stone-courts stood; hotly surged the stream,
 With a widening whirling; and a wall enclosed it all,
 With its bosom bright. There the baths were set
 Hot within their heart; fit [for health] it was! 35

(Translated by EMILY H. HICKEY)

'Still the lone one and desolate waits for his Maker's ruth—
 God's good mercy, albeit so long it tarry, in sooth.
 Careworn and sad of heart, on the watery ways must he Plow with the hand-grasped oar—how long?—
 the rime-cold sea,
 Tread thy paths of exile, O Fate, who art cruelty.' 5
 Thus did a wanderer speak, being heart-full of woe, and all
 Thoughts of the cruel slayings, and pleasant comrades' fall:
 'Morn by morn I, alone, am fain to utter my woe;
 Now is there none of the living to whom I dare to show
 Plainly the thought of my heart; in very sooth
 I know 10
 Excellent is it in man that his breast he straightly bind,
 Shut fast his thinkings in silence, whatever he have in his mind.
 The man that is weary in heart, he never can fate withstand;
 The man that grieves in his spirit, he finds not the helper's hand.
 Therefore the glory-grasper full heavy of soul
 may be. 15
 So, far from my fatherland, and mine own good kinsmen free,
 I must bind my heart in fetters, for long, ah!
 long ago,
 The earth's cold darkness covered my giver of gold brought low;
 And I, sore stricken and humbled, and winter-saddened, went Far over the frost-bound waves to seek for the dear content 20
 Of the hall of the giver of rings; but far nor near could I find

Who felt the love of the mead-hall, or who with comforts kind
 Would comfort me, the friendless. 'Tis he alone will know
 Who knows, being desolate too, how evil a fere<sup>2</sup> is woe;
 For him the path of the exile, and not the twisted gold; 25
 For him the frost in his bosom, and not earth-riches old.
 'O, well he remembers the hall-men, the treasure bestowed in the hall;
 The feast that his gold-giver made him, the joy at its height, at its fall;
 He knows who must be forlorn for his dear lord's counsels gone,
 Where sleep and sorrow together are binding
 the lonely one; 30
 When him thinks he clasps and kisses his leader of men, and lays
 His hands and head on his knee, as when, in the good yore-days,
 He sat on the throne of his might, in the strength that wins and saves.
 But the friendless man awakes, and he sees the yellow waves,
 And the sea-birds dip to the sea, and broaden their wings to the gale, 35
 And he sees the dreary rime, and the snow com-mingled with hail.
 O, then are the wounds of his heart the sorer much for this,
 The grief for the loved and lost made new by the dream of old bliss.
 His kinsmen's memory comes to him as he lies asleep,
 And he greets it with joy, with joy, and the heart in his breast doth leap; 40
 But out of his ken the shapes of his warrior-comrades swim
 To the land whence seafarers bring no dear old saws for him;
 Then fresh grows sorrow and new to him whose bitter part
 Is to send o'er the frost-bound waves full often his weary heart.
 For this do I look around this world, and cannot see 45
 Wherefore or why my heart should not grow dark in me.
 When I think of the lives of the leaders, the
 clansmen mighty in mood;
 When I think how sudden and swift they yielded the place where they stood.
 So droops this mid-earth and falls, and never a man is found
 Wise ere a many winters have girt his life around. 50
 Full patient the sage must be, and he that would counsel teach—
 Not over-hot in his heart, nor over-swift in his speech;
 Nor faint of soul nor secure, nor fain for the fight nor afraid;

<sup>1</sup> Date and author unknown. Attributed to the 8th or 9th century.<sup>2</sup> Companion.

Nor ready to boast before he know himself well arrayed.
 The proud-souled man must bide when he utters his vaunt, until 55
 He know of the thoughts of the heart, and whitherward turn they will.
 The prudent must understand how terror and awe shall be,
 When the glory and weal of the world lie waste, as now men see
 On our mid-earth many a where, the wind-swept walls arise,
 And the ruined dwellings and void, and the rime that on them lies. 60
 The wine-halls crumble, bereft of joy the warriors lie,
 The flower of the doughty fallen, the proud ones fair to the eye.
 War took off some in death, and one did a strong bird bear
 Over the deep; and one—his bones did the grey wolf share;
 And one was hid in a cave by a comrade sorrowful-faced. 65
 O, thus the Shaper of men hath laid the earth all waste,
 Till the works of the city-dwellers, the works of the giants of earth,
 Stood empty and lorn of the burst of the mighty revellers' mirth.
 'Who wisely hath mused on this wallstead, and ponders this dark life well
 In his heart he hath often bethought him of slayings many and fell, 70
 And these be the words he taketh, the thoughts of his heart to tell:
 "Where is the horse and the rider? Where is the giver of gold?
 Where be the seats at the banquet? Where be the hall-joys of old?
 Alas for the burnished cup, for the byrned* chief to-day!
 Alas for the strength of the prince! for the time hath passed away— 75
 Is hid 'neath the shadow of night, as it never had been at all.
 Behind the dear and doughty there standeth now a wall,
 A wall that is wondrous high, and with wondrous snake-work wrought.
 The strength of the spears hath fordene the earls and hath made them naught,
 The weapons greedy of slaughter, and she, the mighty Wyrd; 80
 And the tempests beat on the rocks, and the storm-wind that maketh afear—
 The terrible storm that fetters the earth, the winter-bale,
 When the shadow of night falls wan, and wild is the rush of the hail,
 The cruel rush from the north, which maketh men to quail.
 Hardship-full is the earth, o'erturned when the stark Wyrd says: 85

Here is the passing of riches, here friends are passing away;
 And men and kinsfolk pass, and nothing and none may stay;
 And all this earth—stead here shall be empty and void one day." . . .

(Translated by HENRY MORLEY)

"I may sing of myself now
 A song that is true,
 Can tell of wide travel,
 The toil of hard days;
 How oft through long seasons 5
 I suffered and strove,
 Abiding within my breast
 Bitterest care;
 How I sailed among sorrows
 In many a sea; 10
 The wild rise of the waves,
 The close watch of the night
 At the dark prow in danger
 Of dashing on rock,
 Folded in by the frost, 15
 My feet bound by the cold
 In chill bands, in the breast
 The heart burning with care.
 The soul of the sea-weary
 Hunger assailed. 20

Knows not he who finds happiest
 Home upon earth
 How I lived through long winter
 In labour and care,
 On the icy-cold ocean, 25
 An exile from joy,
 Cut off from dear kindred,
 Encompassed with ice.
 Hail flew in hard showers,
 And nothing I heard 30
 But the wrath of the waters,
 The icy-cold way;
 At times the swan's song;
 In the scream of the gannet
 I sought for my joy, 35
 In the moan of the sea-whelp
 For laughter of men,
 In the song of the sea-mew
 For drinking of mead.
 Starlings answered the storm
 Beating stones on the cliff,
 Icy-feathered, and often
 The eagle would shriek,
 Wet of wing.
 Not one home-friend could feel 45
 With the desolate soul;
 For he little believes
 To whom life's joy belongs
 In the town, lightly troubled
 With dangerous tracks, 50
 Vain with high spirit

* Byrned chief, i. e., chief arrayed in his "byrne," or war-shirt.

<sup>1</sup> The date and authorship are unknown. Some scholars think that the Seafarer is a dialogue between an old sailor and a young man who longs to go to sea, but as this is mere conjecture, no attempt has been made in the present version to indicate the respective parts.

And wanton with wine,
How often I wearily
Held my sea-way.

The night shadows darkened,
It snowed from the north;
The rime bound the rocks;
The hail rolled upon earth,
Coldest of corn:
Therefore now is high heaving
In thoughts of my heart,
That my lot is, to learn
The wide joy of waters,
The whirl of salt spray.
Often desire drives
My soul to depart,
That the home of the strangers
Far hence I may seek.

There is no man among us
So proud in his mind,
Nor so good in his gifts,
Nor so gay in his youth,
Nor so daring in deeds,
Nor so dear to his lord,
That his soul never stirred
At the thought of seafaring,
Or what his great Master
Will do with him yet.
He hears not the harp,
Heeds not giving of rings,
Has to woman no will,
And no hope in the world,
Nor in aught there is else
But the wash of the waves.
He lives ever longing
Who looks to the sea.

Groves bud with green,
The hills grow fair,
Gay shine the fields,
The world's astir:
All this but warns
The willing mind
To set the sail,
For so he thinks
Far on the waves
To win his way.
With woeful note
The cuckoo warns,
The summer's warden sings,
And sorrow rules
The heart-store bitterly.
No man can know,
Nursed in soft ease,
The burden borne
By those who fare
The farthest from their friends.

In the soul's secret chamber
My mind now is set,
My heart's thought, on wide waters,
The home of the whale;
It wanders away
Beyond limits of land:
Comes again to me, yearning

With eager desire;
Loud cries the lone-flier,
And stirs the mind's longing
To travel the way that is trackless,
The death-way over the flood.
For my will to my Master's pleasure
Is warmer than this dead life
That is lent us on land.
I believe not that earth-blessings
Ever abide.
Ever of three things one,
To each ere the severing hour:
Old age, sickness, or slaughter,
Will force the doomed soul to depart.

Therefore for each of the earls,
Of those who shall afterwards name them,
This is best laud from the living
In last words spoken about him:—
He worked ere he went his way,
When on earth, against wiles of the foe,
With brave deeds overcoming the devil.
His memory cherished
By children of men,
His glory grows ever
With angels of God,
In life everlasting
Of bliss with the bold.

Passed are the days of the pride
Of the kingdoms of earth!
Kings are no more, and kaisers.
None count out,
As once they did, their gifts of gold,
When that made them most great,
And Man judged that they lived
As Lords most High.
That fame is all fallen,
Those joys are all fled;
The weak ones abiding
Lay hold on the world:
By their labour they win.

High fortune is humbled;
Earth's haughtiness ages
And wastes,—as now withers
Each man from the world:
Old age is upon him
And bleaches his face;
He is grey-haired and grieves,
Knows he now must give up
The old friends he cherished,
Chief children of earth.
The husk of flesh,
When life is fled,
Shall taste no sweetness,
Feel no sore;
Is in its hand no touch;
Is in its brain no thought.
Though his born brother
Strew gold in the grave,
Bury him pompously
Borne to the dead,
Entomb him with treasure,
The trouble is vain:
The soul of the sinful

His gold may not save
From the awe before God,
Though he hoarded it heedfully
While he lived here. 180

Great awe is in presence of God.
The firm ground trembles before Him
Who strongly fixed its foundations,
The limits of earth and the heavens.
Fool is he without fear of the Lord; 185
To him will come death unforeseen:
Happy is he who is lowly of life;
To him will come honour from heaven:
The Creator will strengthen his soul
Because he put trust in His power. 190

Rude will should be ruled
And restrained within bound
And clean in its ways with men,
If every man
Kept measure in mind 195
With friend and with foe. . . .
More force is in fate, 198
In the Maker more might,
Than in thought of a man. 200

Let us look to the home
Where in truth we can live,
And then let us be thinking
How thither to come:
For then we too shall toil 205
That our travel may reach
To delight never ending,
When life is made free
In the love of the Lord
In the height of the heavens! 210
May we thank the All Holy
Who gave us this grace,—
The Wielder of glory,
The Lord everlasting,—
In time without end! Amen." 215

For thee was a house built
 Ere thou wert born;
 For thee was a mould meant
 Ere thou of mother camest. )
 But it is not made ready, 5
 Nor its depth measured,
 Nor is it seen
 How long it shall be.
 Now I bring thee
 Where thou shalt be. 10
 Now I shall measure thee,
 And the mould afterwards.

Thy house is not Highly timbered;
 It is unhigh and low, 15
 When thou art therein,
 The heel-ways are low,
 The side-way unhigh;
 The roof is built
 Thy breast full nigh. 20
 So thou shalt in mould
 Dwell full cold,
 Dimly and dark.

Doorless is that house,
 And dark it is within; 25
 There thou art fast detained,
 And Death hath the key.
 Loathsome is that earth-house,
 And grim within to dwell;
 There thou shalt dwell, 30
 And worms shall divide thee.

Thus thou art laid
 And leavest thy friends;
 Thou hast no friend
 Who will come to thee, 35

 the latest poems of the Old English period.

Who will ever see
How that house pleaseth thee,
Who will ever open

And descend after thee;
For soon thou art loathsome
And hateful to see.

KING EDWIN CONSIDERS ADOPTING CHRISTIANITY

(Bede's Ecclesiastical History, 731)

(Translated by J. A. GILES)

King Edwin,<sup>1</sup> therefore, delaying to receive the word of God at the preaching of Paulinus,<sup>2</sup> and using for sometime, as has been said, to sit several hours alone, and seriously to ponder with himself what he was to do, and what religion he was to follow, the man of God came to him, laid his right hand on his head, and asked, "Whether he knew that sign?" The king in a trembling condition, was ready to fall down at his feet, but he raised him up, and in a familiar manner said to him, "Behold by the help of God you have escaped the hands of the enemies whom you feared. Behold you have of his gift obtained the kingdom which you desired. Take heed not to delay that which you promised to perform; embrace the faith, and keep the precepts of Him who, delivering you from temporal adversity, has raised you to the honour of a temporal kingdom; and if, from this time forward, you shall be obedient to his will, which through me he signifies to you, he will not only deliver you from the everlasting torments of the wicked, but also make you a partaker with him of his eternal kingdom in heaven."

The king, hearing these words, answered that he was both willing and bound to receive the faith which he taught; but that he would confer about it with his principal friends and counsellors, to the end that if they also were of his opinion, they might all together be cleansed in Christ the Fountain of Life. Paulinus<sup>2</sup> consenting, the king did as he said; for, holding a counsel with the wise men, he asked of every one in particular what he thought of the new doctrine, and the new worship that was preached? To which the chief of his own priests, Coifi, immediately answered, "O king, consider what this is which is now preached to us; for I verily declare to you, that the religion which we have hitherto professed has, as far as I can learn, no virtue in it. For none of your people has applied himself more diligently to the worship of our gods than I; and yet there are many who receive greater favours from you, and are more preferred than I, and are more prosperous in all their undertakings. Now if the gods were good for anything, they would rather forward me, who have been more careful to serve them. It remains, therefore, that if upon examination you find those new doctrines, which are now preached to us, better and more efficacious, we immediately receive them without any delay."

Another of the king's chief men, approving of his words and exhortations, presently added: "The present life of man, O king, seems to me, in comparison of that time which is unknown to us, like to the swift flight of a sparrow through the room wherein you sit at supper in winter, with your commanders and ministers, and a good fire in the midst, whilst the storms of rain and snow prevail abroad; the sparrow, I say, flying in at one door, and immediately out at another, whilst he is within, is safe from the wintry storm; but after a short space of fair weather, he immediately vanishes out of your sight, into the dark winter from which he had emerged. So this life of man appears for a short space, but of what went before, or what is to follow, we are utterly ignorant. If, therefore, this new doctrine contains something more certain, it seems justly to deserve to be followed." The other elders and king's counsellors, by divine inspiration, spoke to the same effect.

But Coifi added, that he wished more attentively to hear Paulinus discourse concerning the God whom he preached; which he having by the king's command performed, Coifi, hearing his words, cried out, "I have long since been sensible that there was nothing in that which we worshipped; because the more diligently I sought after truth in that worship, the less I found it. But now I freely confess, that such truth evidently appears in this preaching as can confer on us the gifts of life, of salvation, and of eternal happiness. For which reason I advise, O king, that we instantly abjure and set fire to those temples and altars which we have consecrated without reaping any benefit from them." In short, the king publicly gave his license to Paulinus to preach the Gospel, and renouncing idolatry, declared that he received the faith of Christ: and when he inquired of the high priest who should first profane the altars and temples of their idols, with the enclosures that were about them, he answered, "I; for who can more properly than myself destroy those things which I worshipped through ignorance, for an example to all others, through the wisdom which has been given me by the true God?" Then immediately, in contempt of his former superstitions, he desired the king to furnish him with arms and a stallion; and mounting the same, he set out to destroy the idols; for it was not lawful before for the high priest either to carry arms, or to ride on any but a mare. Having, therefore, girt a sword about him, with a spear in his hand, he mounted the king's stallion and proceeded to the idols. The multitude, beholding it, concluded he was distracted; but he lost no time, for as soon as he drew near the temple he profaned the same, casting into it the spear which he held; and rejoicing in the knowledge of the worship of the true God, he commanded his companions to destroy the temple, with all its enclosures, by fire. This place where the idols were is still shown, not far from York, to the eastward, beyond the river Derwent, and is now called Godmundingham,<sup>2</sup> where the high priest, by the inspiration of the true God, profaned and destroyed the altars which he himself had consecrated.

THE VISION OF CÆDMON

(From the same)

(Translated by J. A. GILES)

There was in this abbess's monastery<sup>1</sup> a certain brother, particularly remarkable for the grace of God, who was wont to make pious and religious verses, so that whatever was interpreted to him out of Scripture, he soon after put the same into poetical expressions of much sweetness and humility, in English, which was his native language. By his verses the minds of many were often excited to despise the world, and to aspire to heaven. Others after him attempted, in the English nation, to compose religious poems, but none could ever compare with him, for he did not learn the art of poetry from men, but from God; for which reason he never could compose any trivial or vain poem, but only those which relate to religion suited his religious tongue; for having lived in a secular habit till he was well advanced in years, he had never learned anything of versifying; for which reason being sometimes at entertainments, when it was agreed for the sake of mirth that all present should sing in their turns, when he saw the instrument come towards him, he rose up from table and returned home.

Having done so at a certain time, and gone out of the house where the entertainment was, to the stable, where he had to take care of the horses that night, he there composed himself to rest at the proper time; a person appeared to him in his sleep, and saluting him by his name, said, "Cædmón, sing some song to me." He answered, "I cannot sing; for that was the reason why I left the entertainment, and retired to this place, because I could not sing." The other who talked to him, replied, "How-ever you shall sing."—"What shall I sing?" rejoined he. "Sing the beginning of created beings," said the other. Hereupon he presently began to sing verses to the praise of God, which he had never heard, the purport whereof was thus:—We are now to praise the Maker of the heavenly kingdom, the power of the Creator and his counsel, the deeds of the Father of glory. How he, being the eternal God, became the author of all miracles, who first, as almighty preserver of the human race, created heaven for the sons of men, as a roof of the house, and next the earth.<sup>2</sup> This is the sease, but not the words in order as he sang them in his sleep; for verses, though never so well composed, cannot be literally translated out of one language into another, without losing much of their beauty and loftiness. Awaking from his sleep, he remembered all that he had sung in his dream, and soon added much more to the same effect in verse worthy of the Deity.

In the morning he came to the steward, his superior, and having acquainted him with the gift he had received, was conducted to the abbess, by whom he was ordered, in the presence of many learned men, to tell his dream, and repeat the verses, that they might all give their judgment what it was, and whence his verse proceeded. They all concluded, that heavenly grace had been conferred on him by our Lord. They expounded to him a passage in holy writ, either historical or doctrinal, ordering him, if he could, to put the same into verse. Having undertaken it, he went away, and returning the next morning, gave it to them composed in most excellent verse; whereupon the abbess, embracing the grace of God in the man, instructed him to quit the secular habit, and take upon him the monastic life; which being accordingly done, she associated him to the rest of the brethren in her monastery, and ordered that he should be taught the whole series of sacred history. Thus Cædmón, keeping in mind all he heard, and as it were chewing the cud, converted the same into most harmonious verse; and sweetly repeating the same, made his masters in their turn his hearers. He sang the creation of the world, the origin of man, and all the history of Genesis: and made many verses on the departure of the children of Israel out of Egypt, and their entering into the land of promise, with many other histories from holy writ; the incarnation, passion, resurrection of our Lord, and his ascension into heaven; the coming of the Holy Ghost, and the preaching of the apostles; also the terror of future judgment, the horror of the pains of hell, and the delights of heaven; besides many more about the Divine benefits and judgments, by which he endeavored to turn away all men from the love of vice, and to excite in them the love of, and application to, good actions; for he was a very religious man, humbly submissive to regular discipline, but full of zeal against those who behaved themselves otherwise; for which reason he ended his life happily.

For when the time of his departure drew near, he laboured for the space of fourteen days under a bodily infirmity which seemed to prepare the way, yet so moderate that he could talk and walk the whole time. In his neighborhood was the house to which those that were sick, and like shortly to die, were carried. He desired the person that attended him, in the evening, as the night came on in which he was to depart this life, to make ready a place there for him to take his rest. This person, wondering why he should desire it, because there was as yet no sign of his dying soon, did what he had ordered. He accordingly went there, and conversing pleasantly in a joyful manner with the rest that were in the house before, when it was past midnight, he asked them whether they had the Eucharist there? They answered, "What need of the Eucharist? for you are not likely to die, since you talk so merrily with us, as if you were in perfect health."—"However," said he, "bring me the Eucharist." Having received the same into his hand, he asked, whether they were all in charity with him, and without any enmity or rancour? They answered, that they were all in perfect charity, and free from anger; and in their turn asked him, whether he was in the same mind towards them? He answered, "I am in charity, my children, with all the servants of God." Then strengthening himself with the heavenly viaticum, he prepared for the entrance into another life, and asked, how near the time was when the brothers were to be awakened to sing the nocturnal praises of our Lord? They answered, "It is not far off." Then he said, "Well, let us wait that hour," and signing himself with the sign of the cross, he laid his head on the pillow, and falling into a slumber, ended his life so in silence.

Thus it came to pass, that as he had served God with a simple and pure mind, and undisturbed devotion, so he now departed to His presence, leaving the world by a quiet death; and that tongue, which had composed so many holy words in praise of the Creator, uttered its last words whilst he was in the act of signing himself with the cross, and recommending himself into His hands, and by what has been here said, he seems to have had foreknowledge of his death.

BEDE'S ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF

(From the same)

(Translated by J. A. GILES)

Thus much of the Ecclesiastical History of Britain, and more especially of the English nation, as far as I could learn either from the writings of the ancients, or the tradition of our ancestors, or of my own knowledge, has, with the help of God, been digested by me, Bede, the servant of God, and priest of the monastery of the blessed apostles, Peter and Paul, which is at Wearmouth and Jarrow;<sup>1</sup> who being born in the territory of that same monastery, was given, at seven years of age, to be educated by the most reverend Abbat Benedict,<sup>2</sup> and afterwards by Ceolfrid; and, spending all the remaining time of my life in that monastery, I wholly applied myself to the study of Scripture, and amidst the observance of regular discipline, and the daily care of singing in the church, I always took delight in learning, teaching, and writing. In the nineteenth year of my age, I received deacon's orders; in the thirtieth, those of the priesthood, both of them by the ministry of the most reverend Bishop John,<sup>3</sup> and by the order of the Abbat Ceolfrid. From which time, till the fifty-ninth year of my age, I have made it my business, for the use of me and mine, to compile out of the works of the venerable Fathers, and to interpret and explain according to their meaning these following pieces.<sup>4</sup>

OF BEDE

(c. 735)

(Translated by P. V. D. SHELLEY)

To his most dear fellow-lector Cuthwin, beloved in Christ, Cuthbert, his co-disciple in God, sends greeting. The little gift you sent me I have received with pleasure, and with great joy have I read your letter, full of a devout learning, in which I learn, what I so greatly desired, that you are diligently celebrating masses and prayers for our father and master, Bede, beloved of God. Wherefore—more on account of my love for him than because of any confidence in my powers—I am pleased to tell you in a few words how he departed from this life, since this, I understand, is what you desire and request. About two weeks before the day of the Resurrection, he was afflicted with great weakness and with shortness of breath, although he was without pain; and so, happy and rejoicing, giving thanks to Almighty God every day and every night, indeed almost every hour, he lived until the day of our Lord's ascension, that is the seventh of the Kalends of June.<sup>2</sup> To us, his pupils, he continued to give lessons every day, and the rest of the day he spent in singing psalms. Ever vigilant, he would spend the whole night in rejoicing and in giving thanks, except when a little sleep prevented. Upon awaking, however, he would again repeat the customary prayers and with hands uplifted continue to give thanks to God. Truly I may say that I have neither seen with my eyes nor heard with my ears any one give thanks so diligently to the living God.

O truly blessed man! He was wont to repeat the words of St. Paul the Apostle, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God,"<sup>3</sup> and many other things from the Scriptures, by which he would admonish us to rouse ourselves from the sleep of the soul by thinking upon our last hour. Also he sometimes spoke in our tongue, the English, for he was very learned in our songs:<sup>4</sup> . . . He would also sing Antiphons, according to his usage and ours, one of which is: "O King of glory, Lord of Hosts, who in triumph didst this day ascend above all the heavens, leave us not orphans, but send upon us the promise of the Father, the Spirit of Truth, Alleluia."

And when he had come to the words "leave us not orphans," he burst into tears and wept much. And after a while he began to repeat what he had begun. And we, hearing these things, mourned with him. Now we read, and now we wept; nay, we read as we wept. In such gladness we passed the quinquagesimal days<sup>5</sup> until the above mentioned day, and he rejoiced greatly and gave thanks to God because he had been worthy of such affliction. He would often say, "God scourgeth every son whom He receiveth,"<sup>6</sup> and much more from the holy scriptures. A saying of Ambrose's he would also repeat, "I have not lived in such a manner as to be ashamed to live among you; but neither do I fear to die, because we have a good God." In these days also, he strove to produce two works worthy of memory, in addition to teaching us and singing psalms. He translated into our tongue, for the use of the Church, the gospel of St. John, to where it is said, "But what are these among so many?"<sup>7</sup> and certain excerpts from the works of Bishop Isidore, saying, "I do not wish that my pupils should read falsehood, or labor herein without profit after my death." When the third Tuesday before the Ascension of our Lord had come, he began to experience great difficulty in breathing, and a slight swelling developed in his feet. But he labored all that day, and dictated happily, and among other things said, "Learn quickly, for I know not how long I shall live, or whether in a little while my Maker shall take me." To us, however, it seemed that he knew well the time of his going forth. Thus he spent the night in vigils and thanksgiving. And at dawn, that is on Wednesday, he commanded us to write diligently what we had begun; and this we did unto the third hour. From the third hour we walked with the relics of the saints, as the custom of the day demanded. One of us remained with him, who said to him, "There is yet one chapter lacking. Does it not seem hard that you should be questioned further?" But he answered, "It is easy. Take pen and ink, and write quickly." He did so. At the ninth hour he said to me, "In my chest I have a few little valuables, pepper, napkins, and incense. Go quickly and bring hither the priests of our monastery, that I may distribute among them what gifts God has granted me. The rich men, in this day, may wish to give gold and silver and the like treasures; I, with great charity and gladness, shall give to my brothers what God has bestowed." And with fear I did this. Then addressing one and all, he besought them to sing masses for him and to pray diligently; which they freely promised. They all continued to weep and mourn, especially because he had said that they should not see his face much longer in this life. But they rejoiced because he said, "It is time that I return to Him who made me, who created me and formed me out of nothing. I have lived long, and my gracious Judge has ordered my life well; the time of my return is come, for I desire to die and to be with Christ."

This and much else he said, passing the day in gladness up to vespers. And the boy mentioned above said, "One sentence, dear master, is yet to be written." He answered, "Write quickly." After a little the boy said, "Now the sentence is written." "It is well; you spoke truly; it is finished. Take my head in your hands, for it pleases me greatly to sit opposite my holy place where I was wont to pray, so that sitting I may invoke my Father." And thus, on the floor of his cell, chanting "Gloria Patri, et Filio, et Spiritui Sancto," as he named the Holy Spirit he breathed his last, and so passed to the heavenly kingdom.

All who saw the death of the venerable father said that they had seen no one end his life in such devotion and tranquillity, for, as you have heard, while his soul was in his body, he chanted the Gloria Patri and other divine songs to the glory of God, and, his hands up-lifted to the living God, he uttered thanks without ceasing. Know, dear brother, that I could record many things of him, but my lack of skill in speech makes my narrative short. Nevertheless, I purpose, with God's help, to write of him more fully what I have seen with my eyes and heard with my ears.

THE STATE OF LEARNING IN ENGLAND

King Alfred's Preface to his Translation of Gregory's Pastoral Care

(Translated by P. V. D. SHELLEY)

Alfred, the king, greets bishop Werferth,<sup>1</sup> with his words lovingly and in friendly wise; and I let it be known to thee that it has very often come to my mind what wise men there were formerly among the English, both of godly and of worldly office, and what happy times were those throughout England; and how the kings who had rule of the folk in those days obeyed God and His ministers; and how within their borders they maintained their peace, their customs, and their might, and at the same time extended their territory beyond; how they prospered both in war and in wisdom; and also how zealous were those of the religious life in teaching and in learning and in all those services which they owed to God; and how foreigners came hither to this land seeking wisdom and learning, and how we must now get them from abroad if we are to have them. So clean was learning fallen away among the English, that there were very few on this side of the Humber who could understand their service-book in English, or translate a letter from Latin into English; and I ween there were not many beyond the Humber. So few of them were there that I cannot think of one south of the Thames when I came to the throne. To God Almighty be the thanks that we have any supply of teachers now. And therefore I bid thee, as I believe thou art willing, as often as thou art able, to free thyself from worldly affairs, that thou mayest apply the wisdom that God gavest thee wherever thou canst. Think what punishments came upon us on account of this world, when we neither loved wisdom ourselves nor allowed it to other men: the name alone of being Christians we loved, and very few of the practises.

When I remembered all this, I also recalled that I saw, before it was all laid waste and burnt, how the churches throughout England stood filled with treasures and books, and also a great number of God's servants; but they knew very little use of those books, since they were able to understand no whit of them, for they were not written in their own tongue. As if they had said, "Our elders, who held these places of old, loved wisdom, and through it they got wealth and left it to us. Here we can yet see their tracks, but we know not how to follow them; and therefore we have lost both the wealth and the wisdom, because we would not bend our minds to follow their path."

When I remembered all this, I wondered very greatly, concerning the good wise men who were formerly among the English and had fully learned all those books, that they had turned no part of them into their own language. But I soon answered myself and said, "They did not think that men would ever become so careless and that learning would so fall away; hence they neglected it, through the desire that there might be the more wisdom here in the land the more we knew of languages."

Then I called to mind how the law was first found in Hebrew; and again, when the Greeks learned it, they translated all of it into their own tongue, and also all other books. And again, the Romans likewise, after they learned them, translated the whole of them, through wise interpreters, into their own language. And also all other Christian peoples turned some part of them into their own tongue. Therefore it seems better to me, if it seems so to you, that we also translate some books that are most needful for all men to know, into that language which we are all able to understand; and that, as we very easily can with God's help if we have peace, we cause all the youth now in England of the class of freemen, who are rich enough to be able to apply themselves to it, to be set to learn, the while they can be put to no other employment, until they are well able to read English writing; and afterward let those be taught in the Latin tongue who are to be taught further and to be put in a higher office. When I remembered how, before now, the knowledge of Latin had fallen away among the English and yet many knew how to read English writing, I began, among other various and manifold concerns of this kingdom, to translate into English the book that in Latin is called "Pastoralis," and in English, "Shepherd's Book,"—at times word by word, and again according to the sense, as I had learned it from Plegmund my archbishop, and from Asser my bishop, and from Grimbold my mass-priest, and from John my mass-priest. After I had learned it, I turned it into English as I understood it and could most clearly expound it; and to every bishopric in my kingdom I wish to send one; and in each there is a book-mark worth fifty mancuses. And I command in God's name that no man take the book-mark from the book, nor the book from the minster. We know not how long there may be such learned bishops as, God be thanked, there now are nearly everywhere. Therefore, I would that they may always be in their place, unless the bishop wishes to have them with him, or they be lent anywhere, or anyone copy them.

THE CONSOLATION OF BOETHIUS

(Selections from King Alfred's Translation)

(Translated from the Old English by W. J. SEDGEFIELD)

THE KING AND HIS SERVANTS<sup>1</sup>

"When Philosophy had sung this song she was silent for a time. Then the Mind answered, saying, 'O Philosophy, thou knowest that I never greatly delighted in covetousness and the possession of earthly power, nor longed for this authority," but I desired instruments and materials to carry out the work I was set to do, which was that I should virtuously and fittingly administer the authority committed unto me. Now no man, as thou knowest, can get full play for his natural gifts, nor conduct and administer government, unless he hath fit tools, and the raw material to work upon. By material I mean that which is necessary to the exercise of natural powers; thus a king's raw material and instruments of rule are a well peopled land, and he must have men of prayer, men of war, and men of work. As thou knowest, without these tools no king may display his special talent. Further, for his materials he must have means of support for the three classes above spoken of, which are his instruments; and these means are land to dwell in, gifts, weapons, meat, ale, clothing, and what else soever the three classes need. Without these means he cannot keep his tools in order, and without these tools he cannot perform any of the tasks entrusted to him. "I have desired material for the exercise of government that my talents and my power might not be forgotten and hidden away," for every good gift and every power soon groweth old, and is no more heard of, if Wisdom be not in them. Without Wisdom, no faculty can be brought out, for whatsoever is done unwisely can never be accounted as skill. To be brief, I may say that it has ever been my desire to live honourably while I was alive, and after my death to leave to them that should come after me my memory in good works.'

FATE AND PROVIDENCE

"Then she began to speak in a very remote and roundabout fashion, as though she were not alluding to the subject, and yet she led up to it, saying, 'All creatures, both the seen and the unseen, the motionless and the moving, receive from the unmoving, unchanging, and undivided God their due order, form, and proportions; and, inasmuch as it was so created, He knoweth why He hath made all that He hath made. Nothing of what He hath made is without use to Him. God ever dwelleth in the high city of His unity and mercy; thence He dealeth out ordinances many and various to all His creatures, and thence He ruleth them all. But regarding that which we call God's providence and foresight, this exists as long as it abides with Him in His mind, ere it be brought to pass, and while it is but thought. But as soon as it is accomplished we call it Fate. From this every man may know that Providence and Fate are not only two names, but two things. Providence is the Divine Reason, and lieth fast in the high Creator that knoweth how everything shall befall ere it come to pass. But that which we call Fate is God's working day by day, both that which we see, and that which is not seen of us. The divine forethought holdeth up all creatures, so that they may not fall asunder from their due order. Fate therefore allots to all things their forms, places, seasons, and proportions; but Fate comes from the mind and the forethought of Almighty God, who worketh whatsoever He will according to His unspeakable providence.

'Even as every craftsman thinks over and marks out his work in his mind ere he take it in hand, and then carries it out altogether, so this changing lot that we call Fate proceeds according to His forethought and purpose, even as He resolveth that it shall be done. Though it seem to us manifold, partly good, partly evil, yet it is to Him good, pure and simple, for He bringeth it all to a goodly conclusion, and doeth for good all that He doeth. When it is done, we call it Fate; before, it was God's forethought and His purpose. Now Fate He setteth in motion by means of the good angels or the souls of men, or the lives of other creatures, or through the heavenly bodies, or the divers wiles of evil spirits; at one time through one of them, at another through all. But it is manifest that the divine purpose is single and unchanging, and rules everything in orderly wise, and gives unto all things their shape. Now some things in this world are subject to Fate, others are in no way subject; but Fate, and the things that are subject to her, are subject to divine Providence. Concerning this I can tell thee a parable, so that thou mayest the more clearly understand who are the men that are subject to Fate, and who are they that are not.

'All this moving and changing creation turns round the unmoving, the unchanging, and the undivided God, and He ruleth all creatures as He purposed in the beginning, and still doth purpose. The wheels of a wagon turn upon its axle," while the axle stands still and yet bears all the wagon and guides all its movement. The wheel turns round, and the nave next the wheel moves more firmly and securely than the felly does. Now the axle is as it were the highest good we call God, and the best men move next unto God just as the nave moves nearest the axle. The middle sort of men are like the spokes, for one end of each spoke is fast in the nave, and the other is in the felly; and so it is with the midmost man, at one time thinking in his mind upon this earthly life, at another upon the divine life, as if he looked with one eye heavenwards, and with the other earth-

wards. Just as the spokes have one end sticking in the felly and the other in the nave, while in the middle the spoke is equally near either, so the midmost men are at the middle of the spokes, the better sort nearer the nave, and the baser nearer the fellies, joined, however, to the nave, which in turn is fixed to the axle. Now, the fellies are fastened to the spokes, though they roll on the ground; and so the least worthy men are in touch with the middle sort, and these with the best, and the best with God. Though the worst men turn their love towards this world they cannot abide therein, nor come to anything, if they be in no degree fastened to God, no more than the wheel's fellies can be in motion unless they be fastened to the spokes, and the spokes to the axle. The fellies are farthest from the axle, and therefore move least steadily. The nave moves nearest the axle, therefore is its motion the most sure. So do the best men; the nearer to God they set their love, and the more they despise earthly things, the less care is theirs, "and the less they reckon how Fate veers, or what she brings." So also the nave is ever sound, let the fellies strike on what they may; and nevertheless the nave is in some degree severed from the axle. Thereby thou mayest perceive that the wagon keeps far longer whole the less its distance from the axle, and so also those men are most free from care, both in this present life of tribulation and in the life to come, that are firmly fixed in God. But the farther they are sundered from God, the more sorely are they confounded and afflicted both in mind and in body.

"That which we call Fate is, compared to divine Providence, what reflection and reason are when measured against perfect knowledge, and as things temporal compared with things eternal, or, again, like the wheel compared with the axle, the axle governing all the wagon. So with the forethought of God; it governeth the firmament and the stars, and maketh the earth to be at rest, and measureth out the four elements, to wit, water, earth, fire, and air. These it keepeth in peace; unto these it giveth form, and again taketh it away, changing them to other forms and renewing them again. It engendereth everything that groweth, and hideth and preserveth it when old and withered, and again bringeth it out and reneweth it when it pleaseth." Some sages, however, say that Fate rules both weal and woe of every man. But I say, as do all Christian men, that it is the divine purpose that rules them, not Fate; and I know that it judges all things very rightly, though unthinking men may not think so. They hold that all are good that work their will, and no wonder, for they are blinded by the darkness of their sins. "But divine Providence understandeth it all most rightly, though we in our folly think it goes awry, being unable to discern what is right. He, however, judgeth all aright, though at times it seems to us otherwise."

THE ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE

Selections

(Translated by J. A. GILES)

A. 443. This year the Britons sent over sea to Rome, and begged for help against the Picts; but they had none, because they were themselves warring against Attila, king of the Huns. And then they sent to the Angles, and entreated the like of the ethelings<sup>1</sup> of the Angles.

A. 444. This year St. Martin died.

A. 449. This year Martianus and Valentinus succeeded to the empire, and reigned seven years. And in their days Hengist and Horsa,<sup>2</sup> invited by Vortigern, king of the Britons, landed in Britain on the shore which is called Wippidsfleet,<sup>3</sup> at first in aid of the Britons, but afterwards they fought against them. King Vortigern gave them land in the south-east of this country, on condition that they should fight against the Picts. Then they fought against the Picts, and had the victory wheresoever they came. They then sent to the Angles; desired a larger force to be sent, and caused them to be told the worthlessness of the Britons, and the excellencies of the land. Then they soon sent thither a larger force in aid of the others. At that time there came men from three tribes in Germany; from the Old-Saxons, from the Angles, from the Jutes. From the Jutes came the Kentish-men and the Wight-warians, that is, the tribe which now dwells in Wight, and that race among the West-Saxons which is still called the race of Jutes. From the Old-Saxons came the men of Essex and Sussex and Wessex. From Anglia which has ever since remained waste betwixt the Jutes and the Saxons, came the men of East Anglia, Middle Anglia, Mercia, and all North-humbria. Their leaders were two brothers, Hengist and Horsa: they were the sons of Wihtgils; Wihtgils son of Witta, Witta of Wecta, Wecta of Woden; from this Woden sprang all our Royal families, and those of the South-humbrians also.

THE DAILY MIRACLE

(From the Homilies, 990-994, translated by P. V. D. SHELLEY)

Many wonders hath God wrought, and daily doth work; but these wonders are much weakened in the sight of men because they are very common. That each day Almighty God feeds all the earth and directs the good, is a greater miracle than was that of feeding five thousand men with five loaves; yet men marvelled at that, not because it was a greater miracle, but because it was uncommon. Who grants fruit to our fields, and increases the harvest from a few grains, but He who multiplied the five loaves? The might was in Christ's hands, and the five loaves were seed, as it were not sown in the earth, but multiplied by Him who wrought the earth.

This miracle is very great and deep in its tokens. Often one sees fair letters written, and praises the writer and the letters, and knows not what they mean. He who has knowledge of letters, praises their fairness, and reads the letters, and understands what they mean. In one way do we view a painting, but in other wise, letters. In the case of the painting, one needs only to see it and praise it; but it is not enough that you look at letters without also reading them and understanding the sense. So is it with the wonder that God wrought with the five loaves; it is not enough that we marvel at the token or praise God for it, unless we also understand its meaning.

Wulfstan

SERMON TO THE ENGLISH

AT THE TIME OF THEIR GREAT SUFFERING FROM THE DANES, THAT IS, IN THE DAYS OF KING AETHELRED.<sup>1</sup>

(Translated by P. V. D. SHELLEY)

Beloved men, know it for sooth, that this world is in haste and neareth the end. Hence in the world is it ever the longer the worse, and so it must needs grow very evil from day to day before the coming of Antichrist, because of the folk's sins; and indeed it will then be fearful and terrible far and wide in the world.

Understand also that the devil hath now for many years led this people too far astray, that there has been little faith among men, though they have spoken fair. Wrong hath reigned too much in the land, and of many men never hath one thought of the remedy as eagerly as he ought; but daily have we heaped evil upon evil, and reared injustice and un-law far too widely throughout the nation. And for this we have also endured many losses and insults, and if we are to expect any mending, then must we merit of God better than we have done ere this, for with great deserving have we earned the miseries that sit upon us, and with very great deserving must we obtain the remedy at God's hands, if things henceforth are to be better. We know full well that a mickle breach needs much mending, and a great fire, much water, if that fire is at all to be quenched. And great also is the need to every man that he willingly keep God's law henceforth better than he did before, and carry out His justice with uprightness.

Among heathen people no man durst hold back little or much of that which by law is due to the worship of idols; but everywhere we withhold God's rights, all too often. Neither among the heathen durst man injure, within or without, any of those things that are brought to the idols and are appointed for sacrifice; but we have clean despoiled God's house within and without. Also, God's servants are everywhere deprived of honor and protection; and some men say that among heathen peoples no man durst in any wise ill treat the servants of idols, as men now too generally do the servants of God, in places where Christians should hold to God's law and protect God's servants.

Sooth is it that I say—we have need of mending, for God's laws have been waning too long within this land on every side, and the folk-laws have become worse, all too much since Edgar died.<sup>2</sup> Sanctuaries are too generally unprotected, and God's houses are too clean bereft of their old rights, and are stripped within of all things befitting. Men of religion have now this long time been greatly despised; widows unlawfully are forced to marry, and too many are made poor and are greatly ill used. Poor men are sore deceived and miserably ensnared, and, though innocent, are sold out of the land into the power of foreigners; through cruel un-law children are enslaved for petty theft; free-right is taken away, and thrall-right curtailed, and alms-right diminished. Freemen cannot command their own persons, nor go where they will, nor do with their own as they wish; nor can thralls have what they possess, though they toiled for it in the time that was theirs, nor that which by God's grace good men have given them as an almsgift for the love of God; but each alms-right which each one in God's grace ought right gladly to perform, he decreaseth or withholdeth, since injustice and love of un-law are too common among men. In a word, God's laws are loathed, and learning is despised; and for this we all often suffer insults through God's anger, as he may understand who can; and the loss will be common to all this people, though men think not so, unless God save.

Certainly it is clear and manifest to us all that hitherto we have more often broken [the law] than bettered it, and hence this nation hath had many set-backs. This long time naught hath availed at home or abroad; there have been harrying and hunger, burning and bloodshed, on every hand often and often; stealing and slaughter, sedition and pestilence, cattle-plague and disease, slander and hate, and rapine of robbers have harmed us greatly; unjust taxes have afflicted us sorely, and often foul weather has spoiled our harvests; because, as it may seem, now for many years in this land there have been much unrighteousness and unstable faith among men everywhere. Often hath a kinsman protected his kinsman no more than a foreigner, nor the father his son, nor at times the son his own father, nor one brother the other. Nor hath any of us ordered his life as he should,—neither those in orders, according to their rule, nor laymen, according to the law; but the lust of crime is all too often a law to us, and we hold not to the learning or law of God or of men as we should. No one hath thought toward the other faithfully as he should, but for the most part each is deceitful and injures others by word and by deed; unrighteously and from behind, each striketh at his fellow with shameful calumnies and accusations; let him do more if he can.

Here in our land is much treachery toward God and the world, and likewise in divers ways traitors too many. Of all treasons in the world the greatest is that a man betray his lord's soul; and a full great treason is that also, that a man betray his lord's life or drive him living from the land; and both have been present in this realm. Edward<sup>3</sup> was betrayed, then murdered, and after that burned, and Aethelred<sup>4</sup> was driven from the land. Gossips<sup>5</sup> and god-children too many have been slain throughout this people, besides others all too many, who, without fault, have been destroyed. Too many holy places, far and wide, have perished, because certain men were lodged there, as they would not have been, if we had wished to know reverence for God's peace. Christian folk too many have been sold all the while out of this land. All this is loathsome to God, let him believe it who will. . . . Also we know full well whence hath come the evil that a father sell his son for a price, and the son his mother, and one brother the other, into the power of strangers outside this nation. All these are mickle and terrible deeds, as he may understand who will; and there are yet greater and more manifold that afflict this people. Many are forsworn and greatly purjured; pledges are broken again and again;

and it is clear in this land that God's wrath sits heavily upon us,—let him who can, understand.

Lo, how can greater shame come upon men through God's wrath than cometh upon us, for our own deserts? Though a thrall escape from his lord and leave Christendom to become a Viking, and it come about afterward that thane and thrall come together in battle, if the thrall foully slay the thane, the thane for all his relations must lie without wer-geld, and if the thane foully kill the thrall whom he formerly owned, he must pay the wer-geld of a thane.<sup>6</sup> Full evil laws and shameful tribute are, through God's wrath, common to us, as he who can may understand; and many misfortunes beset this people. This long time nothing hath prospered within or without, but harrying and hatred have been continual on every side. The English have now long been without victory, and too greatly dismayed, through God's anger; and the ship-men<sup>7</sup> have become so strong, with God's consent, that in battle one of them will often put to flight ten of us, sometimes less, sometimes more, all because of our sins. . . . Often a thrall bindeth the thane who was formerly his lord, and maketh him a thrall, through God's anger. Alas for the misery, alas for the shame in the eyes of the world, that Englishmen now suffer, all by God's wrath! Often two or three seamen will drive a crowd of Christian men from sea to sea through the nations, huddled together, to the shame of us all in the sight of the world,—if in earnest we knew any shame or even would rightly understand. And all the misery that we continually suffer we repay with honor to them that shame us. We pay geld<sup>8</sup> to them continually, and they abuse us daily. They harry, they burn, they spoil and plunder, and carry off to the ships; and lo, what else in these troubles is clear and manifest but God's wrath towards this people?

No wonder misfortune is upon us, for we know full well that now for many years men have seldom reeked what they wrought in word or deed; but this nation hath become, as it may appear, very sinful, through manifold sins and misdeeds, through murder and evil, through greed and covetousness, rapine and robbery, treachery and heathen vices, through treason and deceit, through law-breaking and sedition, through attacks on kinsmen, through manslaughter and violation of religious vows, through adultery and incest and divers forni-cations. Also, as we said before, through oath-breaking and pledge-breaking, and through divers falsehoods, more than should be are ruined and forsworn. Breaches of the peace and of fasting are wrought again and again.
Also here in the land are reprobate apostates and hostile persecutors of the Church, and cruel tyrants, all too many; despisers of divine law and Christian customs; and everywhere in the nation foolish mockers, most often of those things commanded by God's ministers, and very often of those things that belong of right to God's law. Therefore hath now come about the wide-spread evil custom that men are more ashamed of good deeds than of misdeeds, for men too often deride good deeds, and all too much revile the pious, and blame and greet with contumely those who love right and have in any measure the fear of God. Because men despise all that they ought to praise and continually loathe what they should love, all too many are brought to evil thoughts and deeds, so that they are not ashamed though they sin greatly and work in all things against God himself; but because of idle calumnies they are ashamed to better their misdeeds, as books teach,—like those fools who for their pride will not save themselves before that time when they cannot though they would. . . .

An historian there was in the time of the Britons, Gildas<sup>9</sup> by name, who wrote of their misdeeds, how by their sins they so greatly angered God that He very soon let the army of the English win their land and entirely destroyed the flower of the Britons. This, he said, came about because the clergy broke their vows, and laymen the law, because of plundering by the rich, extortion, evil laws of princes, false judgments; because of the sloth and ignorance of bishops, and the wicked cowardice of God's ministers, who all too often were silent concerning the truth, and mumbled within 10 their jaws when they should have called out. Through foul wantonness of the folk, through gluttony and manifold sins, they ruined their land, and themselves perished.

But let us do, as is needful for us,—take 15 warning by such. Sooth is it that I say, worse deeds we know have been among the English than we have heard of anywhere among the Britons, and therefore have we great need to reflect and to reconcile ourselves to God. Let 20 us do as we have need to do, turn to the right and in some measure shun and forsake unrighteousness, and eagerly better what we have heretofore broken. Let us seek Christ on our knees and often call upon Him with trembling heart and earn His mercy. Let us love God and fulfill God's laws, and perform eagerly what we promised when we received baptism, or those promised who at baptism spoke for 5 us. Let us rightly order words and works, and willingly cleanse our inner thoughts, carefully keep oath and pledge, and without weakness have some faith amongst us. Let us often consider the great judgment we shall all come 10 to, and eagerly save ourselves from the raging fire of hell's torment, and earn for us the glory and the gladness that God hath prepared for those who work His will in the world. May God help us. Amen.

II. THE NORMAN CONQUEST TO CHAUCER

(Before 1200)

I am now older than I was, in winters and in lore,
 I wield more power than I did, my wit ought to be more.
 Too long a child I have been, in word and eke
 in deed;
 And though I am in winters old, too young I am in rede.<sup>2</sup>
 My life methinks a useless one, like that I've ever led; 5
 When I bethink me well thereon, full sore I am adread.
 Mere idleness and childishness seems most that I have done;
 Full late I have bethought myself, unless God's grace I've won.
 I've spoken many idle words since I to speak knew how,
 And many deeds I did in youth that I repent me now. 10
 All too often have I sinned in work and eke in word;
 All too much, alas, I've spent, too little laid in hoard.
 At most of that I liked of yore I now can only grieve;
 Who overmuch doth have his will, himself doth but deceive.
 I might in truth have better done, had I of joy great wealth; 15
 And now I would, and yet cannot, for age and for unhealth.
 Old age on me hath stolen fast, before of it I wist;
 Nor can I see before me now for dark smoke and for mist.
 Fearful are we to do good, in evil all too bold;
 More in awe of man is man than of the Christ of old. 20
 Who doth not well the while he may, full oft it shall him rue,
 When men at last shall surely reap that which they ere did strew.

Layamon

HOW LAYAMON WROTE HIS BOOK

(From the Brut,<sup>1</sup> c. 1205)

In the land lived a priest, who was Layamon called,
 He was Leovenath's son; Lord to him be gracious,

He abided at Arnley, at the great Church there Upon Severn's side, (it seemed to him good there)

Hard by to Radestone, where he read bookès. 5
 It came in his mind, and he made it his purpose,
 To tell of the English, the triumphs of old;
 What names the men had, what lands they were come from;

What folk English-land first of all ownèd
 After the deluge that down from the Lord came 10

Which quellèd<sup>2</sup> all men that quick here it foundèd,

Except Noah and Shem, Japhet and Ham,
 And their four wives who were in the ark with
 them.

So 'gan Layamon wander wide 'mongst the people,

And noble books got he for guides in his labours. 15

That English book took he, made by Saint Bæda;

Another in Latin, left by Saint Albin,
 And the bless'd Austin,<sup>3</sup> who baptism brought us;

A third he took likewise, and laid it among
 them,

That a French clerk had made,—Wace was he callèd, 20

This goodly writing he gave to the noble
 Eleanor, of Henry, that high King, his Queen.
 Layamon laid these books down, their leaves he turned over,

With love he looked on them, the Lord grant him mercy,

Feather<sup>4</sup> took he with fingers, and fair on the book-skin 25

The sooth words then wrote he, and set them
 together,

And these three writings he wrought into one.

Now Layamon prayeth for the Lord's love
 Almighty,

Each wise man who readeth words in this book written,

And heedeth this teaching, that these holy wordès 30

He say all together:

For the soul of his father, who forth him
 broughtèd,

(c. 1215-1220)

Now, brother Walter, brother mine
 After the flesh's kind,
 And brother mine in Christendom
 Through baptism and through truth,
 And brother mine eke in God's house, 5
 Once more, in a third way,
 Since that we two have taken both
 One book of rules to follow.
 Under the canons' rank and life
 So as Saint Austin<sup>2</sup> set; 10
 I now have done even as thou bad'st,
 Forwarding to thy will,
 I now have turned into English
 The Gospel's holy lore, 15
 After that little wit that me
 My Lord and God has lent.
 Thou thoughtest how that it might well
 To mickle profit turn,
 If English folk, for love of Christ, 20
 It readily would learn
 And follow it, fulfilling it
 With thought, with word, with deed,
 And therefore yearnedst thou that I
 This work for thee should work;
 And I have forwarded it for thee, 25
 And all through help of Christ. . . .
 And since the holy gospel book
 All this goodness shows us,
 This sevenfold good that Christ to us
 Did grant through His great love, 30
 For this 'tis meet all Christian folk
 Should follow gospel's lore.
 And therefore have I rendered it
 Into English speech,
 Because I wished most earnestly 35
 That all good English folk
 With ear should hearken unto it,
 With heart should truly believe,
 With tongue should ever tell of it,
 In deed should follow it, 40
 To win through Christ in Christendom
 The soul's salvation true.
 And God almighty give us might
 And wish and wit and will
 To follow well this English book 45
 That is all holy lore,
 So that we may full worthy be
 To know high heaven's bliss.

Amen. Amen. Amen.

I that in English this have set,
 Englishmen to teach, 50
 At the time when I was christened,

(Before 1226)

A maid of Christ entreateth me
 That I for her a love-rune write
 By which most plainly she may see
 The way to choose a faithful knight;
 One that to her shall loyal be 5
 And guard and keep her by his might.
 Never will I deny her plea,
 To teach her this be my delight.

Maiden, thou mayest well behold
 How this world's love is but a race 10
 Beset with perils manifold
 Fickle and ugly, weak and base.
 Those noble knights that once were bold
 As breath of wind pass from their place,
 Under the mold now lie they cold, 15
 Wither like grass and leave no trace.

There's none so rich, nor none so free,
 But that he soon shall hence away.
 Nothing may ever his warrant be,
 Gold, nor silver, nor ermine gay. 20
 Though swift, his end he may not flee,
 Nor shield his life for a single day.
 Thus is this world, as thou may'st see,
 Like to the shadow that glides away.

This world all passes as the wind,
 When one thing comes, another flies;
 What was before, is now behind;
 What was held dear, we now despise.
 Therefore he does as doth the blind
 That in this world would claim his prize. 30
 This world decays, as ye may find;
 Truth is put down and wrong doth rise.

The love that may not here abide,
 Thou dost great wrong to trust to now;
 E'en so it soon shall from thee glide, 35
 'Tis false, and brittle, and slight, I trow,
 Changing and passing with every tide,
 While it lasts it is sorrow enow;
 At end, man wears not robe so wide
 But he shall fall as leaf from bough. 40

Paris and Helen, where are they
 That were so bright and fair of face?

<sup>1</sup> A love poem, writing, or counsel.

Amadas, Tristram, did they stay,
Or Iseult with her winsome grace?
Could mighty Hector death delay,
Or Cæsar, high in pride of place?
They from this earth have slipped away
As sheaf from field, and left no trace.

They are as though they never were,
Of them are many wonders said,
And it is pity for to hear
How these were slain with tortures dread,
And how alive they suffered here;
Their heat is turned to cold instead,
Thus doth the world but false appear,
The foolish trust it,—lo! 'tis sped.

For though a mighty man he were
As Henry, England's king by birth,
Though he as Absalom were fair,
Whose peer lived not in all the earth,
Yet of his pride he's soon stripped bare,
At last he'll fetch not a herring's worth,
Maid, if thou mak'st true love thy care
I'll show thee a love more true than earth.

Ah! maiden sweet, if thou but knew
All the high virtues of this knight!
He is fair and bright of hue,
Mild, with face of shining light,
Meet to be loved and trusted too,
Gracious, and wise beyond man's sight,
Nor through him wilt thou ever rue,
If thou but trust in his great might.

He is the strongest in the land;
As far as man can tell with mouth,
All men lie beneath his hand,
East, and West, and North, and South;
Henry, King of Engelland,
He holds of him and to him boweth
His messenger, at his command,
His love declares, his truth avow'th.

Speak'st thou of buildings raised of old,
Wrought by the wise king Solomon,
Of jasper, sapphires, and fine gold,
And of many another stone?
His home is fairer by many fold
Than I can tell to any one;
'Tis promised, maid, to thee of old,
If thou wilt take him for thine own.

It stands upon foundations sound,
So built that they shall never fall;
Nor miner sap them underground,
Nor shock e'er shake the eternal wall;
Cure for each wound therein is found,
Bliss, joy and song, fill all that hall.
The joys that do therein abound
Are thine, thou may'st possess them all.

There friend from friend shall never part,
There every man shall have his right;
No hate is there, no angry heart,
Nor any envy, pride or spite;
But all shall with the angels play

In peace and love in heavenly light.
Are they not, maid, in a good way,
Who love and serve our Lord aright?

No man may Him ever see
As He is in all His might,
And without pure bliss may be
When he knows the Lord of light.
With Him all is joy and glee,
He is day without a night.
Will he not most happy be
Who may bide with such a knight?

This writing, maiden, that I send,
Open it, break seal and read;
Wide unroll, its words attend,
Learn without book each part with speed.
Then straight to other maidens wend
And teach it them to meet their need;
Whoso shall learn it to the end
In sooth 'twill stand him in good stead.

And when thou sittest sorrowing,
Draw forth the scroll I send thee here,
And with sweet voice its message sing,
And do its bidding with good cheer.
To thee this does His greeting bring;
Almighty God would have thee near;
He bids thee come to His wedding,
There where he sits in Heaven's high sphere.

THE OWL AND THE NIGHTINGALE<sup>1</sup> (c. 1216-1225)

Once within a summer's dale,
In a very secret vale,
Heard I 'gainst each other rail
Hoary Owl and Nightingale.
That strife was stiff, and stark, and strong,
Now 'twas soft, now loud it rung,
And each bird would the other flout,
And all the evil mood let out;
And each said of the other's way
The very worst she knew to say;
Indeed, about each other's song
The strife they waged was very strong.

The Nightingale began the speech
From her corner in a beech:
She sat upon a pleasant bough,
Blossoms about there were enow,
Where in a thick and lonely hedge,
Mingled soft shoots and greenest sedge.
She, gladdened by the bloomy sprays,
Varied her song in many ways.
Rather it seemed the joy I heard
Of harp or pipe than song of bird.
Such strains, methought, must rather float
From harp or pipe than feathered throat.

<sup>1</sup> This poem and the following are examples of a popular poetic mode in the middle ages, i. e. debates or disputes. In The Owl and the Nightingale, the two birds are represented as disputing over their respective modes of life. The poem has a broad human interest, as the two birds express two opposing ideals of life: the nightingale that of the refined, joyous, pleasure-lover; the owl, that of the ascetic. The birds submit their case at last to the judgment of Nicholas of Guildford, whom some suppose to be the author of the poem.

Then, from a trunk that stood hard-by,
The Owl in turn made her reply,
O'er it the ivy grew apace;
There made the Owl her dwelling-place.

The Nightingale, who saw her plain,
Surveyed the bird with high disdain,
Filled with contempt she viewed the Owl,
Whom all men loathsome deem and foul.
"Monster," she cried, "take wings and flee,
I am the worse for sight of thee,
Truly, at thy black looks of yore
Full oft my song I've given o'er;
My tongue grows weak, my courage flies
When you appear before mine eyes,
I'm more inclined to spit than sing
At sound of thy harsh sputtering."

The Owl abode till it grew late.
Eve came, she could no longer wait;
Her heart began to swell and strain
Till scarce she could her breath contain.
Half choked with rage, these words she flung:
"What think'st thou now about my song?
Think'st thou in song I have no skill
Merely because I cannot trill?
Often to wrath thou movest me,
And dost abuse me shamefully.
If in my claws I held thee fast,—
And so, mayhap, I shall at last,—
And thou wert down from off thy spray
Then should'st thou sing another way."

Then made the Nightingale reply:
"If I avoid the open sky,
And shield myself in places bare,
Nothing for all thy threats I care;
While in my hedge secure I sit,
I reck not of your threats a whit.
I know you cruel to devour
All helpless things within your power,
Wreaking your wrath in evil way
On smaller birds where'er you may.
Hated of all the feathered rout,
The birds combine to drive you out;
Shrieking and scolding after you,
They hard upon your flight pursue.
The tit-mouse, if she had her will,
Would tease you and would wound you ill.
Hateful to look upon thou art

In many ways, and every part;
Thy body's short, thy neck is small,
Thy head is greater far than all;
Thine eyes coal-black are staring wide
As though with woad they had been dyed;
You stare as though you'd like to bite
Each thing your cruel claws could smite;
Just like an awl that has been crooked,
Your bill is stiff and sharp and hooked,
With it you hoot both oft and long,
This passes with you for a song.
You threaten me, longing to clasp
My flesh and crush me in your grasp;
More fit for thee would be a frog,
That sits beneath the mill-wheel's cog,
Or snails, and mice, and creatures foul,—
Such are the sort fit for an Owl.
By day you sit, by night take wing,
Knowing you are an eerie thing;

25 That thou art loathsome and unclean
From thine own nest is plainly seen,
And also by thy foul young brood,
Which thou dost feed on foulest food."

30 [After a prolonged controversy, the Nightingale speaks again:]

"Owl," she said, "why dost thou so? 411
Thou sing'st in winter welawo!
Thou sing'st as doth a hen in snow,
35 And all she sings is but for woe:
Thou sing'st in winter's wrath and gloom, 415
In summer thou art ever dumb.
It is but for thy foolish spite
That thou with us canst not be bright;
40 For thee consuming envy burns
When to the land our bliss returns. 420
Thou'rt like some cross-grained, crabbed wight,
Who turns black looks on each delight,
Ready to grudge it, and to lower
If men are happy for an hour;
46 He wishes rather to espy 425
The tears of grief in each man's eye,
Let the mob fight, he does not care
Though each man pulls the other's hair.
50 E'en so thou dost upon thy side,
For when the snow lies thick and wide, 430
And every creature has his sorrow,
Thou sing'st from night-fall till the morrow.
But I, all bliss with me doth wake,
55 Each heart is gladder for my sake,
All live in joy when I am here, 435
All wait for me to reappear.
The blossom 'gins to spring and sprede
Upon the tree and on the mede,
60 The lily, with her face of snow,
Welcometh me, as well you know, 440
And bids me, with her aspect fair,
To fly to her, and greet her there.
So too, with ruddy face, the rose,
65 That from the thorny briar grows,
Bids me to sing in bush and grove, 445
A joyous carol for her love."

THE DEBATE OF THE BODY AND THE SOUL<sup>1</sup>

(13th Century)

As once I lay in winter's night,
Sunk deep in sleep before the day,
75 Methought I saw a wondrous sight;
Upon a bier a body lay.
It once had been a wilful Knight, 5
Scant service he to God did pay;
Clean lost had he his life's light,
80 The ghost was out and must away.

When the ghost it needs must go,
It turned aside and near it stood; 10
Beheld the body it came fro
85 Most sorrowful in frightened mood.

<sup>1</sup> The poem is a controversial dialogue between the body and the soul, the warring parts of man's nature which St. Paul speaks of as "the flesh" and "the spirit." In Prof. Kittredge's opinion this poem is incomparably the best embodiment of the theme that can be found in any literature.

It said: "Woe! woe! and welawoe!
Woe worth thy flesh, thy foulè blood,
Wretched body, why liest thou so
That wert but now so wild and wode?"<sup>2</sup>

"Thou that once wert wont to ride
High on horse with head un-bowed,
Famed for prowess far and wide,
As a lion fierce and proud,
Where is all thy mighty pride,
And thy voice that rang so loud,
Why dost thou there all naked bide,
Stitched within that wretched shroud?"

"Where is now thy broidered weed,
Thy sumpters,<sup>3</sup> bearing thy rich bed?
Thy palfreys and thy battle-steed
Which at thy side thy Squire led?
Thy crying hawks of chosen breed,
And the hounds that thou hast fed?
Methinks, God reckes not of thy need,
For all thy friends are from thee fled."

"Where are thy castles and thy towers,
Thy chambers and thy stately halls,
Painted with many-coloured flowers,
And thy richè robès all?
Thy downy quilts and covertures,
Thy sendals<sup>4</sup> and thy purple palls?
Wretch! full dark is now thy bower,
To-morrow thou therein shalt fall!" . . . . 40

Now when the ghost with gruesome cheer<sup>5</sup> 49
Thus had made his mournful moan,
The corpse, stretched stark upon the bier,—
A ghastly thing thus left alone,—
Its head and neck did strait uprear;
As a sick thing it 'gan to groan,
And said: "Where art thou now, my fere,<<sup>6</sup> 55
My ghost, that quite art from me gone?"

"God shaped thee in His image fair,
And gave to thee both wit and skill;
He trusted me unto thy care
To guide according to thy will.
In witchcrafts foul I had no share,
Nor wist I what was good nor ill,
But like dumb beast thy yoke I bare
And as thou bad'st I must fulfill."

"Placed thy pleasures to fulfill,
Both at even and at morn,
I was in thy keeping still
From the time that thou wast born.
Thou, that knewest good and ill,
Surely should'st have judged befor
Of my pride, my foolish will;
Now alone thou liest forlorn."

The ghost it said: "Body, be still,
Where learned'st thou this moral air?
Givest thou me harsh words and ill
And liest like swollen wine-skin there?"

Thinkest thou, wretch, though thou shalt fill
15 With thy foul flesh a noisome lair,
That from the deeds thou didest ill
Thou shalt be freed, nor judgment bear? 80

"Thinkest now thy rest to win
Where thou liest rotting in the clay?
20 Though thou be rotten bone and skin,
And blowen with the wind away,
Yet limb and joint thou shalt come in 85
Again to me on doomsday,
Together we shall pass within
To Court, to take our bitter pay."

"You to my sway did God commit,
But when you thought on evil deed, 90
Hard in your teeth you held the bit,
And did all things that I forbade.
30 Sin you obeyed, you drew to it,
To ease, and shame, and lust, and greed;
I fought you hard with strength and wit, 95
But aye you followed your own rede. . . .

"I bade you mind your spirit's need; 105
But matins, mass, and evensong
You put aside for other deed,
And called them vain, with foolish tongue.
To wood and field you chose to speed,
Or run to Court to do men wrong; 110
Except for pride or greater meed
Small good you did your whole life long." . . . 112

The Body, answering, said its say: 137
"O Soul! thou hast done wrong in this,
All the blame on me to lay,
Now thou hast lost the highest bliss. 140
Where did I go, by wood or way,
Where sat, or stood, or did amiss,
But 'neath thine eye I went each day;
Well knowest thou the truth of this. . . . 144

"I should have been but as the sheep, 161
Or like the dumb and herded kine,
That eat, and drink, and sprawl, and sleep,
And passed my pain—like slaughtered swine;
Gold had I never cared to keep, 165
Nor known that water was not wine,
Nor been thrust down to hell's black deep,
But for thee,—Soul,—the fault was thine."

The ghost replied: "There is no doubt
Thy part was always me to bear: 170
Needs must this be, I was without
Or hand or foot wert thou not there:
Save as thou carriedst me about
I could do naught, nor least act share;
I must before thee bend devout, 175
To do aught else I did not dare."

"Of one woman born and bred,
Body, thou and I were twain;
Together fostered fair and fed
Till thou couldst walk and speak thee plain; 180

<sup>5</sup> Expression.

Thee gently, moved by love, I led,
Nor dared I ever give thee pain.
To lose thee was my sorest dread,
Knowing I'd get no more again.

"I saw you fair in flesh and blood, 185
And all my love to you I gave;
That you should thrive methought was good,
Soft ease and rest I let you have;
This wrought in you rebellious mood,
You rushed to sin as impious drave; 190
To fight against you did no good
You bore me with you as your slave. . . 192

"Well warned wert thou of this before, 201
And told we both should judgment have;
All this you scorned as foolish lore,
Yet watched thy kin go down to grave.
Thou didst all that the world thee bade, 205
Each thing thy eager flesh might crave,
And I allowed it (I was mad!),
Thou wert the master, I the slave."

[The Body speaks]

"Thinkest thou, Ghost, thou gainest aught
To quit thee from thy blame withal, 210
By saying that thou, so nobly wrought,
Wast forced to serve me as my thrall?
Nothing I did and nothing sought,
Ne'er plundered, stole, ne'er sinned at all,
But first in thee arose the thought. 215
Abide it who abide it shall!

"How wist I what was wrong or right,
What to take, what cast away,
Save as thou brought'st it to my sight, 219
Thou o'er whom wisdom should bear sway?
Thus, trained by you in base delight,
Companion of your pleasures gay,
Then did I ill with all my might,
Once more to have my wicked way.

"But haddest thou,—Christ grant 'twere true,— 225
Given me hunger, thirst, and cold,
And taught me good that no good knew,
When I in evil was so bold,
Then, what I learned in youth from you,
I had held fast when I was old; 230
You let me North and South roam through,
And take my pleasures uncontrolled." . . . 232

Then wept the ghost most bitterly, 249
"Body, alas, alas!" (it said).
"That e'er of old I loved thee!
Lost was the love I on thee stayed;
Falsely you feigned a love for me,
And me a house of glass you made;
I gave you pleasures trustfully, 255
You, traitor, still my trust betrayed. . . .

"No longer, Body, may I dwell, 352
No longer stand to speak with thee;
Now I hear the hell-hounds yell,
And fiendés more than man may see; 355

They come to fetch me down to hell,
No whither may I from them flee;
And thou shalt come with flesh and fell
At doomsday to dwell with me."

Almost before the words were said, 360
That told it wist where it must go,
Burst in at once in sudden raid
A thousand devils and yet mo.
And when they once had on him laid
Their savage claws, they tare him so 365
He was in torment, sore afraid,
Tossed, tugged and touselled to and fro.

For they were shaggy, shock-haired, tailed,
With bulgy bumps upon the back, 369
Their claws were sharp, they were long-nailed,
No limb there was but showed some lack.
The ghost was right and left assailed
By many a devil foul and black;
Crying for mercy naught availed
When God his vengeance due must take. . . . 375

Instead of colt for him to ride, 399
Straightway a curséd devil came,
That grisly grinned and yawned wide
Out from his throat flared tongues of flame.
The saddle on his back and side
Was stuck with pikes to pierce and maim,
'Twas as a heckle to bestride, 405
And all a-glow with scorching flame.

Upon that saddle was he slung,
As though to ride in tournament;
A hundred devils on him hung,
Hither and thither him they sent; 410
He with hot spears was pierced and stung,
And sore with hooks of iron rent;
At every stroke the sparkles sprung
As they from blazing brand were sent.

When he the ride had ridden at last, 415
Fast to that fearful saddle bound,
As hunted fox he down was cast,
The worrying hell-hounds close him round,
They rend him, trembling and aghast,
And harry him towards hell's dark bound; 420
A man might trace the way they passed
By blood-stains on the trampled ground.

They bid him then his horn to blow,
To urge on Bauston and Bevis,
His hounds, well wont his call to know, 425
For they would shortly sound the pris.<sup>8</sup>
A hundred devils, in a row,
Drag him with ropes toward the abyss,
The loathly flames are seen below,
The mouth of hell it was, I wis. 430

When once that dread abode is won,
The fiends set up so loud a yell

<sup>7</sup> Heckle. An instrument consisting of a board in which are inserted sharp spikes used for dressing flax or hemp, by splitting and straightening the fibres. See Burns' Address to the Toothache.

<sup>8</sup> The note of the horn blown at the taking of the deer; used in hunting. French prendre.

That earth it opens up anon;
 Smother and smoke rise from that cell,
 Both of foul pitch and of brimstone, 435
 Men five miles off can smell that smell;
 Woe grips and holds that wretched one
 Who scents from far that scent of hell.

The foulè fiends, with eager grin,
 Seize on the soul, and, whirling it, 440
 With might and main they hurl it in,
 Down, down, into the devil's pit;
 Then, they themselves plunge straight therein,
 To darkness with no sunshine lit,
 Earth closes on that house of sin, 445
 The dungeon-doors shut fast on it.

When they had gone, that loathsome brood,
 To hell's black pit, ere it was day,
 On every hair the sweat-drops stood
 For fright and fear as there I lay: 450
 To Jesus Christ, in chasted mood,
 Yearning I cried,—and dreaded aye
 That those fierce fiends so foul and lewd,
 Would come to carry me away.

Then thanked I Him who passed death's gate,
 Who unto man such mercy bore, 456
 My shield 'gainst many an evil fate,
 And felt my sins as ne'er before.
 All ye who sin, I charge you straight
 To shrive you and repent you sore; 460
 For sin was never sinned so great
 That Christ's wide mercy was not more.

Robert of Gloucester

IN PRAISE OF ENGLAND

(From Riming Chronicle,<sup>1</sup> c. 1300)

England is a right good land, I ween of all the best.
 Set it is at the world's end, afar within the west,
 And all about it goes the sea, it standeth as an isle.
 Its foes it thus needs fear the less, except it be through guile
 On part of folk of its own land, as hath been seen erstwhile. 5
 From North to South it stretcheth out in length
 eight hundred mile,
 Two hundred miles from East to West in breadth the land extends;—
 In the mid-land, that is to say, and not as at one end.
 Plenty one may in Engéland of all good thinges
 see;
 If only folk will spoil them not, or other worse years be. 10
 For Engéland is full enough of fruit and eke of treen,<sup>2</sup>

Of woodès and of parkès most joyful to be seen;
 Of fowls and of beastès, both wild and tame
 alsó;
 Of salt fish and of fresh fish, of rivers fair thereto;
 Of wells both sweet and cold enough, of pasture and of mead; 15
 Of ore of silver and of gold, of tin and eke of lead;
 Of steel, of iron, and of brass, of coin in great plenty;
 Of wheat and eke of wool, so good none better
 may there be.
 Waters it hath enough alsó; before all others
 three,
 As arms are these out of the land, and reaching to the sea. 20
 By them the ships may come from sea and out their way may trace,
 And bring inland enough of goods, to well nigh
 every place.
 Severn, and Thames, and Humber, so these three rivers stand;
 And in the midst, as hath been said, there lyeth
 the pure land.

NORMAN AND ENGLISH

(From the same)

Thus came, lo Engéland into Normandy's
 hand,
 And the Normans could speak then naught but their own speech,
 And spoke French as at home, and their children did teach,
 So high men of this land, that of Norman blood
 come,
 Keep them all to that speech that they had at their home. 5
 If a man know not French, small store men by him set,
 But low men hold to English and to their own speech yet.
 I ween that there beeth in the world countries
 none
 That hold not to their own speech but England alone.
 And well do I wot to know both well it is, 10
 For the more a man knows the more worth he is.

Robert Manning, of Brunne

IN PRAISE OF WOMAN

(From Handlyng Synne,<sup>1</sup> c. 1303)

Nothing is to man so dear
 As woman's love in good manére.

<sup>1</sup> The Riming Chronicle is a metrical history of England from the earliest and mythical period to the latter part of the 13th century. Robert, who was presumably a monk in the Abbey of Gloucester, probably wrote only the latter part of the poem. The entire work is more than 12,000 lines in length.

<sup>1</sup> A poem of over 12,000 lines, treating of the Ten Commandments, the Seven Deadly Sins, the Seven Sacraments and other religious themes. The author enlivens his doctrinal instructions with appropriate stories, for he says he has made his poem for those who love to hear stories over their ale, and who are prone to fall into sin.

A good womán is manès bliss,
 When her love right and steadfast is.
 No solace is there 'neath the sky,
 Of all that man may name or try,
 That man to joy so greatly moves
 As a good woman that truly loves.
 Nor dearer is none in all God's herd
 Than a chaste woman with lovely word.

(c. 1320-1325)

THE PROLOGUE

Man yearneth rimes for to hear,
 And romances of strange mattére,
 Of Alisaundere<sup>2</sup> the conquerour,
 Of Julius Caesar the emperour,
 Of Greece and Troy the strangé strife
 Where many thousand lost their life;
 Of Brut, that hero bold of hand,
 First conquerour of Engéland;
 Of King Arthour that was so rike<sup>3</sup>
 Whom no one in his time was like;
 Of wonders that his knights befell
 Adventures many as I've heard tell,
 As Gawain, Kay, and others stable,
 For they were men of the Round Table;
 How Charles and Roland waged their fight,
 With Sarcens they no troth would plight;
 Of Tristrem and his dear Ysote
 How he for her became a sote;<sup>4</sup>
 Of Joneck and of Ysambrase,
 Of Ydoine and of Amadase,
 Stories alsó of sundry things,
 Of princes, prelates, and of kings,
 Many songs of storied rime,
 English, Frankish, and Latine.
 To read and hear each one is prest
 Of whatsoe'er he likes the best;
 The wise man will of wisdom hear,
 The fool to folly draws him near;
 The wrong to hear of right is loath,
 And pride with buxomness<sup>5</sup> is wroth. . . .

But by the fruit the wise may see
 Of what vertú is every tree.
 All sorts of fruit that man shall find
 Must draw from out the root their kind;
 From goodly pear-trees come good pears,
 Worse tree, the worse the fruit it bears.
 That I should speak from this same tree
 Betokens, man, both me and thee;
 This fruit betokens all our deeds,
 Both good and ill who rightly reads.
 Our dedés in our hearts take root,
 Whether they be for bale or boot;
 For by the thing man draweth untó
 For good or ill men shall him know. . . .

<sup>1</sup> The poem is named from the fact that in its stories it "courses" pretty much over the world, as is indicated in the Prologue. It is about 30,000 lines, and it was written in English "for the love of English folk."

<sup>2</sup> This list includes some of the most important groups or cycles of romance. Those on Alexander, on Brut or Brutus, the supposed founder of Britain, on Arthur and his knights, on Charlemagne, and on Roland.

All this world, ere I have done, 121
 With Christ's help shall I over-run,
 And tell some stories principal,
 For no man may relate them all.
 But since no work may long endure 125
 That stands not on foundation sure,
 This same work, therefore, shall I found
 Upon a wondrous, steadfast, ground;
 That is the Holy Trinity
 That all has wrought with His beauty. 130
 Unto Him first I turn my face,
 And then His handywork I'll trace:
 Of the angels first that fell,
 And next I will of Adam tell,
 Of his offspring and of Noé, 135
 And somewhat of his sonnès three;
 Of Abraham and of Isáac,
 That holy were withouten make;<sup>6</sup>
 After shall I tell to you
 Of Jacob and of Esau too; 140
 Then should there be thereafter told
 How that Joséph was bought and sold;
 How Moses 'midst the Jews arose,
 That Goddès folk to lead them chose;
 How God the law to him did give 145
 By which the Jewish folk should live.
 Of Saul the king, and David too
 How he Goliath fought and slew;
 And next of Solomon the Wise,
 How craftily he did justice; 150
 How Christ came down through prophecy,
 And how He came His folk to buy.

[The author next goes on to enumerate various other matters of which he proposes to treat, such as the birth of Christ, the destruction of the innocents, the flight into Egypt, and so on through the gospel story. After this outline of the general plan and scope of his work he concludes his prologue as follows:—]

These are the subjects put in place 221
 I think within this book to trace;
 Speaking but shortly of each deed,
 For there are many tales to speed.
 Useful, methinks, it were to man 225
 To know himself how he began;
 How he at first was born and bred,
 How o'er the earth his offspring spread;
 Both of the first and of the last,
 And in what course this world is past. 230
 Those things that Holy Church doth state
 In this same book I now translate.
 In English tongue 'tis all made clear
 For love of all the English here;
 English folk of Engéland, 235
 For the commons to understand.
 French rimes are there in this land
 To be found on every hand;
 French is wrought for Frankish man,
 What is for him that no French can? 240
 The nation of England old
 The Englishmen in common hold;
 The speech that man with most may speed

<sup>6</sup> Without an equal.

Must be the speech that men most need.

Seldom was by any chance

Praised the English tongue in France;

Do we the same to their language

Methinks we do them no outrage.

For unlearned Englishman I spell,

That understandeth what I tell,

And specially I those address

That all their lives in idleness

On trifles waste and beggars' lies,

To them I say: "Take care, be wise,

And well unto my words attend,

And all your way with might amend."

Ill have they who in spending spend,

And find no fruit thereof at end. . . .

Now from this prologue we will blinne,<sup>7</sup>

And in Christ's name our book begin:

Cursor o'World men ought it call,

For almost it o'er runs it all.

Take we our beginning than<sup>8</sup>

From Him who all the world began.

THE INFANT

(From The Pricke of Conscience,<sup>1</sup> c. 1340)

[When man] was born to this world's light,

He had not either strength or might,

Either to walk or yet to stand,

Nor to creep with foot and hand.

Then has the man less might than beast;

When he is born, he seems the least;

For a beast, when it is born, may go

And run soon after to and fro;

But a man has no might thereto,

When he is born, such things to do;

For then he may not stand nor creep,

But only sprawl and cry and weep.

For a child is scarcely born before

It has begun to cry and roar;

And by that cry men tell truly

Whether it man or woman be.

When it is born it cries such way:

For if it be man it says "a, a,"

So that the letter is the same

As the first in Father Adam's name.

And if the child a woman be,

When it is born it says "e, e,"

E is the foremost letter in

Eve's name, who brought us death and sin.

Hence a clerk made in this manere,

This line in metre written here:

Dicentes E vel A quotquot nascuntur ab Eva, 490

"All those," he says, "that come of Eve,

Means all men that below here live,

When they are born, what-so they be,

<sup>1</sup> A Poem of about 10,000 lines is addressed to the unlearned "that can ne Latyne understand," and is intended by its dreadful pictures of death and judgment, to prick the reader's conscience, so that he may "work good works and flee folly."

They either say "a, a," or "e, e,"

And thus here we find the starting

Of our weeping and life's smarting,

Unto this have sorrows brought us,

Therefore Innocent has taught us:

Omnes nascimur eulantes, ut nature nostre

miseriam exprimamus.

He says: "We all are born complaining,

We cry, and wail—man's sorrow feigning,

To show the misery, how great

The wretchedness of man's estate."

Thus when the time came of our birth,

All made sorrow and no mirth;

Naked we hither came, and bare,

And just so shall we hither fare.

THE CELESTIAL COUNTRY

(From the same)

All joys are there in that countrie,

There life from death forever free;

There youth is, ever without eld,

All wealth is there forever held:

There is aye rest without travail;

There are all goods that never fail;

There peace forever, without strife:

There every kind of joyous life;

There is, free from all darkness, light;

There is aye day and never night;

There aye is summer bright to see;

And never more winter in that countrie;

There are true friendships and riches,

More nobleness than man may guess;

There is more worship and honour

Than ever had king or emperour;

There is all might and power secure;

And there an endless home made sure;

There too are all delights and ease,

And sure tranquility and peace;

There peaceful joy forever is,

And pleasure there and lasting bliss. . . .

There always blissful certainty,

And certain dwelling ever free;

There is all mirth, each pastime dear;

There laughter is, and lovely cheer;

There's melody and angel's song,

And love and praise from that bright throng:

There is all friendship that may be;

And perfect love and charitie;

There is accord, and its due mede

Is given aye to each good deed;

There's lowly awe and reverence,

And meekness and obedience;

There are all virtues and no sin,

All dainties and delights therein,

All wisdom's there from folly free,

And honour without villany. . . .

There is brightness and beautie

In everything that men shall see;

There joys are free and general,

But the most sovereign joy of all

Is the blest sight of God's bright face,

Beyond all joys and all solace.

THE BATTLE OF HALIDON HILL<sup>1</sup>

Listen, Lordings, if you will Hear of the battle of Halidon Hill.

True King that sitteth on thy throne,
 Unto thee I tell my tale,
 And unto thee I bid a boon,
 For thou art balm of all my bale.
 As thou hast made the earth and moon,
 And beasts and foulés great and smale,
 Unto me send thy succour soon
 Direct my deedés in this dale.

In this dale I droup<sup>2</sup> and dare
 For evil deedés that cost me dear,
 For England had my heart great care,
 When Edward went at first to were.<sup>3</sup>
 The men of France were bold to fare
 Against him with the shield and spere;
 They turned again with sidés sair
 And all their pomp not worth a pere.<sup>4</sup>

A pear is more of price sometide<sup>5</sup>
 Than all the boast of Normandie.
 They sent their ships on ilka side
 With flesh and wine and wheat and rye;
 With heart and hand, 'tis not denied,
 For to help Scotland gan they hie,
 They fled and durst no deed abide
 And all their boast not worth a flye.

For all their boast they durst not fight,
 For dint of death they had such dout,<sup>6</sup>
 Of Scotland had they never sight
 Although they were of wordés stout.
 They would have magnified their might
 And troubled were they there about.
 Now God help Edward in his right,—
 Amen—and all his ready rout.

His ready rout may Jesu speed.
 And save them both by night and day;
 That Lord of Heaven may Edward lead,
 And him maintain as well He may.
 The Scotchmen now all wide will sprede<sup>7</sup>
 For they have failéd of their prey,
 Now are they daunted all for drede
 That were before so stout and gay.

Gay they were and well they thought
 On Earl Moray<sup>8</sup> and others stout;

They said it should full dear be bought,
 The land whence they were driven out.
 Philip Valois wordés wrought,
 And said he should their foeman stay;
 But all these words they went for naught,
 Words must be meet or weak are they.

More menaces they boasting cry,
 In spite of might they have their meed;
 And many a night awake they lie
 To harm all England by their deed;
 But low is now that pride so high
 Of those that were so stout on steed;
 And some of them all naked lie
 Not far from Berwick upon Tweed.

A little from that selfsame town,
 Halidon Hill that is the name,
 There was crackéd many a crown
 Of the wild Scot and eke of tame.
 Then was their banner borne all down,
 To make such boasts they were to blame;
 But nathéless aye are they bounce<sup>9</sup>
 To hurt England with sorrow and shame.

Shame they have as I here say;
 At Dundee now is done their dance,
 And wend they must another way
 Even through Flanders into France.
 On Philip Valois<sup>10</sup> fast cry they,
 There for to dwell and him advance.
 And nothing list they now to play
 Since them befell this sorry chance.

This sorry chance hath them o'erthrown,
 For they were false and wondrous fell;
 For curséd catiffs are they known
 And full of treason, sooth to tell.
 Sir John Comyn<sup>11</sup> had they struck down,
 In holy kirk they did him quell;<sup>12</sup>
 So many a Scottish bride makes moan
 With dolour dight<sup>13</sup> there must they dwell.

There dwelled our king, the sooth to sayn,
 With his menié<sup>14</sup> a little while;
 He gave good comfort on that plain
 To all his men about a mile.
 Although his men were mickle of main,<sup>15</sup>
 Ever they doubted them of guile;
 They Scottish gauds<sup>16</sup> might nowise gain
 For all they stumbled at that stile.

They came not from that strife alive
 That were before so proud in prese,<sup>17</sup>
 Jésus, for thy woundés five,
 In England help us to have peace.

<sup>1</sup> This poem is one of the famous war-songs which celebrate events in the reign of Edward III. between 1333-1352. The battle of Halidon Hill was fought in 1333. The King, who was besieging Berwick, completely routed a Scotch force under Sir Archibald Douglas, which had come to relieve the town. Berwick passed into the hands of the English, and has remained so till today.

PRAYER FOR KING EDWARD

(From How Edward the King came to Brabant)

God that shaped both sea and sand,
 Save Edward, King of Engeland,
 Both body, soul, and life,
 And grant him joy withouten strife;
 For many men 'gainst him are wroth. 5
 In France and in Flanders both,
 For he defendeth fast his right
 And thereto Jésu grant him might,
 That he may do so night and day
 That it may be for Goddés pay.<sup>1</sup> 10

SIR ORPHEO<sup>1</sup>

(14th Century)

We read full oft and find y-writ
 As clerkés wise make us to wit,
 Those lays that have for men's harping
 Been made of many a noble thing:
 Some are of weal and some of Woe, 5
 Some of joy and mirth alsó,
 Some of jest and ribaldry,
 And some there are of faerie;
 Of traitors some, and some of guile,
 Or some mishap that chanced erstwhile: 10
 Of all the things that men may see
 Most fit to praise forsooth they be.
 In Brittany these lays were brought,
 There first were made, and thence were brought
 Of adventures that fell in days 15
 Whereof the Britons made their lays;
 So when of old they chanced to hear
 Of adventures in days that were,
 They took their harps with glee and game<sup>2</sup>
 And made a lay and did it name. 20
 Of adventures that did befall
 I can tell some but nowise all.
 Harken, lordlings, that be true,
 And I will tell of Sir Orphew.

Orpheo was a riché King, 25
 And in his time a great lording;
 A full fair man both large and tall,
 And courteous and brave withal.
 His father was come of King Plútó,
 And his mother came of Queen Júnó, 30
 Who in old times as gods were holden
 For deeds they did and words they tolden.
 Orpheo most of anything,
 Loved the music of harping;
 Certain was every good harpóur 35
 From him to have most high honour.
 Right well himself he loved to harp,
 And gave thereto his wittés sharp;
 He learned so that there was none,
 Who could harp better 'neath the sun. 40

<sup>1</sup> Satisfaction.

<sup>1</sup> The romance of Sir Orpheo belongs to that group of poems known as "Breton Songs." That is to say, it is one of a number of short rhymed narrative poems which are chiefly of Celtic origin. The Classical story of Orpheus is transformed into a medieval fairy story, and the gloomy land of Pluto becomes a beautiful land of faerie.

Man in this world was never born,
 Who, if he Orpheo sat beforen,
 And once might of his harping hear,
 But he should thinké that he were 45
 In one of the joys of Paradis,
 Such music in his harping is.
 Orpheo livéd in Crasséns,
 A city noble in defence,
 He hath a queen full fair of pris,<sup>3</sup>
 That calléd is Dame Erodis, 50
 The fairest woman for the nonés<sup>4</sup>
 That might be made of flesh and bonés,
 Full of all love and of goodnéss,
 No man may tell of her fairnéss.
 It befel in time of May,— 55
 When is merry and pleasing the summer's day,
 Away have gone the winter's showers,
 And every field is full of flowers,
 Of blossoms springing on the bough,
 O'er all the land 'tis merry enow,— 60
 That this same Queen, Dame Erodis,
 Took with her maidens two of pris,
 And walkéd in the undertide<sup>5</sup>
 To play within her orchard-side,
 To see the flowers spread and spring, 65
 And see and hear the sweet birds sing.
 Then down they seated them all three,
 Fairly beneath an ympé tree,<sup>6</sup>
 And full soon that fairest queen,
 Fell fast asleep upon the green, 70
 The maidens durst not her awake,
 But round her they 'gan merry make,
 And let her sleep till afternoon
 When the undertide was gone;
 And as soon as she gan wake 75
 She cried, and loathsome 'gan her make,
 Her hands and eke her feet she tore,
 And scratched her till she bled full sore;
 And scratched her till she bled full sore;
 Her clothing rich she all to-rent,
 All wild out of her wittés went. 80
 The maidens two that sat beside,
 They durst no longer there abide,
 But straightway sought the castle hall
 And told both knights and squires all,
 How that their Queen away would go. 85
 The knights went also, and ladies too,
 And demoiselles fifty and many mo,<sup>7</sup>
 To fetch her as they fain would do.
 Into the orchard ran they out
 And took her in their armés stout, 90
 And brought her to her bed at last
 And therein held her down full fast;
 But still she cried in angry mood,
 And rent herself as she were wode.<sup>8</sup>
 When heard the King this dread tidíng, 95
 He was never so woe for any thing.
 The King came with his knightés keen<sup>9</sup>
 Into the chamber to his Queen,
 And for her had he great pitie.
 "Sweet heart," he said, "how may this be, 100
 That thou who ever wert so still,
 Shouldst now cry out so loud and shrill?
 Thy body that was white beforen,
 Now with thy nails is rent and torn.

- Alas! thy cheeks which were so red 105 Yet away shalt thou be borne."<sup>13</sup> 170
 Are now all wan and grey as lead,
 And thy dainty fingers fair,
 Pallid now and bloody are.
 Alas! thy lovely eyen too
 Look on me as on a foe.
 Lady dear, I crave mercie,
 Lét be all this rueful cry,
 And tell to me what thing, and how,
 If any thing,—may help thee now."
 Still grows the lady at the last,
 While she began to weep full fast,
 Saying, while yet the tears would flow,
 "Alas! my lord, Sir Orpheo,
 Never since we two plightid troth
 Was either with the other wroth,
 Yet ever hast thou lovéd me,
 With all mine heart so have I thee;
 And now we twain shall part in two,
 Do thy best, yet I must go."
 "Alas!" he said, "my life is bare,
 Unto whom goest thou and where?
 Where thou comest thou shalt with me,
 Whither thou goest I will with thee."
 "Sir," said she, "it may not be thus,
 I'll tell thee how it is with us.
 As I lay this undertide
 Asleep upon the orchard-side,
 Two gallant knights came to me there,
 Arrayed in richest garments fair,
 And bade me come without letting,
 To speak unto their lord the king.
 Right boldly then I answered there—
 'Nor will I come, nor do I dare.'
 At the word they did depart,
 Then came their King so blithe of heart,
 With a thousand knights and mo
 And fifty fair ladies alsó,
 A-riding all on snow-white steeds,
 And snow-white also were their weeds,<sup>10</sup>
 Never, in faith, since I was born
 Knights so fair came me befor.
 The King a crown had on his head,
 'Twas not of silver, nor gold so red,
 All it was of precious stone,
 As bright as sun forsooth it shone. 150
 He stayed for naught but straight me sought,
 And willy, nilly, me he caught,
 And me he made with him to ride
 On a white palfrey by his side,
 And brought me in to his palys,<sup>11</sup>
 Right well bedight it was I wis.
 He showed me castles, halls and towers,
 Rivers, meadows, fields and flowers,
 And his forests every one;
 And after, back he brought me home,
 Back into our own orchard,
 And said to me this afterward:
 'Look tomorrow that thou be Here beneath this ympe tree;
 And if thou makest any let,
 Where'er thou be thou shalt be fet,<sup>12</sup>
 And to tear thy limbes all,
 Shall help thee naught whate'er befall,
 And although thou be all torn
- 110 Counsel he asked of many man
 But of them all none help him can.
 The hour came, the morrow's sun,
 The King hath put his armour on,
 Two hundred knights he takes with him,
 Fully arméd, stout and grim:
 Out then with the Queen went he
 Into the orchard 'neath the tree;
 Then did they watch on every side,
 And planned that there they would abide,
 Resolved to suffer death and woe,
 E'er that the Queen should from them go.
 But shortly then did it befall,
 As the Queen sat among them all,
 The fairy took that lady fair
 And she was gone—no man wist where.
 Crying and weeping there was alsó,
 The King gan to his chamber go,
 He fell adown upon the stone,
 And made great dole and mickle moan,
 Well nigh he had himself yschent<sup>14</sup>
 He saw there was no améndeant.
 He sent for earl and for baroun,
 And other lords of great renown,
 And, when they all together were,
 "Lordés," he said, "assembled here,
 I set mine steward of mine hall
 To keep my landés over all.
 Now my Queen is left forlorn,
 The best ladie that e'er was born;
 No more will I woman see,
 In wilderness now will I be,
 And there abide in woodlands hoar
 And in the wilds forevermore.
 Then when ye know I have left all,
 Ye straight a parliament shall call,
 And ye shall chose you a new King,
 And do your best in everything."
 Great sorrow then was in the hall,
 Weeping and crying 'mongst them all,
 And there might neither old nor young
 For weeping speak a word with tongue.
 They kneeled all a-down i-feré,<sup>15</sup>
 And begged him if his will it were,
 That he would never from them go,
 "Away!" he said, "I will not so."
 Then all his kindred he forsook
 And unto him a slaveyn<sup>16</sup> took,
 He would have no other hood;
 Hose, nor shoe, nor other good;
 Only his harp he took, and straight
 He journeyed barefoot through the gate.
 No man there must with him go,
 Alas! there weeping was and woe.
 He that was King and bare the crown,
 Went out so poorly from the town,
 Into the wild he takes his road,
 Both through the heath and through the wood.
 Nothing he hath to give him ease,

But ever lives in great malaise.<sup>17</sup>
 In the rough wood he nights must pass,
 And cover him with herb and grass;
 He that had a great plentie,
 Meat, and drink, and dignitie,
 Now must dig and grub full sair,
 Ere of roots he gets his fare.
 In summer on the haws he lives,
 That misther leaves the hawthorne gives;
 In winter, by the root and rind,
 For other thing he may not find.
 He was all shrunk, shriveled, pale,
 With beating rain, and cutting hail;
 No man could tell the travail sore
 He had endured ten years or more.
 He that had castles, halls and towers,
 Forests, rivers, fields, and flowers,
 Nothing that likes him<sup>18</sup> now had he,
 But savage beasts that from him flee.
 His matted beard has shaggy grown,
 Below his girdle has it gone.
 He taketh harp and maketh glee,
 And lies all night beneath a tree.
 When bright and clear there dawns the day,
 He takes his harp and makes no stay,
 Amidst the wood he sits him down
 And tunes his harp with a merry soun,
 And harps all after his own will;
 Through all the wood it ringeth shrill.
 The savage beasts that there are found,
 For joy about him gather round,
 And all the little birds that were,
 For joy they come about him there
 To listen to that harping fine,
 So mickle joy there was therein.
 His harping when he laid aside,
 Nor bird, nor beast would then abide,
 But all together they are flown,
 And leave him there to sit alone.
 Often saw he him beside,
 In the heat of summer-tide,
 The Fairy King with all his rout,
 Come a-hunting all about.
 With shout and merry din they go
 And noise of hound and horn alsó;
 And yet forsooth, no beast they slay,
 Nor knows he where they take their way.
 And other whiles he may espye,
 A mighty hunt go passing by,
 Full two hundred knights of pride
 Armed through the forest ride.
 Somewhile he saw other thing,
 Knights and ladies come riding
 With raiment bright and courtly grace,
 Moving all with easy pace;
 Tabors and pipes with them there be,
 And every kind of minstrelsy.
 And ladies too there come riding,
 Jolie<sup>19</sup> they were in everything,
 Gentle and gay they were I wis,
 Nor no man there among them is.
 Hawk on hand did each one bear,
 And hawking went by the rivére,
 Of game they found the favorite haunt,
 Pheasant, hern, and cormorant.

The birds from out the river flew,
 And every hawk his quarry slew.
 That Orpheo saw in merry mood,
 As underneath the bough he stood;
 "Parfay," he said, "there is good game,
 Thither will I, in Goddés name."
 Such sport was he wont to see,
 So up he rose and there came he
 One lady there he came unto,
 He searched her face and form alsó,
 Right well he knew it was, I wis,
 His own ladie, Dame Erodys.
 He saw her plain and she him eke,
 Yet ne'er a word did either speak.
 For him she did so poor espy
 That sometime was so rich and high,
 The tears ran down her face, I wis,
 And looking on her so did his,
 And then away they made her ride,
 For there no longer she might bide.
 "Alas!" he said, "and woe is me!
 Why will not death come suddenly!
 Wretch that I am! O, that I might Die now, when I have seen this sight!
 Alas! too long lasteth my life,
 Since I may speak not with my wife,
 Nor she with me a word may speak!
 Alas! why will my heart not break!
 Parfay!" he said, "whate'er betide,
 I will see where those ladies ride,
 And in that way I too will go—
 I care not for my life a sloe."
 His sclavyne put he on his back
 And took his harp right as he spak,
 And swiftly after them is gone,
 Over stock and over stone.
 In at the rock the ladies ride,
 He went straight after, he would not bide.
 When he was into the rock y-go<sup>20</sup>
 Full three mile and some deal mo,<sup>21</sup>
 He came unto a fair countray,
 It was as bright as any day.
 Neither hill nor dale was seen,
 All was lawn full fair and green,
 Midst it a castle met his eye,
 Noble and rich, and wondrous high,
 Over all the topmost wall
 Shone as doth the clear crystal,
 And the towers that were there
 Were gaily set with pearlés fair;
 The farthest, rising from the ditch,
 Was all of gold and silver rich;
 The front, that stood amidst them brade,<sup>22</sup>
 Was all of divers metals made;
 Within, a wondrous dwelling wide,
 With gold and gems all glorified,
 The pillars fair thereon, were dight
 With precious stones and sapphires bright.
 So fair the palace shone by night
 That all the town was full of light,
 Those riché stones so fairly shone
 They were as bright as any sun,
 No man might tell, nor think in thought,
 The riches that therein were wrought.
 The ladies at the castle light,

<sup>17</sup> Discomfirt.<sup>18</sup> Pleases him.<sup>19</sup> Pretty.<sup>20</sup> Gone.<sup>21</sup> More.<sup>22</sup> Broad.

He followed swiftly as he might;
 Orpheo knockèd at the gate,
 Ready the porter was thereat,
 And asked him "what wilt thou so?"
 "Parfay! I am a minstralro,
 I bring thee solace with my glee,
 That thou the merrier may be."
 He then undid the castle gate,
 And let him in the palace straight.
 About looked Orpheo over all,
 He saw folk sit beneath the wall;
 And some that had been brought thereto,
 They seemèd dead yet were not so,
 And there among them lay his wife,
 That he loved as his own life;
 She lay beneath an ympe tree,
 By her look he wist 'twas she.
 Then forth he went into the hall,
 There was great joy amongst them all.
 The riché King was seated there,
 And Orpheo gave him greeting fair;
 Beside him sate a Queené bright,
 Hardly of her he had a sight.
 When he had looked on all this thing,
 He kneelèd down before the King,
 And asked him if his will it were
 That he his minstrelsy would hear.
 Then said the King: "And what art thou,
 Who come into my presence now?
 Myself nor none that is with me,
 Have ever yet sent after thee.
 Since I this kingdom first began
 I have not found so brave a man
 Who hither dared to come or wend, Save that I after him should send."
 "Sir," he said, "I trow full weel,
 I hold it sooth, sir, every deal,
 It is the custom of us all
 To come to every lordès hall,
 And though we may not welcome be,
 Proffer we must our game or glee."
 Before the King he sat him down,
 And took his harp of merry soun,
 And straightway as full well he can,
 Many blithe notes he then began.
 The King looked up and sat full still,
 To hear his harping he had good will.
 When he had ceased from his harping,
 Then said to him that riché King:
 "Minstrel, me liketh well thy glee;
 Whatever thing thou ask of me,
 Freely now I will thee pay,
 Therefore, ask now, and assay."
 "Lord," he said, "I beg of thee,
 If that it shall your pleasure be,
 Give me that lady bright of ble,<sup>23</sup>
 That lies beneath yon ympe tree."
 "Nay," he said, "that may I ne'er,
 For ye would be a sorry pair;
 Thou art all shaggy, rough, and black,
 And she is made withouten lack.
 A foulé thing it were to see,
 To put her in thy companie."
 "Lord," he said, "thou riché King,
 It were yet a fouler thing,

<sup>23</sup> Hue.

To hear a lying word from thee,
 As though thou promised nought to me,
 Saying thou'd give me what I would!
 A Kingès word must needs hold good."
 "Thou sayest sooth," the King said than,
 "Forsooth thou art a true man."
 I will well that it be so,
 Take her by the hand, and go.
 I will that thou of her be blithe."
 And him he thankèd many a sythe.<sup>24</sup>
 He took her by the hand anon,
 With right good will they out are gone,
 And fast they hied from that paláce,
 And went their way through Goddès grace;
 Into the wilds they both are gone,
 O'er holt and heath they journey on.
 And so they take their way full fast,
 And to Crasséns they come at last,
 That sometime was her own cite,
 But no man wist that it was he.
 With beggar poor of humblest life
 A space he tarried with his wife.
 He asked tidings of the land,
 And who the kingdom had in hand.
 The humble beggar in his cote,
 Answering, told him every grote;
 How that the Queen was fetchèd away
 To the land of faerie on a day,
 And how the King did after go,
 But to what place no man can know.
 The Steward, he says, the land doth hold;
 So, many tidings he them told.
 The morrow at the nooné tide
 Sir Orpheo bade his Queen there bide,
 He took his harp and right anon
 Into the town he straight is gone.
 And when he came to the cite,
 Many a man him came to see,
 Men and wives and maidens fair,
 Gathered fast to see him there;
 And marvelled much as him they view,
 How thick the moss upon him grew;
 "His beard is grown right to his knee,
 His body is withered as a tree."
 Then his own Steward did he meet,
 Passing in state adown the street,
 And Orpheo fell upon his knee
 And said: "Lord help, for charitie,
 A minstrel I of Heathènesse,
 Lord help me now in this distress."
 The Steward said: "With me come home,
 And of my goods thou shalt have some,
 For Orpheo's sake once Lord to me,
 All minstrelles shall welcome be."
 Anon they went into the hall,
 The Steward and the lordès all.
 The Steward washed, and went to meat,
 And all the lordès down were set,
 Then was there music in the hall,
 But Orpheo sat against the wall.
 When all are still, the music done,
 He took his harp of sounding tone,
 And fast on it he played the glee;
 The Steward looked, and 'gan to see,
 For well he knew that harp belive;<sup>25</sup>

<sup>24</sup> Many times.<sup>25</sup> Quickly.

"Minstrel," he said, "as thou mayst thrive,
How gottest thou that harp, and where? 495
Now for thine honor tell me fair."
"Lord, in an uncouth <sup>20</sup> land," he said,
"I found it in a forest glade;
I saw a man grown thin and pale,
It lay beside him in a dale, 500
Now it must be ten winters gone."
The Steward cried, and made great moan,
"It was my Lord, Sir Orpheo, Ah! that he e'er did from us go."
The King beheld the Steward than, 505
And wist he was a right true man;
To him he said without lying,
"Sir, I am Orpheo, the King.
Here to the outskirts of the town,
I've brought my gentle lady down." 510
The lords all start that sit around,
Then wist they that the King was found.
With music and processioun,
They fetched the Queen into the town.
A good life lived they afterward, 515
And after them reigned the Steward.
Thus came they out of all their care,
God give us grace as well to fare!
And all that list to this talking
In heaven's bliss be their dwelling! 520
Amen, amen, for charitie,
Lord grant us that it so may be.

EARLY SONGS

CUCKOO SONG

(c. 1250)

Summer is icumen<sup>1</sup> in,
Sing loud Cuckoo!
Groweth seed, and bloweth mead
And springeth the woodé noo<sup>2</sup>
Sing Cuckoo! 5

Ewe bleateth after lamb,
Lows for her calfé coo;
Bullock sterteth,<sup>3</sup> buck verteth,<sup>4</sup>
Merry sing Cuckoo!

Cuckoo, Cuckoo, well sing'st thou Cuckoo: 10
So cease thou never noo.
Sing Cuckoo, noo, sing Cuckoo!

UBI SUNT QUI ANTE NOS FUERUNT?<sup>1</sup>

(c. 1280)

Where are they that lived before,
Hounds they led and hawks they bore
And had both field and chase?
Ladies rich in bowers fair,
Nets of gold bind up the hair, 5
Rosy-bright of face.

They ate and drank and made them glad,
Their life was all with pleasure led,
Men kneeled them before,
They bore themselves full proud and high,
And, in the twinkling of an eye, 11
Their souls were all forlorn.

Where is that laughing and that song,
The pride with which they passed along,
The hawk, and hound, and bower? 15
All that joy is gone away,
That weal is come to welaway,
To many a bitter hour.

They took their heaven while they were here,
And now in hell they lie in fere;<sup>2</sup> 20
The fire it burneth ever,
Long is ay, and long is o,
Long is wy, and long is wo,
From thence come they never.

Endure here, then, if thou agree, 25
A little pain, I pray of thee;
Withdraw from pleasure oft.
Though thy pain be sore indeed,
And thou thinkest on thy meed,
It shall to thee seem soft. 30

If that fiend, that foulest thing,
Through wicked spell, through false luring,
Here and there hath thee down cast,
Up and be a champion!
Stand, and fall no more adoun 35
For a little blast!

Take thou the rood-tree<sup>3</sup> for thy staff;
Think thou on Him, in thy behalf
Who gave up life so lief!
For thee He gave it; for His sake 40
Against His foe that staff now take,
And 'venge Him of that thief!

Of faith in Christ take thou the shield,
The while thou art within the field,
And e'er make strong thy hand! 45
Keep off the foe at thy staff's length,
And humble low that traitor's strength,
And win the blessed land!

Therein is day without a night,
Without an end are strength and might, 50
Chastised is every foe;
With God himself eternal life,
And peace and rest without all strife,
And weal without a woe.

Queen of heaven, mother, maid, 55
Thou may'st and canst to us be aid
And shield. From wrong us fend;
Help us from sin and shame to flee,
That we thy Son at last may see,
In joy without an end! 60

Amen!

SPRING SONG

(c. 1300)

Spring is come to town with love
 With blossom and with bird in grove,
 That all this bliss now bringeth.
 There are daisies in the dales;
 Notes full sweet of nightingales;
 Each bird song singeth.
 The throstlecock out-sings them all;
 Away is fled the Winter's thrall,
 When woodrow<sup>1</sup> springeth.
 Then chanting birds in wondrous throng
 Thrill out their joy the glades among Till all the woodland ringeth.

The crimson rose is seen,
 New leaves of tender green
 With good-will grow,
 The moon shines white and clear,
 Fennel and thyme are here,
 Fair lilies blow.
 Their mates the wild drakes find,
 Each creature seeks his kind.
 As stream that trickles slow,
 We plain when life is drear,
 For cruel love the tear
 Unchecked must flow.

The moon sends forth her light,
 The goodly sun shines bright,
 And birds sing well.
 Dews drench the soft young grass,
 And whispering lovers pass,
 Their tale to tell;
 Snakes woo beneath the clod,
 Women grow wondrous proud
 On field and fell.
 If one shall say me no
 Spring joy I will forgo
 And banished dwell.

ALYSOUN

(c. 1300)

In days of March and Averil<sup>1</sup>
 When the spray begins to spring,
 Each little bird hath her own will
 In her own speech to sing.
 And I—I live in love longing
 For one most fair of every thing.
 To me she bliss may bring:
 To serve her is my boon.
 A happy lot to me is sent,
 I know from heaven 'tis to me lent,
 From women all my love is bent
 And fixed on Alysoun.

In hue her hair is fair to see,
 Her brows are brown, her eyes are black,
 With loving laugh she looked at me!—
 Her waist is small, of slender make,
 Unless as hers she will me take
 To be her mate, my life I'll break,
 My life itself I will forsake

And fey<sup>2</sup> I'll fall adoun.
 A happy lot to me is sent, etc.

20

Nights I toss and watch and wake,
 Until my visage waxeth wan;
 Lady, all is for thy sake
 Longing comes to me alone.
 On earth there's none so learned grown
 That he her virtues can make known.
 Her neck is whiter than the swan,
 Or fairest maid in town.
 A happy lot to me is sent, etc.

25

With love I'm worn and watchings late,
 Weary as water in a weir,
 Lest any rob me of my mate.
 I have heard it said of yore,
 Better to bear awhile a sore
 Than mourn forevermore.
 Fairest earth e'er bore,
 Harken to my rune:
 A happy lot to me is sent,
 I know from heaven 'tis to me lent,
 From women all my love is bent
 And fixed on Alysoun.

BLOW, NORTHERN WIND

(c. 1300)

I know a maid in bower bright,
 That full seemly is to sight,
 Maid of majesty and might,
 Of loyal heart and hand.
 'Midst many a nobler one
 A maid of blood and bone,
 I know not ever none
 So fair in all the land.
 Blow, Northern Wind,
 Send thou me my sweeting
 Blow, Northern Wind, blow, blow, blow.

With her long and lovely tresses,
 Forehead and face fair for caresses,
 Blest be the joy my lady blesses,
 That bird so bright in bower,<sup>1</sup>
 With lovesome eyes so large and good
 With blissful brows beneath her hood,
 He that once hung upon the Road
 Her life holds in honour.
 Blow, Northern Wind,
 Send thou me my sweeting
 Blow, Northern Wind, blow, blow, blow.

Her face is full of light,
 As a lantern in the night
 She sheds a radiance bright,
 So fair is she and fine.
 Her neck is slender to enfold,
 Her loving arms bring joy untold,
 Her little hands are soft to hold,
 Would God that she were mine.
 Blow, Northern Wind,
 Send thou me my sweeting
 Blow, Northern Wind, blow, blow, blow.

Blow, Northern Wind,
 Send thou me my sweeting
 Blow, Northern Wind, blow, blow, blow.

For her love I mourn and moan,
 For her love I grieve and groan,
 For her love my good is gone
 And I wax all wan.
 For her love in sleep I sigh,
 For her love I wakeful lie,
 For her love I droop and cry,
 More than any man.

WHEN THE NIGHTINGALE SINGS

(Early 14th Century)

When the nightingálé sings, the woodés waxen
 greené,
 Leaf and grass and blossom springs, in Averil I
 weené,
 And love is to my hearté gone, with a spear so keené,
 Night and day my blood it drinks, mine
 heartés death to teené.<sup>1</sup>

I have lovéd all this year, that I can love no more,<sup>5</sup>
 I have sighéd many sighs, Lady, for thine oré,<sup>2</sup>
 Ne'er my love comes near to thee, and that me
 grieveth soré.
 Sweetest Lady think on me, I lovéd thee of yoré.

Sweetest Lady, speak I pray, one word of love to me,
 While in this wide world I stay, I'll seek for none but thee,<sup>10</sup>
 Your kind love might give me bliss, from pain might set me free,
 A sweet kiss of thy dear mouth, might my surgeon be.

Sweetest Lady, here I pray, one boon of love
 bestowé,
 If you love me, as men say, as I, dearest,
 knowé,
 If you will it, look on me, just a look will showé,<sup>15</sup>
 So much have I thought of thee, I all ghastly growé

Between Lincóln and Lindesey, North-Hamptoun and Lóndouné,
 I wot not of so fair a may,<sup>3</sup> by tower, dale, or touné,

Dearest one, I humbly pray, love me a little sooné.

I now will plain my song,
 To her to whom it doth belong.

JOAN

There's a maid in a bower, as beryl most bright,
 As sapphire in silver set seemly in sight,
 As jasper the gracious that gleameth with light,
 As garnet in gold, and as ruby most right;
 As onyx she is held up at a height;<sup>5</sup>
 As jasper the clear when in day she is dight;
 She is coral, well kennéd of Kaiser and Knight,
 As emerald at morning this maid beareth might,
 The power of the pearl hath she in her grace
 For carbuncle I choose her, by form and by face.<sup>10</sup>

Her bloom is as red as the rose on the tree,
 With the white of the lily most lovesome is she:
 Than periwinkle more pleasing, or primrose of Alexanders, or parsley, or fragrant anice.

 Quaint as a columbine, graceful and gay,<sup>15</sup>
 Clad in rich furs and in garment of grey;
 Her face is a flower, she's fairest in blue,

She is popinjay abaiting my torment and bale,
 True dove in a tower, I tell thee my tale;
 She is throstle so gentle that singeth in hall,
 She is the wild laverock and the witwall;
 She is falcon in forest, dearest in dale:<sup>25</sup>
 With every man gladdest in song and in tale:
 She is wisest of all from Wye to Wyrhale;<sup>1</sup>
 The nightingale's note tells her name to the Edwarde of Engélande and in this manner thei songe."

 Then follows the song.

LULLABY

(Early 14th Century)

Lullay, lullay, little child!
 Why weepest thou so sore?
 Needes must thou weep,
 Thou wert doomed of yore
 Ever to live in sorrow,
 Ever to sigh and strive,
 As thy fathers did ere this
 Whilst they were alive.

Lullay, lullay, little child!
 Child lullay, lullow!
 To this world unknown
 Sadly come art thou.

Beasts and birds and cattle,
 The fishes in the flood,
 And each thing that liveth
 Made of bone and blood,
 When into the world they come
 They do themselves some good,
 All but that poor imp
 That is of Adam's blood.
 With care art thou beset;
 Thou knowest naught of this world's wild
 That is before thee set.

Child, if it betideth
 That Time shall prosper thee,
 Think how thou wert fostered
 On thy mother's knee;
 Ever mind thee in thine heart
 Of those thinges three,— Whence thou camest, where thou art,
 And what shall come of thee.

Lullay, lullay, little child!
 Child lullai, lullay!
 With sorrow thou camest to this world,
 With sorrow shalt wend away.

O! trust not to this world,
 It is thy fell foe.
 The rich it maketh poor,
 The poor man sick alsó.
 It turneth woe to weal,
 And also weal to woe.
 Trust not man this changing world
 While it turneth so.
 Lullay, lullay, little child!
 The foot is on the wheel,
 How 'twill turn thou knowest not,
 Whether to woe or weal.

Child, thou art a pilgrim
 In wickedness yborn;
 Thou wanderest in this false world,
 Look thou well befor.
 Death shall come with sudden blast
 Out of the darkness hoar,
 Adam's children down to cast,
 Adam he slew before.

Lullay, lullay, little child!
 Adam did woes oppress
 In the land of Paradise,
 Through Satan's wickedness.

Child, thou'rt not a pilgrim,
 But a helpless guest.
 Thy day already told,
 Thy lot already east.
 Whether thou shalt wend
 North, or East, or West,
 Death shall thee betide,
 With bitter bale in breast.
 Lullay, lullay, little child!
 Child lullay, lullow!
 To this unknown world
 Sadly come art thou.

AVE MARIA

Ave maris stella,<sup>1</sup>
 The star upon the sea,
Dei mater alma,<sup>2</sup>
 Blessed mayest thou be!
Atque semper virgo,<sup>3</sup>
 Pray thy son for me,
Felix celi porta,<sup>4</sup>
 That I may come to thee.
 Gabriel, that archangel,
 He was messenger;
 So fair he hailed our Lady,
 With an Ave so clear.
 Hail be thou, Mary,
 Be thou, Mary,
 Full of God's grace,
 And queen of all mercy!
 All that are to greet<sup>5</sup>
 Without deadly sin,
 Forty dayes of pardon
 God granteth them.

A DESCRIPTION OF WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR

(From the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, translated by J. A. GILES)

If any would know what manner of man
 King William was, the glory that he obtained, and of how many lands he was lord; then will we describe him as we have known him, we,
 5 who have looked upon him, and who once lived in his court.<sup>1</sup> This King William, of whom we are speaking, was a very wise and a great man, 45 and more honored and more powerful than any of his predecessors. He was mild to those good 10 men who loved God, but severe beyond measure towards those who withstood his will. He founded a noble monastery on the spot where 50 God permitted him to conquer England, and he established monks in it, and he made it very 15 rich. In his days the great monastery at

 in the entry for 1087: the year of the death of William the Conqueror. The passage is presumably the work of a contemporary who writes (as he declares) from personal knowledge.

Canterbury was built, and many others also throughout England. Moreover, this land was filled with monks who lived after the rule of St. Benedict; and such was the state of religion in his days that all that would might observe that which was prescribed by their respective orders.

King William was held in much reverence. He wore his crown three times every year when he was in England: at Easter he wore it at Winchester, at Pentecost at Westminster, and at Christmas at Gloucester. And at these times all the men of England were with him, archbishops, bishops, abbots, and earls, thanes, and knights. So also, was he a very stern and a wrathful man, so that none durst do anything against his will, and he kept in prison those earls who acted against his pleasure.

He removed bishops from their sees, and abbots from their offices, and he imprisoned thanes, and at length he spared not his own brother Odo. This Odo was a very powerful bishop in Normandy; his see was that of Bayeux, and he was foremost to serve the king. He had an earldom in England, and when William was in Normandy he was the first man in this country, and him did he cast into prison.

Amongst other things the good order that William established is not to be forgotten; it was such that any man, who was himself aught, might travel over the kingdom with a bosomful of gold, unmolested; and no man durst kill another, however great the injury he might have received from him. He reigned over England, and, being sharp-sighted to his own interest, he surveyed the kingdom so thoroughly that there was not a single hide of land throughout the whole, of which he knew not the possessor, and how much it was worth, and this he afterwards entered in his register. The land of the Welsh was under his sway, and he built castles therein; moreover he had full dominion over the Isle of Man; Scotland also was subject to him, from his great strength; the land of Normandy was his inheritance, and he possessed the earldom of Maine; and had he lived two years longer he would have subdued Ireland by his prowess, and that without a battle.

Truly there was much trouble in these times, and very great distress; he caused castles to be built, and oppressed the poor. The king was also of great sternness, and he took from his subjects many marks of gold and many hundred pounds of silver, and this either with or without right, and with little need. He was given to avarice and greedily loved gain. He made large forests for the deer and enacted laws therewith, so that whoever killed a hart or a hind should be blinded. As he forbade killing the deer, so also the boars; and he loved the tall stags as if he were their father. He also appointed concerning the hares, that they should go free. The rich complained and the poor murmured, but he was so sturdy that he recked naught of them; they must will all that the king willed, if they would live, or would keep their lands, or would hold their possessions or would be maintained in their rights. . . .

He left three sons: Robert, the eldest, was duke of Normandy after him; the second, named William, wore the crown of England after his father's death; and his third son was Henry,<sup>4</sup> to whom he bequeathed immense treasures.

William of Malmsbury

c. 1095-c. 1142

MALMSBURY'S ACCOUNT OF HIMSELF

(From Gesta Regum Anglorum, c. 1120, translated by J. A. GILES)

A long period has elapsed since, as well through the care of my parents as my own industry, I became familiar with books. This pleasure possessed me from my childhood: this source of delight has grown with my years. Indeed I was so instructed by my father, that had I turned aside to other pursuits, I should have considered it as jeopardy to my soul and discredit to my character. Wherefore mindful of the adage "covet what is necessary," I constrained my early age to desire eagerly that which it was disgraceful not to possess. I gave, indeed, my attention to various branches of literature, but in different degrees. Logic, for instance, which gives arms to eloquence, I contented myself with barely hearing. Medicine, which ministers to the health of the body, I studied with somewhat more attention. But now, having scrupulously examined the several branches of Ethics, I bow to its majesty, because it spontaneously unveils itself to those who study it, and directs their minds to moral practice; History more especially; which, by an agreeable recapitulation of past events, excites its readers, by example, to frame their lives to the pursuit of good, or to aversion from evil. When, therefore, at my own expense, I had procured some historians of foreign nations, I proceeded during my domestic leisure, to inquire if anything concerning our own country could be found worthy of handing down to posterity. Hence it arose, that, not content with the writings of ancient times, I began, myself, to compose; not indeed to display my learning, which is comparatively nothing, but to bring to light events lying concealed in a confused mass of antiquity. In consequence rejecting vague opinions, I have studiously sought for chronicles far and near, though I confess I have scarcely profited anything by this industry. For perusing them all, I still remained poor in information; though I ceased not my researches as long as I could find any thing to read. However, what I have clearly ascertained concerning the four kingdoms, I have inserted in my first book, in which I hope truth will find no cause to blush, though perhaps a degree of doubt may sometimes arise. I shall now trace the monarchy of the West Saxon kingdom, through the line of successive princes, down to the coming of the Normans: which if any person will condescend to regard with complacency, let him in brotherly love observe the following rule: "If before he knew only these things, let him not be disgusted because I have inserted them; if he shall know more, let him not be angry that I have not spoken of them;" but rather let him communicate his knowledge to me, while I yet live, that at least, those events may appear in the margin of my history, which do not occur in the text.

THE BATTLE OF HASTINGS AND THE EFFECT OF THE CONQUEST

(From the same)

The courageous leaders mutually prepared for battle, each according to his national custom. The English, as we have heard, passed the night without sleep, in drinking, and singing, and, in the morning, proceeded without delay toward the enemy; all were on foot, armed with battle axes, and covering themselves in front by the junction of their shields, they formed an impenetrable body, which would have secured their safety that day, had not the Normans, by a feigned flight, induced them to open their ranks, which till that time, according to their custom, were closely compacted. The king himself on foot, stood, with his brother, near the standard; in order that, while all shared equal danger, none might think of retreating. This standard William sent, after the victory, to the Pope; it was sumptuously embroidered, with gold and precious stones, in the form of a man fighting.

On the other side, the Normans passed the whole night in confessing their sins, and received the sacrament in the morning: their infantry, with bows and arrows, formed the vanguard, while their cavalry, divided into wings, were thrown back. The earl, with serene countenance, declaring aloud, that God would favour his, as being the righteous side, called for his arms; and presently, when, through the hurry of his attendants, he had put on his hauberk the hind part before, he corrected the mistake with a laugh; saying, "My dukedom shall be turned into a kingdom." Then beginning the song of Roland, that the warlike example of that man might stimulate the soldiers, and calling on God for assistance, the battle commenced on both sides. They fought with ardour, neither giving ground, for great part of the day. Finding this, William gave a signal to his party, that, by a feigned flight, they should retreat. Through this device, the close body of English, opening for the purpose of cutting down the straggling enemy, brought upon itself swift destruction; for the Normans, facing about, attacked them thus disordered, and compelled them to fly. In this manner, deceived by a stratagem, they met an honourable death in avenging their country; nor indeed were they at all wanting to their own revenge, as, by frequently making a stand, they slaughtered their pursuers in heaps: for, getting possession of an eminence, they drove down the Normans, when roused with indignation and anxiously striving to gain the higher ground, into the valley beneath, where, easily hurling their javelins and rolling down stones on them as they stood below, they destroyed them to a man. Besides, by a short passage, with which they were acquainted, avoiding a deep ditch, they trod under foot such a multitude of their enemies in that place, that they made the hollow level with the plain, by the heaps of carcasses. This vicissitude of first one party conquering, and then the other, prevailed as long as the life of Harold continued; but when he fell, from having his brain pierced with an arrow, the flight of the English ceased not until night. The valour of both leaders was here eminently conspicuous.

Harold, not merely content with the duty of a general in exhorting others, diligently entered into every soldier-like office; often would he strike the enemy so that none could approach him with impunity; for immediately the same blow levelled both horse and rider. Wherefore, as I have related, receiving the fatal arrow from a distance, he yielded to death. One of the soldiers with a sword gashed his thigh, as he lay prostrate; for which shameful and cowardly action, he was branded with ignominy by William, and dismissed from the service.

William too was equally ready to encourage by his voice and by his presence; to be the first to rush forward; to attack the thickest of the foe. Thus everywhere raging, everywhere furious, he lost three choice horses, which were that day pierced under him. The dauntless spirit and vigour of the intrepid general, however, still persisted, though often called back by the kind remonstrance of his body-guard; he still persisted, I say, till approaching night crowned him with complete victory, and no doubt, the hand of God so protected him, that the enemy should draw no blood from his person, though they aimed so many javelins at him.

This was a fatal day to England, a melancholy havoc of our dear country, through its change of masters. For it had long since adopted the manners of the Angles, which had been very various according to the times: for in the first years of their arrival, they were barbarians in their look and manners, warlike in their usages, heathens in their rites; but, after embracing the faith of Christ, by degrees, and in process of time, from the peace they enjoyed, regarding arms only in a secondary light, they gave their whole attention to religion. I say nothing of the poor, the mean-ness of whose fortune often restrains them from overstepping the bounds of justice; I omit men of ecclesiastical rank, whom sometimes respect to their profession, and sometimes the fear of shame, suffer not to deviate from the truth: I speak of princes, who from the greatness of their power might have full liberty to indulge in pleasure; some of whom, in their own country, and others at Rome, changing their habit, obtained a heavenly kingdom, and a saintly intercourse. Many during their whole lives in outward appearance only embraced the present world, in order that they might exhaust their treasures on the poor, or divide them amongst monasteries. What shall I say of the multitudes of bishops, hermits, and abbots? Does not the whole island blaze with such numerous relics of its natives that you can scarcely pass a village of any consequence but you hear the name of some new saint, besides the numbers of whom all notices have perished through the want of records? Nevertheless, in process of time, the desire after literature and religion had decayed, for several years before the arrival of the Normans. The clergy, contented with a very slight degree of learning, could scarcely stammer out the words of the sacraments; and a person who understood grammar, was an object of wonder and astonishment. The monks mocked the rule of their order by fine vestments, and the use of every kind of food. The nobility, given up to luxury and wantonness, went not to church in the morning after the manner of Christians, but merely, in a careless manner, heard matins and masses from a hurrying priest in their chambers, amid the blandishments of their wives. The commonalty, left unprotected, became a prey to the most powerful, who amassed fortunes, by either seizing on their property, or by selling their persons into foreign countries; although it be an innate quality of this people, to be more inclined to revelling, than to the accumulation of wealth. . . .

Drinking in parties was a universal practise, in which occupation they passed entire nights as well as days. They consumed their whole substance in mean and despicable houses; unlike the Normans and French, who, in noble and splendid mansions, lived with frugality. The vices attendant on drunkenness, which enervate the human mind, followed; hence it arose that engaging William, more with rashness and precipitate fury than military skill, they doomed themselves, and their country to slavery, by one, and that an easy, victory. "For nothing is less effective than rashness; and what begins with violence, quickly ceases, or is repelled." In fine, the English at that time, wore short garments reaching to the mid-knee; they had their hair cropped; their beards shaven; their arms laden with golden bracelets; their skin adorned with punctured designs. They were accustomed to eat till they became surfeited, and to drink till they were sick. These latter qualities they imparted to their conquerors; as to the rest, they adopted their manners. I would not, however, have these bad propensities universally ascribed to the English. I know that many of the clergy, at that day, trod the path of sanctity, by a blameless life; I know that many of the laity, of all ranks and conditions, in this nation, were well-pleasing to God. Be injustice far from this account; the accusation does not involve the whole indiscriminately. "But, as in peace, the mercy of God often cherishes the bad and the good together; so, equally, does His severity, sometimes, include them both in captivity."

Moreover, the Normans, that I may speak of them also, were at that time, and are even now, proudly apparelled, delicate in their food, but not excessive. They are a race inured to war, and can hardly live without it; fierce in rushing against the enemy; and where strength fails of success, ready to use stratagem, or to corrupt by bribery. As I have related, they live in large edifices with economy; envy their equals; wish to excell their superiors; and plunder their subjects, though they defend them from others: they are faithful to their lords, though a slight offense renders them perfidious. They weigh treachery by its chance of success, and change their sentiments with money. They are, however, the kindest of nations, and they esteem strangers worthy of equal honour with themselves. They also intermarry with their vassals. They revived, by their arrival, the observances of religion, which were everywhere grown lifeless in England. You might see churches rise in every village, and monasteries in the towns and cities, built after a style unknown before; you might behold the country flourishing with renovated rights; so that each wealthy man accounted that day lost to him, which he had neglected to signalize by some munificent action. But having enlarged sufficiently on these points, let us pursue the transactions of William.

When his victory was complete he caused his dead to be interred with great pomp; granting the enemy the liberty of doing the like, if they thought proper. He sent the body of Harold to his mother, who begged it, unransomed; though she proffered large sums by her messengers. She buried it, when thus obtained, at Waltham; a church which he had built at his own expense, in honour of the Holy Cross, and had endowed for canons. William then, by degrees proceeding, as became a conqueror, with his army, not after an hostile, but a royal manner, journeyed towards London, the principal city of the kingdom; and shortly after, all the citizens came out to meet him with gratulations.

Thomas of Ely

CANUTE AND THE MONKS OF ELY

(From Historia Eliensis, 12th century, translated by P. V. D. SHELLY)

On a certain occasion, king Canute, accompanied by his queen Emma, and by magnates of the realm, was proceeding to Ely by boat, intending there to celebrate, according to custom, the purification of Saint Mary; for, since the beginning of their order, the abbots of Ely have held the ceremony in the presence of the king's court. As they were approaching the bank, the king, rising in the midst of his men, signalled to the boatmen to pull more swiftly to the little gate, and commanded them to pass through it slowly. Thereupon, lifting his eyes toward the church, which stood out distinctly on the summit of a rock, he heard upon all sides a sound of great sweetness; and listening intently, the better to hear the melody in all its fulness, he began to sigh. He perceived that it was the monks singing in the dining-hall, and chanting the hours. Thereupon, he requested certain ones in the boats to come round to him and to sing with him. Then the king himself, expressing with his own mouth the gladness of his heart, composed a song in English in these words:

Sweetly sang the monks in Ely
When Canute the king rowed by!
"Row, Knights, near the land
And hear the monks' sweet song."

which, even to-day, are sung publicly in chorus and are remembered in proverbs. The king beginning thus, did not cease to sing piously and sweetly in chorus with the venerable college, until he came to land, and, being worthily received by the brothers in procession, as their custom is with the most distinguished person, was led into the church. Presently, by his privilege and authority he confirmed in perpetuity the rights and benefits granted to the church by his predecessors, the kings of the English; and before the high altar, where rests the sacred body of the virgin and spouse of Christ, Aetheldreda, he declared, in the presence of the church and of the world, that the rights and privileges of the place should be free in perpetuity.

DEDICATORY EPISTLE

(From Historia Regum Britaniæ, 1147, translated by J. A. GILES)

Whilst occupied on many and various studies I happened to light upon the History of the Kings of Britain, and wondered that in the account which Gildas and Bede, in their elegant treatises, have given of them, I found nothing said of those kings who lived here before the Incarnation of Christ, nor of Arthur, and many others who succeeded after the Incarnation; though their actions both deserved immortal fame, and were also celebrated by many people in a pleasant manner and by heart, as if they had been written. Whilst I was intent upon these and such like thoughts, Walter,<sup>1</sup> archdeacon of Oxford, a man of great eloquence, and learned in foreign histories, offered me a very ancient book in the British tongue, which, in a continued regular story and elegant style, related the actions of them all, from Brutus<sup>2</sup> the first king of the Britons, down to Cadwallader<sup>3</sup> the son of Cadwallo. At his request, therefore, though I had not made fine language my study, by collecting florid expressions from other authors, yet contented with my own homely style, I undertook the translation of that book into Latin. For if I had swelled the pages with rhetorical flourishes, I must have tired my readers by employing their attention more upon my words than upon the history. To you, therefore, Robert earl of Gloucester,<sup>4</sup> this work humbly sues for the favour of being so corrected by your advice, that it may not be thought to be the poor offspring of Geoffrey of Monmouth, but when polished by your refined wit and judgment, the production of him who had Henry the glorious king of England for his father, and whom we see an accomplished scholar and philosopher, as well as a brave soldier and expert commander; so that Britain with joy acknowledges, that in you she possesses another Henry.

THE STORY OF KING LEIR

(From the same)

After this unhappy fate of Bladud, Leir, his son was advanced to the throne, and nobly governed his country sixty years. He built upon the river Sore a city called in the British tongue, Kaelleir, in the Saxon, Leirestre.<sup>1</sup> He was without male issue, but had three daughters, whose names were Gonorilla, Regau, and Cordeilla, of whom he was dotingly fond, but especially of his youngest, Cordeilla. When he began to grow old, he had thoughts of dividing his kingdom among them, and of bestowing them on such husbands as were fit to be advanced to the government with them. But to make trial who was worthy to have the best part of his kingdom, he went to each of them to ask which of them loved him most. The question being proposed, Gonorilla, the eldest, made answer, "That she called heaven to witness, she loved him more than her own soul." The father replied, "Since you have preferred my declining age before your own life, I will marry you, my dearest daughter, to whomsoever you shall make choice of, and give with you the third part of my kingdom." Then Regau, the second daughter, willing, after the example of her sister, to prevail upon her father's good nature, answered with an oath, "That she could not otherwise express her thoughts, but that she loved him above all creatures." The credulous father upon this made her the same promise that he did to her eldest sister, that is, the choice of a husband, with the third part of his kingdom. But Cordeilla, the youngest, understanding how easily he was satisfied with the flattering expressions of her sisters, was desirous to make trial of his affection after a different manner. "My father," said she, "is there any daughter that can love her father more than duty requires? In my opinion, who ever pretends to it, must disguise her real sentiments under the veil of flattery. I have always loved you as a father, nor do I yet depart from my purposed duty; and if you insist to have something more extorted from me, hear now the greatness of my affection, which I always bear you, and take this for a short answer to all your questions; look how much you have, so much is your value, and so much do I love you." The father, supposing that she spoke this out of the abundance of her heart, was highly provoked, and immediately replied, "Since you have so far despised my old age as not to think me worthy the love that your sisters express for me, you shall have from me the like regard, and shall be excluded from any share with your sisters in my kingdom. Notwithstanding, I do not say but that since you are my daughter, I will marry you to some foreigner, if fortune offers you any such husband; but will never, I do assure you, make it my business to procure so honourable a match for you as for your sisters; because, though I have hitherto loved you more than them, you have in requital thought me less worthy of your affection than they." And, without further delay, after consultation with his nobility, he bestowed his two other daughters upon the dukes of Cornwall and Albania, with half the island at present, but after his death, the inheritance of the whole monarchy of Britain.

It happened after this, that Aganippus, king of the Franks, having heard of the fame of Cordeilla's beauty, forthwith sent his ambassadors to the king to demand her in marriage. The father, retaining yet his anger towards her, made answer, "That he was very willing to bestow his daughter, but without either money or territories; because he had already given away his kingdom with all his treasure to his eldest daughters, Gonorilla and Regau." When this was told Aganippus, he, being very much in love with the lady, sent again to king Leir, to tell him, "That he had money and territories enough, as he possessed the third part of Gaul, and desired no more than his daughter only, that he might have heirs by her." At last the match was concluded; Cordeilla was sent to Gaul, and married to Aganippus.

A long time after this, when Leir came to be infirm through old age, the two dukes, on whom he had bestowed Britain with his two daughters, fostered an insurrection against him, and deprived him of his kingdom, and of all regal authority, which he had hitherto exercised with great power and glory. At length, by mutual agreement, Maglaunus, duke of Albania, one of his sons-in-law, was to allow him maintenance at his own house, together with sixty soldiers, who were to be kept for state. After two years' stay with his son-in-law, his daughter Gonorilla, grudged the number of his men, who began to upbraid the ministers of the court with their scanty allowance; and, having spoken to her husband about it, she gave orders that the numbers of her father's followers should be reduced to thirty, and the rest discharged. The father, resenting this treatment, left Maglaunus, and went to Henuinus, duke of Cornwall, to whom he had married his daughter Regau. Here he met with an honourable reception, but before the year was at an end, a quarrel happened between the two families, which raised Regau's indignation; so that he commanded her father to discharge all his attendants but five, and to be contented with their service. This second affliction was insupportable to him, and made him return again to his former daughter, with hopes that the misery of his condition might move in her some sentiments of filial piety, and that he, with his family, might find a subsistence with her. But she, not forgetting her resentment, swore by the gods he should not stay with her, unless he would dismiss his retinue, and be contented with the attendance of one man; and with bitter reproaches she told him how ill his desire of vain-glorious pomp suited his age and poverty. When he found that she was by no means to be prevailed upon, he was at last forced to comply, and, dismissing the rest, to take up with one man only. But by this time he began to reflect more sensibly with himself upon the grandeur from which he had fallen, and the miserable state to which he was now reduced, and to enter upon thoughts of going beyond sea to his youngest daughter. Yet he doubted whether he should be able to move her commiseration, because (as related above) he had treated her so unworthily. However, disdaining to bear any longer such base usage, he took ship for Gaul. In his passage he observed that he had only the third place given him among the princes that were with him in the ship, at which, with deep sighs and tears, he burst forth into the following complaint:—

10 "O irreversible decrees of the Fates, that never swerve from your stated course! why did you ever advance me to an unstable felicity, since the punishment of lost happiness is greater than the sense of present misery?"
 15 The remembrance of the time when vast numbers of men obsequiously attended me in the taking the cities and wasting the enemy's countries, more deeply pierces my heart than the view of my present calamity, which has exposed me to the derision of those who were formerly prostrate at my feet. Oh! the enmity of fortune! Shall I ever again see the day when I may be able to reward those according to their deserts who have forsaken me in my
 25 distress? How true was thy answer, Cordeilla, when I asked thee concerning thy love to me, "As much as you have, so much is your value, and so much do I love you." While I had anything to give they valued me, being friends, not to me, but to my gifts; they loved me then, but they loved my gifts much more: when my gifts ceased, my friends vanished. But with what face shall I presume to see you, my dearest daughter, since in my anger I married 35 you upon worse terms than your sisters, who, after all the mighty favours they have received from me, suffer me to be in banishment and poverty?"

As he was lamenting his condition in these and the like expressions, he arrived at Karitia,<sup>2</sup> where his daughter was, and waited before the city while he sent a messenger to inform her of the misery he was fallen into, and to desire her relief for a father who suffered both hunger and nakedness. Cordeilla was startled at the news, and wept bitterly, and with tears asked how many men her father had with him. The messenger answered, he had none but one man, who had been his armour-bearer, and was staying with him without the town. Then she took what money she thought might be sufficient, and gave it to the messenger, with orders to carry her father to another city, and there give out that he was sick, and to provide for him bathing, clothes, and all other nourishment. She likewise gave orders that he should take into his service forty men, well clothed and accoutred, and when all things were thus prepared he should notify his arrival to king Aganippus and his daughter. The messenger quickly returning, carried Leir to another city, and there kept him concealed, till he had done everything that Cordeilla had commanded.

As soon as he was provided with his royal apparel, ornaments, and retinue, he sent word to Aganippus and his daughter, that he was driven out of his kingdom of Britain by his sons-in-law, and was come to them to procure their assistance for recovering his dominions. Upon which they, attended with their chief ministers of state and the nobility of the kingdom, went out to meet him, and received him honourably, and gave into his management the whole power of Gaul, till such time as he should be restored to his former dignity.

In the meantime Aganippus sent officers all over Gaul to raise an army, to restore his father-in-law to his kingdom of Britain. Which done, Leir returned to Britain with his son and daughter and the forces which they had raised, where he fought with his sons-in-law and routed them. Having thus reduced the whole kingdom to his power, he died the third year after. Aganippus also died; and Cordeilla obtained the government of the kingdom, buried her father in a certain vault, which she ordered to be made for him under the river Sore, in Leicester, and which had been built originally under the ground to the honour of the god Janus. And here all the workmen of the city, upon the anniversary solemnity of that festival, used to begin their yearly labours.

OF SPEECH

Speaking and tasting are both in the mouth, as sight is in the eyes; but we shall let tasting alone until we speak of your food, and treat, at present, of speaking, and thereafter of hearing, of both in common, in some measure, as they go together.

First of all, when you have to go to your parlour window, learn from your maid who it is that is come; for it may be some one whom you ought to shun; and, when you must needs go forth, make the sign of the cross carefully on your mouth, ears, and eyes, and on your breast also, and go forth in the fear of God to a priest. Say first, "Confiteor," and then "Benedicite," which he ought to say; hear his words and sit quite still, that, when he parteth from you, he may not know either good or evil of you, nor know anything either to praise or to blame in you. Some one is so learned and of such wise speech, that she would have him to know it, who sits and talks to him and gives him word for word, and becomes a preceptor who should be an anchoress, and teaches him who is come to teach her; and would, by her own account, soon be celebrated and known among the wise. Known she is well; for, from the very circumstance that she thinketh herself to be reputed wise, he understands that she is a fool; for she hunteth after praise and catches reproach. For, at last, when he is gone away he will say, "This anchoress is a great talker." Eve, in Paradise, held a long conversation with the serpent, and told him all the lesson that God had taught her and Adam concerning the apple; and thus the fiend, by her talk, understood at once, her weakness, and found out the way to ruin her. Our lady, Saint Mary, acted in a quite different manner. She told the angel no tale, but asked him briefly that which she wanted to know. Do you, my dear sisters, imitate our lady, and not the cackling Eve. Wherefore, let an anchoress, whatsoever she be, keep silence as much as ever she can and may. Let her not have the hen's nature. When the hen has laid, she must needs cackle. And what does she get by it? Straightway comes the chough and robs her of her eggs and devours all that of which she should have brought forth live birds. And just so the wicked chough, the devil, beareth away from the cackling anchoress, and swalloweth up, all the good they have brought forth, and which ought, as birds, to bear them up toward heaven, if it had not been cackled. The poor pedler makes more noise to cry his soap than a rich mercer all his valuable wares. Of a spiritual man in whom you place confidence, as you may do, it is good that you ask counsel, and that he teach you a safe remedy against temptations; and in confession shew him, if he will hear you, your greatest and vilest sins, that he may pity you, and out of compassion cry internally to Christ to have mercy upon you, and have you often in his mind and in his prayers. "Sed multi veniunt ad vos in vestimentis ovium, intrinsecus autem sunt lupi rapaces."<sup>2</sup> "But be aware and on your guard," saith our Lord, "for many come to you clothed in lambs' fleece and are raging wolves." Believe secular men little, religious still less. Desire not too much their acquaintance. Eve spoke with the serpent without fear. Our lady was afraid of speaking with Gabriel.

WATCHFULNESS AND DILIGENCE

Eight things especially admonish and invite us to be watchful and diligent in some good work—the shortness of this life—the difficulty of our way—the small amount of our merits—the great number of our sins—the certainty of death, and the uncertainty of the time—the severe doom of the day of judgment, which is also so strict. Our Lord saith in the gospel: “De omni verbo otioso,”<sup>3</sup> etc. Item “Capillus de capite vestro non peribit;”<sup>4</sup> that is, no thought shall be unpunished. These are God’s words: that every idle word shall be there brought forth, and idle thoughts that were not previously amended. Consider now what cometh of depraved affections and sinful works. Again, the seventh thing which warns us to be vigilant is the pains of hell, in which consider three things—the innumerable torments which no tongue may tell—the eternity of each, which lasteth without end—and their vast bitterness. The eighth thing is the greatness of the reward in the blessedness of heaven, world without end. Whoso watcheth well here a little while—whoso hath these eight things in her heart, will shake off her sleep of vicious sloth in the still night, when nothing is to be seen to hinder prayer. The heart is often at such a season so sincere; for there is then no witness of any good that we do but God only, and his angel, who is busily employed in inciting us to good. For then, nothing is lost, as there often is in the day.

Hear now, my dear sisters, how evil it is to be vain and boast of good deeds, and how good it is to conceal our good works, and to fly by night, like the night fowl, and to gather in the darkness, that is, privately and secretly, food for the soul.

JOY IN SUFFERING

Go ye now, then, along the hard and toilsome way toward the great feast of heaven, where your glad friend expecteth your coming, more joyfully than foolish worldly men go by the green way toward the gallows-tree, and to the death of hell. It is better to go toward heaven sick, than in health toward hell, and to mirth with want, than to woe with abundance. Not however, but that wretched worldly men buy hell dearer than ye do heaven. Solomon saith, “The way of sinners is planted over with stones;”<sup>5</sup> that is, with severe afflictions. Of one thing be ye well assured—that a harsh word that ye bear with patience, or a single day’s weariness, or a sickness of an hour—if any one were to offer to buy one of these from you at the day of Judgment; that is, if one were to offer to buy from you the reward that ariseth from it, ye would not sell it for all the gold in the world. For this shall be your song before the Lord: “Laetati sumus pro diebus quibus nos humiliasti—annis quibus vidimus mala;”<sup>6</sup> that is, We are glad now, O Lord, for the days in which thou didst humble us with the wrongs we suffered from other men; and, we are glad now, O Lord, for the years in which we were sick and saw pain and sorrow. Every worldly affliction is God’s ambassador. Men will receive honourably the messenger of a man of rank, and make him gladly welcome; and so much the more if he is intimately acquainted with the King of Heaven. (And who was more intimate with the heavenly King) while He dwelt here, than was this ambassador?—that is, worldly suffering, which never left him until his life’s end. This messenger that I am speaking of to you—what doth he say to you? He comforteth you in this manner. As God loved me, saith he, he sent me to his dear friend. My coming, and my abiding, though it may seem bitter, is yet salutary. Must not that thing be dreadful, the shadow of which you could not look upon for dread? And if the very shadow were so sharp and so hot, that ye might not feel it without pain, what would you say of the very awful thing itself, from which it comes? Know ye this for certain, that all the misery of this world is only as a shadow in comparison with the misery of hell. I am the shadow, saith this messenger, that is, this world’s suffering: ye must needs receive me, or that dreadful misery of which I am the shadow. Whoso receiveth me gladly, and maketh me cheerfully welcome, my Lord sends her word that she is freed from the thing of which I am the shadow. Lo! thus speaketh God’s messenger; and therefore saith St. James, “Omne gaudium existimate fratres, cum in temptationes varias inciditis.”<sup>7</sup> Count it all joy to fall into divers of these temptations that are called outward; and St. Paul saith, “Omnis disciplina in presenti videtur esse non gaudii, sed mœroris; postmodum vero,” etc.<sup>8</sup> All those temptations wherewith we are now beaten, seem sorrow and not joy; but they turn afterwards to prosperity and eternal blessedness.

TEMPTATIONS

Holy meditations are comprehended in a verse that was long since taught you, my dear sisters:

<sup>3</sup> St. Matt. xii. 36.<sup>4</sup> Acts xxvii. 34.<sup>5</sup> Psal. xc. 15.<sup>6</sup> Heb. xiii. 11.<sup>7</sup> St. James i. 2.<sup>8</sup> Eccles. xxi. 10.

Mors tua, mors Domini, nota culpae, gaudia coeli,
Judicii terror, figantur mente fideli.

That is,

Think oft, with sorrow of heart, of thy sins.
Think also of the pains of hell, and of the joys of heaven.

Think also of thine own death, and of the cross of Christ.

Have oft in thy mind the fearful doom of the judgment day.

And think how false this world is, and what are its rewards.

Think also what thou owest God for his goodness.

It would require a long while to explain fully every one of these words. But, if I hasten quickly onward, tarry ye the longer. I say one word in regard to your sins: that when ye think of the pains of hell and the joys of heaven, ye must understand that God designed to exhibit them, in some manner, to men in this world, by worldly pains and worldly joys;
and he showed them as it were a shadow—for the likeness to them is no greater. Ye are above the sea of this world, upon the bridge of heaven. See that ye be not like the horse that is shy, and blencheth at a shadow upon the high bridge, and falleth down into the water from the high bridge. They are, indeed, too shy who flee through fear of a picture that seemeth to them ghastly and terrible to behold.
All pain and pleasure in this world is only like a shadow—it is all only as a picture.

THE LADDER OF PAIN

"Vilitas et asperitas," contempt and ill usage; these two things, ignominy and pain, as St. Bernard saith, are the two arms of the ladder which reach up to heaven, and between those arms are fixed the staves (or steps) of all the virtues by which men climb up to the blessedness of heaven. And because David had the two arms of this ladder, though he was king, he climbed upward, and said boldly to our Lord, "Vide humilitatem meam et laborem meum, et dimitte universa delicta mea."<sup>9</sup>
"Behold," said he, "and see my humility and my labour, and forgive me all my sins." Mark well these two words which David joineth together—labour and humility: labour, in pain and grief, in anxiety and sorrow; humility, against the unjust ignominy which a man endures who is despised. "Behold in me both of these," saith David the beloved of God,
"I have these two arms of the ladder." "Di-mitte universa delicta mea:" Leave behind me, saith he, and cast away from me all my offences, that I may be lightened of their weight, and may mount up lightly to heaven

by the arms of this ladder.

AN IRRUPTION OF THE TARTARS

(From Historia Anglorum, translated by
J. A. GILES)

In this year,<sup>1</sup> that human joys might not long continue, and that the delights of this world might not last long unmixed with lamentation, an immense horde of that detestable race of Satan, the Tartars, burst forth from their mountain-bound regions, and making their way through rocks apparently impenetrable, rushed forth, like demons loosed from Tartarus (so that they are well called Tartars, as it were inhabitants of Tartarus); and overrunning the country, covering the face of the earth like locusts, they ravaged the eastern countries with lamentable destruction, spreading fire and slaughter wherever they went. Roving through the Saracen territories they razed cities to the ground, burnt woods, pulled down castles, tore up the vine-trees, destroyed gardens, and massacred the citizens and husbandmen; if by chance they did spare any who begged their lives, they compelled them, as slaves of the lowest condition, to fight in front of them against their own kindred.
And if they only pretended to fight, or perhaps warned their countrymen to fly, the Tartars following in their rear, slew them; and if they fought bravely and conquered, they gained no thanks by way of recompense, and thus these savages ill-treated their captives as though they were horses. The men are inhuman and of the nature of beasts, rather to be called monsters than men, thirsting after and drinking blood, and tearing and devouring the flesh of dogs and human beings; they clothe themselves in the skins of bulls, and are armed with iron lances;
they are short in stature and thickset, compact in their bodies, and of great strength; invincible in battle, indefatigable in labour; they wear no armour on the back part of their bodies, but are protected by it in front; they drink the blood which flows from their flocks, and consider it a delicacy; they have large and powerful horses, which eat leaves and even the trees themselves, and which, owing to the shortness of their legs, they mount by three steps instead of stirrups. They have no human laws, know no mercy, and are more cruel than lions or

bears; they have boats made of the hides of oxen, ten or twelve having one amongst them; they are skilful in sailing or swimming, hence they cross the largest and most rapid rivers without any delay or trouble; and when they have no blood, they greedily drink disturbed and even muddy water. They have swords and daggers with one edge, they are excellent archers, and they spare neither sex, age, or rank; they know no other country's language except that of their own, and of this all other nations are ignorant. For never till this time has there been any mode of access to them, nor have they themselves come forth, so as to allow any knowledge of their customs or persons to be gained through common intercourse with other men; they take their herds with them, as also their wives, who are brought up to war, the same as the men; and they came with the force of lightning into the territories of the Christians, laying waste the country, committing great slaughter, and striking inexpressible terror and alarm into every one.

The founders of their tribes are called gods, and they celebrate their solemnities at certain seasons; they have many especial celebrations, but only four regular ones. They think that everything was made for them alone, and they think that there is no cruelty in practising every kind of severity on those who rebel against them. They have hard and robust breasts, lean and pale faces, stiff, high shoulders, and short distorted noses; their chins are sharp and prominent, the upper jaw low and deep, the teeth long and few, their eyebrows stretch from the hair to the nose, their eyes are black and restless, their countenances long and grim, their extremities bony and nervous, their legs thick but short below the knee. In stature they are equal to us, for what they lose below the knee is made up for in the greater length of their upper parts. Their native country is that great waste, formerly a desert, lying beyond the Chaldees, from which they expelled the lions, bears, and other beasts, with their bows and other warlike weapons. Out of the tanned hides of these animals, they made for themselves armour of a light description, but impenetrable.

OF AN UNUSUAL SWELLING AND COM-MOTION OF THE SEA

A. D. 1250

(From the same)

About the same time, namely on the first day of the month of October, the moon being in its first quarter, there appeared a new moon swollen and red in appearance, as a sign of coming tempests; according to the experimental writings of the philosopher and poet:

<sup>5</sup> Promittit de more rubens nova Cynthia ventos,
Caumate vel Borea valido nisi præpediatur:
Turgida dat nimbos, seu pallida clara serenum.

(When Cynthia yet is new, and ruddy tints
O'erspread her face, it threatens gusts of wind,
Unless excess of heat or cold prevent.

Her face, if swollen, portendeth storms; but,
pale

And bright, she clears the face of heaven.)

<sup>15</sup> The sky then, in the first week of the increase of the moon, was covered with a thick mist, and began to be much disturbed by the violence of the winds, which tore away the branches and the leaves which were then dying away on the trees, and carried them to a great distance through the air. What was more destructive, the disturbed sea transgressed its usual bounds, the tide flowing twice without any ebb, and emitted such a frightful roaring sound, that, even in parts remote from it, it created amazement in those who heard it; even old men, and indeed none of modern times, remembered ever to have seen the like before. In the darkness of the night too the sea appeared to burn like a fire, and the billows seemed to crowd together, as though fighting with one another, in such fury, that the skill of sailors could not save their sinking ships, and large and firmly-built vessels were sunk and lost. Not to mention other cases, at the port of Hertbourne alone <sup>35</sup> three noble ships were swallowed up by the raging billows, besides small ones and others of moderate size. At Winchelsea, a port on the eastern coast, besides the salt-houses, and the abodes of fishermen, the bridges, and mills which were destroyed, more than three hundred houses in that village, with some churches, were thrown down by the impetuous rise of the sea. Holland in England,<sup>1</sup> and Holland on the continent also, as well as Flanders and other level countries adjoining the sea, sustained irreparable damage. The rivers falling into the sea were forced back and swelled to such a degree that they overflowed meadows, destroyed mills, bridges, and the houses adjacent to them, and, invading the fields, carried away the corn which had not been stored away in the barns; that the anger of God plainly appeared to mortals in the sea as well as on land, and the punishment of sinners appeared imminent, according to the prophecy of Habakkuk: "Art thou angered in the rivers, oh Lord, or is thy indignation in the sea?"

FREEDOM

(From The Bruce,<sup>2</sup> c. 1375)

Ah! Freedom is a noble thing! 225
Freedom makes man to have liking;<sup>3</sup>
Freedom all solace to man giveth,
He liveth at ease that freely liveth.
A noble heart may have no ease, 229
May have naught else that may him please,
If freedom fail'th; for free liking
Is yearned for o'er all other thing.
Nay, he that aye has livèd free
May not know well the propertie,
The anger, nay, the wretched doom 235
That coupled is to foul thralldóme,
But if he had assayed it
Then all perforce he should it wit;<sup>4</sup>
And should think freedom more to prize
Than all the gold in world that is. 240
Thus contrar thingés evermore
Disclosers of the other are.

THE PEARL<sup>1</sup>

(c. 1370)

I

Pearl, princes prize, and men essay
To safely close in gold most clear!
Of Orient pearls, I surely say,
Never was found its precious peer;
So round, so radiant in array, 5
So small, so smooth its surface fair.
Whenever I judged of jewels gay
I set it singly in singlere.<sup>2</sup>

Alas! I lost it in an arbère: <sup>3</sup>
Through grass to ground it from me got. 10
I droop, death-stricken by love-daungère,<sup>4</sup>
For my own pearl without a spot.

II

Since in that spot it from me sprung,
Oft have I waited, wishing that weal<sup>5</sup>
That once was wont dispel my wrong, 15
Lift up my lot, my spirit heal.

<sup>5</sup> Bliss.

But now, struck through with sorrows strong,
Its loss my burning breast must feel.
Yet heard I ne'er so sweet a song
As the still hour let to me steal. 20
Strange thoughts their shapes but half reveal,
As I muse on its colour, all clad in clay.
O mould! thou marrest a wondrous jewél,
My precious pearl that hath slipped away.

III

Lo! there sweet spices needs must spread 25
Where so much wealth to earth has run;
Flowers golden, blue, and red,
Shine full sheen against the sun.
Never may fruit and flower fade
Where my pearl sank down in the earth-mould
dun; 30
For each grass must grow from seed-grain dead,
No wheat were else for harvest won;
From good each good is aye begun;
So precious a seed must perish not;
Spices must spring from this chosen one, 35
From this precious pearl without a spot.

IV

To this spot that I in speech expoun<sup>6</sup>
I entered, in that arbour green,
In August, in a high sesoun,
When corn is cut with sickle keen. 40
On a mound where once my pearl rolled down
Fell shadows of flowers shining and sheen,— Gillyfleur, ginger, and gromyloun,<sup>7</sup>
And peonies powdered all between.
If it were seemly but to be seen, 45
Still sweeter the scent it gave, I wot,
Where dwells that blessed one I ween,
My precious pearl without a spot.

V

Prone in that place, wild hands I pressed,
Clutched as with freezing cold, I fought; 50
Grief grew to tumult in my breast,
Reason nor calm, nor comfort brought.
I plained my pearl that earth possessed,
And vainly strove with struggling thought.
Though Christ's compassion offered rest, 55
My wretched will against it wrought.
I fell upon the flowery ground,
Sweet odours o'er my senses streamed,
Till, sunk in depths of sleep profound,
About my spotless pearl I dreamed. 60

VI

From thence my soul sprang far in space,
My body on ground abode in sweven.<sup>8</sup>
My ghost is gone by Goddès grace,
Through ways unknown and wondrous driven.

I wist not in this world the place, 65
 But I felt me rapt past great rocks riven:
 Towards a forest I turned my face
 Where splendid cliffs soared high to heaven;
 Their light no man may well believe,
 For a glistening glory from them gleamed;
 The loom no silks has ever given 71
 With colours so clear as from them streamed.

VII

Adornéd was each hilly side
 With crystal cliffs of clearest kind.
 The forests fair about them bide 75
 With tree-bolls blue as blue of Ind;
 Their leaves, like silver's burnished pride,
 A-flutter in the fragrant wind
 With glinting gleams show glorified,
 In shimmering splendors half-defined. 80
 The gravel, that each foot may grind,
 Was precious pearl of Orient,
 Sunlight itself seemed dull and blind
 Beside that land of wonderment.

VIII

The splendor of those hill-sides rare 85
 Made my glad heart its grief forget;
 The fruits so fresh of fragrance were
 I was fed-full with odours sweet.
 Birds flitted through that forest fair
 Of flaming hues, both small and grete; 90
 No citole's<sup>9</sup> string nor gitternere<sup>10</sup>
 Their mirthful music might repeat.
 For, when these birds their winges beat,
 Then sing they all with sweet concent.
 No man knows rapture so complete 95
 As sight and sound together lent.

IX

The woods are rich in radiant guise,
 Where'er by Fortune led, I fare,
 And shining glories glad mine eyes,
 That no man may with tongue declare. 100
 I wander on in happy wise,
 For steepest cliff seems harmless there.
 The farther I fared the fairer 'gan rise
 Meads bright with bloom, and spice, and pear,
 Green-bordered brooks, and river fair, 105
 Its banks as thread of finest gold.
 Win I at last to a water rare;—
 Dear Lord! 'twas lovely to behold.

X

The margent of that wondrous deep
 Was shining bank of beryl bright. 110
 Sweetly the sliding waters sweep,
 With a murmurous music they take their flight.
 The bottom, gleaming stones doth keep,
 That glow through the lucent depths like light,
 Or shining stars, which, while men sleep, 115
 Wink in the welkin on Winter's night.

<sup>9</sup> Citole, a small dulcimer; a stringed instrument, resembling a zither.

<sup>10</sup> Gitternere, a player on the gittern, or cithern (zither).

Each shining stone that shimmered to sight
 Was sapphire, or some jewel rare,
 They lit the deep with living might,
 So clear that lovely land and fair. 120

XI

The rich array of down and dales,
 Of wood and water and wide plains,
 Bred in me bliss, abated bales,
 Released my stress, destroyed my pains.
 Along the stream that strongly haies<sup>11</sup> 125
 All rapt I roved, brimfull my brains.
 The farther I followed those wat'ry vales
 The greater the joy at my glad heart strains.
 Though Fortune's gifts no force constrains,
 Lend she solace or sorrows sore, 130
 The wight who once her favour gains
 Strives ever to win more and more.

XII

Far more of bliss glowed in such guise
 Than I could tell if time I had;
 For mortal heart may not suffice 135
 For tenth part of that rapture glad.
 I thought in truth that Paradise
 Lay just beyond those bright banks brade.<sup>12</sup>
 The waters, methought, as bounds arise
 Twixt garden and garden, between them made.
 Beyond the brook, by slope and shade, 141
 Stands the Holy City, beyond the shore.
 But the water was deep, I durst not wade,
 And ever my longing grew more and more.

XIII

Mair and mair, and yet much mair 145
 I longed beyond that stream to stand;
 For if 'twas fair where I did fare
 Far fairer gleamed that farther land.
 Stumbling I strove, looked here and there
 To find a ford, on every hand; 150
 But of greater perils I grew aware
 The longer I searched that shining strand.
 And yet, it seemed I must burst the band,
 So strong was the call of that distant shore.
 When lo! the sight mine eyes next scanned 155
 Stirred my strained spirit more and more.

XIV

A marvel 'gan my ghost confound;
 I saw, beyond that merry mere,
 A cliff, from whose clear depths profound
 Streamed lights that lit the golden air. 160
 Beneath, a child sate on the ground,
 A maid of mien full debonair;
 White, shining garments girt her round;—
 I knew,—I had seen her other-where.
 As gold in threads that men may shear, 165
 So sheen she shone upon that shore.
 The longer I looked upon her there
 The surer I knew her, more and more.

<sup>12</sup> Broad.

XV

And as I fed on her fair face,
 And searched her child-like figure o'er, 170
 Pure gladness did my soul embrace,
 That I had lacked so long before.
 To call her would I fain find grace,
 But stunned I stood, bewildered sore;
 I saw her in so strange a place, 175
 That dazed the sight no meaning bore.
 She lifts her brow, well-known of yore,
 Her face as smooth as ivory;
 My wild dismay grows more and more,
 My soul is stung with what I see. 180

XVI

Stronger than longing, fear arose;
 I stood quite still and durst not call;
 Wide-eyed I wait, my lips I close,
 As mute as hooded hawk in hall.
 That sight so strange, so spectral rose, 185
 I feared the end that might befall;
 The dread lest she escape me grows,
 Or vanish ere I could forestall.
 Then she, whose shining lightened all,
 So soft, so smooth, so pure, so slight, 190
 Rose up robed in array royal,
 A pearl, in precious pearls dight.

XVII

Pearls that would grace a kingly power,
 A man might there by grace have seen,
 When fresh and fair as lily-flower, 195
 Adown the shore she stepped, I ween.
 Her linen robe, a royal dower,
 Flowed free; its lustrous borders been Purfled with pearls: before that hour
 Such sight mine eyes had never seen. 200
 Her flowing sleeve-laps showed full sheen
 With pearls, in double border dight:
 Her kirtle, where it showed between,
 With precious pearls gleamed pure and bright. . . . 204

XX

All rich in pearls that rare one bright 229
 Drew near the shore beyond the flood;
 From here to Greece no gladder wight
 Than I, when by the brink she stood.
 Nearer than niece or aunt, of right
 I found in her my joy and good.
 Then low she bowed her figure slight, 235
 Cast by her crown in happy mood,
 And as I looked, I understood,
 And heard her greet me full of grace.
 Dear Lord! who me with life endued
 'Twas worth it all to see her face. 240

XXI

"O Pearl," I cried, "in pearls dight,
 Art thou that pearl that I have plained<sup>13</sup>
 Much missed by me alone, at night?
 What longing have I long sustained

<sup>13</sup> Bewailed.

Since into grass you slipped from sight. 245
 Pensive, oppressed, I pine sore pained,
 While you, at rest in realm of light,
 In Paradise a home have gained.
 What Weird has thither my gem constrained,
 And brought me this grief and great daungère! 250
 Since we in twain were torn and twained,
 I have been a joyless jewelér."

XXII

That jewel there, with jewels graced,
 Lifted her face with eyes of grey,
 Her crown of orient pearl replaced, 255
 And grave and slow did sweetly say:—
 "Sir, you mistake and speak in haste
 To say your pearl is all away;
 In coffer is it safely placed,
 Shut safe within this garden gay, 260
 To dwell forever there, and play
 Where sin and sorrow come never near,
 This spot were thy treasure house, parlay,
 If thou wert a gentle jewelér.

XXIII

"But jewelér gentle, if thou dost give 265
 Thy joy for a gem thou deemed'st dear,
 In sooth thou dost but thyself deceive,
 Vexed in vain with a foolish fear.
 For you lost but a rose, you may well believe,
 That must flower and fade with the fading year,
 Yet so wondrous a dust did that rose receive 271
 That it proved a pearl in this shining sphere.
 Though thou called'st thy Weird a thief,
 'tis clear
 From nought it has gained the great treasure;
 To blame the hand that has helped thee
 here
 Shows thee a thankless jewelér." 276

[After the Dreamer has been urged to be patient, he sees the Maiden in Heaven and is filled with a great longing to join her.]

XCVII

Drawn by delight of eye and ear, 1153
 My yearning mood to madness grows;
 I would be with my dear one there, 1155
 Though swift the severing current flows.
 Nothing will harm me if on I fare,
 Or lame me, methought, by baffling blows;
 If I only the plunge in the stream can dare
 I will swim the space though the waves oppose,
 Or die in the deed. Yet a thought arose 1161
 Ere I plunged perverse in that water chill,
 That stilled my impatience and brought repose
 For I knew it was not my Prince's will.

XCVIII

It pleased Him not that I should break 1167
 Through those marvellous marches unafraid,

As rash and rude my course I take
 My daring onset is sudden stayed:
 For as to the brink my way I make
 With a start I find my vision fade, 1170
 And lo! in that arbour fair I wake,
 My head on that selfsame hillock laid
 On that spot where my pearl into earth
 once strayed.
 Awe-stricken, silent, I sate alone,
 Then sighing deep to myself I said: 1175
 "May the Prince's will in all be done."

THE SEASONS

(From Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight,<sup>1</sup>
 c. 1370)

For the Yule-tide had yielded, and the year
 after, 500
 And each several season ensued after other.
 Thus after Christmas came crabbed Lent-time,
 That affords fish for flesh, and food the most simple.
 But then the world's weather with winter is warring; 504
 Winter withdraws himself, white clouds uplift;
 Soft descendeth the rain in showers full warm,
 They fall on fair fields and the flowers are showing,
 Both the ground and the grove now with green
 are arrayed,
 Birds bestir them to build, and bravely are singing
 For solace of summer ensuing thereafter 510
 On bank,
 And blossoms bud and blow
 On hedge-rows rich and rank,
 And noble notes enow
 Are heard in woodlands dank. 515

Then comes the season of summer, bathed in soft breezes,
 Breezes that breathe themselves into seedling and herbage,
 Blithesome, in truth, is the blossom that bloom-
 eth therefrom,
 When the drenching dews drip down from the leavés, 519
 Biding the blissful beams of the bright sunnè.
 Next harvest hies him, and hardens the grain,
 He warns it ere winter to wax full ripe;
 The dust of the drought he driveth aloft,
 From the face of the fields it flies full high; 524
 Wild winds of the welkin war with the sunnè,
 The leaves of the woodland lie low on the
 ground,
 And all grey is the grass that all green was so lately.
 Then all ripens and rotteth that rose up in flower, 528
 And thus yieldeth the year to yesterdays many:
 To know winter is nearing, now need we to tell us

No sage.
 When Michaelmas's moon
 Was come with winter's gage,
 Then thought Gawayne full soon 535
 Of his dread pilgrimage.

SIR GAWAYNE'S JOURNEY

(From the same)

Now wends he his way through the wild tracts of Logres,<sup>1</sup>
 Sir Gawayne on God's hest, and no game he thought it.
 Oft alone he alights, and lies down at night-fall
 Where he found not before him fare to his liking.
 O'er field and in forest, no friend but his horse,
 No comrade but God for counsel had he, 696
 Till at length he draws near to the land of North Wales.
 All Anglesey's isles on the left hand he leaves,
 And fares o'er the fording hard by the foreland,
 Over at Holy-head, till he had journeyed 700
 To Wirral's<sup>2</sup> wilderness, where few are dwelling
 Who God or man with good hearts regard.
 Fain would he find from men that he met with News of a Knight in that neighborhood dwelling
 Who garbed him in green, or of a green chapel.
 All denied him with "nay," saying not in a lifetime 706
 Wist they ever a wight that was of such hués
 Of green.
 The Knight rode ways most strange,
 The rocky banks between, 710
 And oft his cheer<sup>3</sup> doth change,
 Ere he that church hath seen.

Many cliffs he climbed over in countries far distant;
 As out-cast, cut off from companions, he rides.
 At each way through the water where he crossed over, 715
 He a foe found before him,—but phantom it
 was,—
 So foul and so fell that to fight it behoved him.
 So many a marvel in these mountains he findeth,
 'Twere tedious to tell the tenth of those wonders.
 Now with serpents he struggles, and strives with wolves also, 720
 Satyrs sometimes assail him, strange shapes
 from the rocks,
 Both with bulls and with bears, and with boars
 otherwhiles,
 Or with monsters that meet him, huge men of the fells.
 He was fearless, unfalt'ring and faithful to God,
 Or he doubtless had died, for death threatened him oft. 725

But war he could wage, yet the winter was worse,
 When the cold chilling waters, from storm-
 clouds down pouring,
 Would freeze ere they fell on the fallow beneath.
 Near slain with the sleet, he slept in his armour,
 More nights than enough on the naked rocks,
 While clattering o'er the cliff the cold brook comes down, 731
 And high o'er his head hard icicles hang.
 Thus in perils and pains and plights the most hard,
 Till Christmas eve cometh, he keepeth alone
 His quest. 735
 Humbly the Knight, that tide,
 Besought of Mary Blest,
 That she his way would guide
 Unto some place of rest.

At morn by a mountain he merrily rideth, 740
 Through a woodland full wild that was wondrous and deep,
 High hills on each hand, with a holt stretching under
 Of hoar oaks full huge, a hundred together;
 And tangled thickets of thorn and of hazel,
 With shaggy robes of rough ragged mosses; 745
 Many birds sit unblithely on the bare twigs,
 And piteously pipe for pain of the cold.
 The rider on Gringolet rideth beneath them
 Through mire and marshes, a man all alone, 749
 Perturbed in his toil lest to him 'twere forbidden
 To share in His service, who, on that same night,
 Was born of a maid, all our sorrows to cure.
 Therefore sighing he said: "I beseech Thee, O
 Lord,
 And Mary, mildest mother so dear,
 Some shelter to show me, some spot to hear mass 755
 And thy matins at morn, this meekly I beg,
 And thus promptly I pray, my Pater, and Ave,
 And Creed."
 So as he rode he prayed,
 And mourned for his misdeed, 760
 The holy sign he made,
 And said: "Christ's Cross me speed."

THE PRAISE OF PEACE<sup>1</sup>

Unto the Worthy and Noble Kinge Henry the Fourth
 (c. 1399)

O noble worthy king, Henry the ferthé,
 In whom the gladdé fortune is befallé
 The people to govérne here upon erthé,
 God hath thee chose, in comfort of us allé;

<sup>1</sup> The Praise of Peace (or De Pacis Commendatione, as Gower entitled it) was a poem of welcome to Henry IV., on his accession to the throne in 1399. Gower had been distressed and disappointed by the misgovernment of Richard II.; in this poem he greets the new King, as one who, he trusts, will bring in a better time.

The worship of this land, which was doun fallé, 5
 Now stant upright, through grace of thy goodnessé,
 Which every man is holdé for to blessé.

The highé God, of his justýce aloné,
 The right which longeth to thy regalyé
 Declaréd hath to stande in thy personé; 10
 And more than God may no man justifyé.
 Thy title is knowé upon thyn auncestryé;
 The londes folk hath eek thy right affermé;
 So stant thy regne, of God and man confirméd.

There is no man may say in other wisé 15
 That God him-self ne hath the right declaréd;
 Whereof the land is boun to thy srvysé,
 Which for default of help hath longé caréd.
 But now there is no mannés hearté sparéd
 To love and serve, and worké thy pleasauncé;
 And all this is through Goddés purveyancé. 21

In allé thing which is of God begonné
 There followeth grace, if it be well govérnéd;
 Thus tellen they which oldé bokés conné,
 Whereof, my lord, I wot well thou art lernéd. 25
 Ask of thy God; so shalt thou not be wernéd
 Of no request (the) which is reasonable;
 For God unto the good is favorable. . . .

Peace is the chief of all the worldés welthé,
 And to the heaven it leadeth eek the way; 30
 Peace is of soul and life the mannés helthé
 Of pestilence, and doth the war away.
 My liegé lord, tak heed of what I say,
 If werré may be left, tak peace on hondé,
 Which may not be withouté Goddés sondé. 35

With peace stands every créature in resté,
 Withouté peace there may no life be glad;
 Above all other good, peace is the besté;
 Peace hath him-self, whan war is all bestad;<sup>2</sup>
 The peace is safe, the war is ever adrad. 40
 Peace is of allé charitié the keye,
 Which hath the life and soulé for to weigh.

My liegé lord, if that thee list to seché
 The sooth ensamples, what the war hath wrought,
 Thou shalt well hear, of wisé mennés speché, 45
 That deadly werré tourneth in-to nought.
 For if these oldé bokés be well sought,
 There might thou see what thing the war hath do
 Both of conquést and conqueror alsó.

For vain honóur, or for the worldés good, 50
 They that whilom the strongé werrés made,
 Where be they now? Bethink well, in thy mood,
 The day is goon, the night is dark and fade;
 Her cruelté, which made them thanné glade,
 They sorrow now, and yet have naught the
 more; 55
 The blood is shed, which no man may restore.

<sup>2</sup> Beset.

The war is mother of the wrongës allé;
 It sleeth the priest in holy church at massé,
 Forlyth the mayde, and doth her flour to fallé.
 The war maketh the grètë citee lassé,<sup>3</sup> 60
 And doth the law his reulës overpassé.
 There is nothing, whereof mischief may growé
 Which is not causéd of the war, I trowé.

The war bringeth in poverté at his heeles,
 Whereof the common people is sore grievéd; 65
 The war hath set his cart on thilke wheelës
 Where that fortuné may not be believéd.
 For when men wené best to have achevéd,
 Full oft it is all newé to beginné; 69
 The war hath nothing siker,<sup>4</sup> though he winné.

Therefore, my worthy prince, in Christës halvé,<sup>5</sup>
 As for a part whose faith thou hast to guide,
 Lay to this oldé sore a newé salvé,
 And do the war away, what-so betidé.
 Purchasé peace, and set it by thy syde, 75
 And suffre not thy people be devoured;
 So shall thy name ever after stand honoured! . . .

My worthy liegë lord, Henry by namé,
 Which Engélond hast to govérn and righté,
 Men oughten well thy pity to proclamé, 80
 Which openly, in all the worldës sighté,
 Is shewéd, with the help of God Almightyé,
 To yeve us peace, which long hath be debated,
 Whereof thy prys<sup>6</sup> shal never be abated.

My lord, in whom hath ever yet be foundé 85
 Pity, withouté spot of violencé,
 Keep thilké peace alwáy, withinné boundé,
 Which God hath planted in thy consciencé.
 So shall the cronique of thy pacience
 Among the saints be taken in-to mémorie 90
 To the loenge<sup>7</sup> of perdurable glorie.

And to thine earthly prys, so as I can,
 Which every man is holdé to commendé,
 I Gower, which am all thy liegë man,
 This lettre unto thine excellence I sendé, 95
 As I, which ever unto my lyvës endé
 Will prayé for the stat of thy personé,
 In worship of thy sceptre and of thy throné.

Not only to my king of peace I writé,
 But to these othré princes Christen allé, 100
 That each of them his owné heart endité
 And cease the war, or more mescheef fallé.
 Set eek the rightful powe upon his stallé;
 Give charité, and draw pity to hondé, 104
 Maintainé law; and so the peace shall stondé.

PIERS THE PLOUGHMAN

PROLOGUE

In the season of summer, when soft was the sunné,
 I clad myself coarsely in a cloak as a shepherd;
 In habit as an hermit unholy of workës,
 Went I wide in this world wonders to hearé.

And on a May morning on Malverné hillës, 5
 A marvel amazed me, of magic methought.
 I was weary, for-wandered, and went me to resté

Under a broad bank, by a burn-sidé;
 And as I lay and leanéd, and looked in the waters, 9

I slumbered in a sleeping, it sounded so merry.
 Then did I dream there a dream full of wonder;
 In the wilds I was wandering, wist I not whéré.
 As I looked to the Eastward a-loft to the sunné,
 I saw set on a summit a seemly tower;
 A deep dale beneath and a dungeon thereinné,
 With deep ditches and dark, and dreadful to
 sight. 16

A fair field full of folk found I there between
 them,

With all manner of men the mean and the riché,
 Working and wandering as the world asketh.

Some put them to ploughing, playing full seldom, 20

In setting and sowing swinking<sup>1</sup> full hard,
 And winning what wasters with gluttony destroy.

And some put to pride, appareled them thereafter,

In fancies of fashion finely arrayéd.

To prayers and to penance put themselves
 many, 25

All for love of our Lord living full strict,
 In the hope for to have heavenly blissé;
 As anchorets and hermits that hold in their cellës,

In the world never wishing to wander about,
 Or with bounteous abundance their bodies to please. 30

And some chose to chaffer, their chances to better,

For it seems to our sight that such men are most thriving.

And some to make merry, as minstrels are able,
 And get gold with their glee, guiltless I deem
 them.

But jesters and jugglers, Judas's children, 35
 Found out false fantasies and feigned themselves foolish,

Yet have wit at their will, to work were they willing.

That Paul preacheth<sup>2</sup> of them prove now I dare not;

Qui loquitur turpiloquium is Lucifer's slave.

There bidders and beggars right busily wandered, 40

Their bags and their bellies with bread fully crammed;

They gegined want of food, and fought o'er the ale-cups,

In gluttony, God wot, go they to beddè,
 And rise up with ribaldry, these Robert's men.<sup>3</sup>

So sleeping and sloth pursue them forever. 45
 Pilgrims and palmers plighted them together

<sup>1</sup> Toiling.

<sup>2</sup> I might prove that St. Paul's words "if a man does not work neither shall he eat," apply to these children of Judas, but I dare not, because he who speaks evil (Qui turpiloquium loquitur) is Lucifer's servant.

To seek for Saint James<sup>4</sup> and the saintes at Rome,
 Went forth in their way with many wise stories,
 And had leave for to lie, all their life after.
 I saw some that said they had sought out the saintes; 50
 With tongues tempered to lie in each tale that they toldé,
 More than to say sooth it seemed by their speech.
 Hermits in an heap, with hooked stavés
 To Walsingham<sup>5</sup> wended,—their wenches came after.
 Great lubbers and lazy that loth were to swinke, 55
 Clothed them in copes to be counted as “brethren,”
 In habit of hermit their ease for to have.
 ( I found there the friars of all the four orders,
 They preached to the people to profit themselves,
 Glossing the Gospel as was their good pleasure.
 For, coveting copes, they construed as they would. 61
 For many of these masters may dress as it likes
 them,
 For their money and merchandise marchen together,
 For since Charity hath been chapman and chief to shrive lordes,
 Many ferlies<sup>6</sup> have fallen in a few yearés. 65
 If Holy Church and they hold not better together,
 The most mischief on mold<sup>7</sup> is mounting full fast.
 There preachéd a Pardoner, a priest as he were,
 And brought forth a Bull with the Bishopés
 sealés,
 And said that himself might assoilen<sup>8</sup> them
 allé
 Of falseness in fasting, and vows they had broken. 71
 The unlettered believed him and liked well his wordés,
 Coming up to him kneeling and kissing his Bullés,
 Then he banged them with his brevet and bearded their eyen,<sup>9</sup> . . . 74
 Thus they give up their gold these gluttons to help. . . . 76
 Were the Bishop but blessed and worth both his earés, 78
 He would send not his seal for deceiving the people.
 But ’tis not at the Bishop that the boy
 preaches,
 For Pardoner and priest part between them the silver,

And the poor of the parish may have what is left.
 Parsons and parish-priests plained to the Bishop,
 As their parishes were poor since the pestilence
 time, 84
 To have licence and leave at London to dwellé,
 And they sing thus for simony,—for silver is sweet.
 Bishops and bachelors both masters and doctors,
 That hold cures<sup>10</sup> under Christ and have crowning<sup>11</sup> in token
 And sign that they should their parishioners
 shrive,
 And preach and to pray for them, and the poor
 feedé, 90
 Are living in London, in Lent-time and other.
 Some are serving the King, and his silver are taking,
 In Exchequer and Chancery, claiming his debtes
 Due from wards in the wardmote,<sup>12</sup> both waifs and estrays,
 And some serve as servants the lords and the ladies, 95
 And instead of stewards they sit and condemn/Their mass and their matins and most of the hours
 Are done undevoutly; dread is at the last That Christ in His Council should curse very
 many. . . . 99
 There hovered an hundred in hoodés of silké,
 Sergeants it seemed that served at the barré,
 Pleading for pennies and poundés the laws, 212
 And naught for love of our Lord unloose their lips onés.<sup>13</sup>
 Better measure the mist on Malverné’s hillés,
 Than get a mum from these mouthés till money be showed. 215
 Baron and burgesses and bond-men also,
 I saw there assembled, as ye shall hear after.
 Bakers and brewers, and butchers a-many,
 And weavers of woolens, and weavers of linen,
 Tailors and tanners, and toilers of earth. 220
 Masons and miners, and many a craft.
 Of all living labourers leaped, some of each
 kind,
 As ditchers and delvers that do their deeds ill,
 And drag out the long day with “Dieu vous sauve, Dame,”<sup>14</sup> 224
 Cooks and their knavés cried “hoté pies, hoté!
 Good gris<sup>15</sup> and geese,—go now to dine,—go!”
 And unto them Taverners toldé the samé, “White wine of Oseye,<sup>16</sup> and red wine of Gascoigne 228
 Of the Rhine and of Rochelle the roast to defy!”
 And this I saw sleeping and seven times moré.

THE PROLOGUE

A thousande tymes I have herd men telle,
That ther is joy in hevене, and peyne in helle,
And I accordé wel that it is so;
But, natheles, yet wot I wel also,
That ther is noon dwelling in this cuntree, 5
That eythir hath in hevене or in helle y-be,
Ne may of hit noon other weyès witen,
But as he hath herd seyde, or founde it writen;
For by assay ther may no man it preve.

But God forbedé but men shuldé leve<sup>2</sup> 10
Wel moré thing than men han seen with eye!
Men shal not wenen everything a lye
But-if hymselfe it seeth, or ellés dooth;
For, God wot, thing is never the lassé sooth,
Thogh every wight ne may it not y-see. 15
Bernarde,<sup>3</sup> the monke, ne saugh nat al, parde!
Than moté we to bokés that we fynde,—
Thurgh which that oldé thingès ben in mynde,

And to the doctrine of these oldé wyse, 20
Yevé credénce, in every skylful wise,
That tellen of these olde apprevéd stories,
Of holynesse, of regnés, of victories,
Of love, of hate, of other sondry thynges
Of whiche I may not maken rehersynges.
And if that oldé bokés were away, 25
Y-lorné<sup>4</sup> were of rémembraunce the key.
Wel ought us, thanne, honóuren and beleve
These bokés, ther we han noon other preve.
And as for me, though that I konne but lyte, 30
On bokés for to rede I me delyte,
And to hem yive I feyth and ful credénce,
And in myn herte have hem in reverence
So hertely, that ther is gamé<sup>5</sup> noon
That from my bokés maketh me to goon, 35
But it be seldom on the holyday,
Save, certeynly, whan that the month of May
Is comen, and that I here the foulés<sup>6</sup> syngé,
And that the flourés gynnen for to spryngé,—
Farewel my boke, and my devocion!

Now have I thanne suche a condicion, 40
That of alle the flourés in the mede,
Than love I most thise flourés white and rede,
Suche as men callen daysyes in our toun.
To hem have I so grete affeccion,
As I seyde erst, whan comen is the May, 45
That in my bed ther daweth me no day,
That I nam up and walkyng in the mede,
To seen this floure agein the sonnè sprede,

<sup>1</sup> This poem (like its greater successor, The Canterbury Tales), consists of a number of separate stories, introduced by a Prologue. In the Legend, however, all the stories are of women who have been victims or martyrs to love. Chaucer apparently intended to tell the legends of nineteen good women, but the poem is unfinished.

<sup>2</sup> Believe

<sup>3</sup> Bernard of Clairvaux (1091-1153). Even St. Bernard, holy and wise as he was, did not see everything. The passage is founded on a Latin proverb "Bernardus monachus non videt omnia."

<sup>6</sup> Birds.

Whan it uprysith erly by the morwe;
That blisful sighté softneeth al my sorwe, 50
So glad am I, whan that I have présence
Of it, to doon it allé reverence,
As she that is of allé flourés flour,
Fulfilled of al vertu and honour,
And evere iliké<sup>7</sup> faire, and fresshe of hewe.
And I love it, and evere yliké newe, 56
And ever shal, til that myn herté dye;
Al swere I nat, of this I wol nat lye;
Ther lovéd no wight hotter in his lyve.

And whan that it is eve, I renné blyve,<sup>8</sup> 60
As sone as evere the sonnè gynneth weste,
To seen this flour, how it wol go to reste,
For fere of nyght, so hateth she derknesse!
Hir chere<sup>9</sup> is pleynly sprad in the brightnesse
Of the sonnè, for ther it wol uncloze. 65
Allas, that I ne had Englyssh, ryme or prose
Súffisant this flour to preyse aright!
But helpeth ye that han konnyng<sup>10</sup> and myght,
Ye lovers, that kan make<sup>11</sup> of sentémēt;
In this case oghté ye be diligent 70
To forthren me somewhat in my labóur,
Whethir ye ben with the Leef or with the Flour;
For wel I wot, that ye han her-bifore<sup>12</sup>
Of makynge ropen,<sup>13</sup> and lad away the corne;
And I come after, glenyng here and there, 75
And am ful glad if I may fynde an ere
Of any goody word that ye han left.
And thogh it happen me rehercen eft<sup>14</sup>
That ye han in your fresshé songés sayede,
Forbereth me, and beth not evele apayede,<sup>15</sup>
Syn that ye see I do it in the honóur 81
Of love, and eke in service of the flour
Whom that I serve as I have witte or myght.
She is the clerenesse and the verray lyght,
That in this derké worlde me wynt<sup>16</sup> and ledyth,
The herte in-with my sorwful brest yow
dredith,<sup>17</sup>

And loveth so sore, that ye ben verrayly 87
The maistresse of my witte, and nothing I.
My worde, my werk, is knyht so in youre bond
That as an harpe obeith to the hond, 90
That maketh it souné after his fyngerynge,
Ryght so mowe ye oute of myn herté bringe Swich vois, ryght as yow lyst, to laughe or pleyne;

Be ye my gide, and lady sovereyne.
As to my erthely god, to yowe I calle, 95
Bothe in this werke, and in my sorwés alle.

But wherfore that I spake to yive credénce
To oldé stories, and doon hem reverence,
And that men mosten moré thyng beleve
Then they may seen at eye or elles preve, 100
That shal I seyn, whanne that I see my tyme—
I may nat al attonés<sup>18</sup> speke in ryme.
My besy<sup>19</sup> gost, that thursteth alwey newe,
To seen this flour so yong, so fresshe of hewe,
Constreynéd me with so gledy<sup>20</sup> desire, 105
That in myn herte I feelé yet the fire,
That madé me to ryse er it wer day,
And this was now the firsté morwe of May,

With dredful<sup>21</sup> hert, and glad devocion
 For to ben at the resurreccion 110
 Of this flour, whan that it shulde uncloze
 Agayne the sonne, that roos as rede as rose,
 That in the best was of the beste,<sup>22</sup> that day,
 That Agenorès doghtre<sup>23</sup> ladde away.
 And doun on knes anon-ryght I me sette, 115
 And as I koude, this fresshè flour I grette, Knelyng alwey, til it unclosèd was,
 Upon the smalè, softè, swotè<sup>24</sup> gras,
 That was with flourès swote enbrouded<sup>25</sup> al, 119
 Of swich swetnesse, and swich odour over-al,
 That for to speke of gomme,<sup>26</sup> or herbe, or tree,
 Comparisoun may noon y-makèd be;
 For it surmounteth pleynly alle odoures,
 And of richè beautè allè flourès.
 Forgeten had the erthe his pore estate 125
 Of wyntir, that him naked made and mate,<sup>27</sup>
 And with his swerd of colde so sorè greved;
 Now hath the atempresounne<sup>28</sup> al that releved
 That naked was, and clad it new agayne.
 The smalè foulès, of the sesoun fayne,<sup>29</sup> 130
 That of the panter<sup>30</sup> and the nette ben scaped.
 Upon the foweler, that hem made a-whaped<sup>31</sup>
 In wynter, and destroyed hadde hire broode,
 In his dispite hem thoghte it did hem goode
 To syng of hym, and in hir songe dispise 135
 The foulè cherle, that, for his covetyse,
 Had hem betrayed with his sophistrye.

This was hir songe, "The foweler we deffye,
 And al his crafte," And sommè songen clere
 Layès of love, that joye it was to here, 140
 In worshipyng and in preysing of hir make;<sup>32</sup>
 And, for the newè blisful somers sake,
 Upon the braunchès ful of blosmès softè,
 In hire delyt, they turnèd hem ful ofte,
 And songen, "Blessèd be Seynt Valentyne! 145
 For on his day I chees you to be myne,
 Withouten répenting myne hertè swete!"
 And therewithal hire bekès gonnen meete. . . .

And tho<sup>33</sup> that haddè don unkyndènesse,—
 As doth the tydif,<sup>34</sup> for newfangelnesse,— Besoghtè mercy of hir trespassyngè, 155
 And humblèly songen hir répentynge,
 And sworn on the blosmès to be trewe,
 So that hire makès wolde upon hem rewe,<sup>35</sup>
 And at the lastè maden hir acorde.
 Alfounde they Daunger<sup>36</sup> for a tyme a lord, 160
 Yet Pitee, thurgh his strongè gentil myght,
 Foryaf, and madè Mercy passen Ryght,
 Thurgh Innocence, and ruled Curtèsye.
 But I ne clepe it innocence folye,
 Ne fals pitee, for vertue is the mene;<sup>37</sup> 165
 As Ethike seith, in swich maner I mene.
 And thus thise fowelès, voide of al malice,
 Accordeden to love, and laften vice
 Of hate, and songen alle of oon acorde, 169
 'Welcome, Somer, oure governour and lorde.'

And Zepherus and Flora gentilly
 Yaf to the flourès, softè and tenderly.

His swootè<sup>38</sup> breth, and made hem for to sprede,
 As god and goddesse of the floury mede. 174
 In whiche me thoght I myghtè, day by day,
 Dwelken alwey, the joly month of May,
 Withouten slepe, withouten mete or drynke.
 Adoun ful softely I gan to synke,
 And lenyng on myn elbowe and my syde,
 The longè day, I shoop<sup>39</sup> me for to abide, 180
 For nothing ellis, and I shal nat lye,
 But for to loken upon the dayèsie,
 That men by resoun wel it callè may
 The dayèsie, or elles the yè of day,
 The empèrice, and flourè of flourès alle. 185
 I pray to God that fairè mote she falle,<sup>40</sup>
 And alle that loven flourès, for hire sake!
 But, nathèles, ne wene nat that I make<sup>41</sup>
 In preysing of the Flour agayn the Leef, 189
 No more than of the corne agayn the sheef;
 For as to me nys lever noon, ne lother,
 I nam withholden yit with never nother.
 Ne I not<sup>42</sup> who serveth Leef, ne who the Flour.
 Wel browken<sup>43</sup> they hir service or labour!
 For this thing is al of another tonne,<sup>44</sup> 195
 Of oldè storye, er swiche thinge was begonne.

Whan that the sonne out of the southe gan
 weste,
 And that this flour gan close, and goon to reste,
 For derknesse of the nyght, the which she dredde, 199
 Home to myn house full swiftly I me spedde
 To goon to reste, and erly for to ryse,
 To seen this flour to-spedde, as I devyse.
 And in a litel herber<sup>45</sup> that I have,
 That benchèd was on turvès fressh y-grave,
 I bad men sholdè me my couchè make; 205
 For deyntee<sup>46</sup> of the newè someres sake,
 I had hem strawen flourès on my bed.

Whan I was leyde, and hadde myn eyen hed,<sup>47</sup>
 I fel on slepe, in-with an houre or two.
 Me mette<sup>48</sup> how I lay in the medewè tho, 210
 To seen this flour that I love so and drede;<sup>49</sup>
 And from a-fer come walkyng in the mede
 The god of Love, and in his hand a quene,
 And she was clad in real<sup>50</sup> habite grene;
 A fret<sup>51</sup> of gold she haddè next her heer. 215
 And upon that a whitè crowne she beer,
 With flourouns<sup>52</sup> smale, and I shal nat lye,
 For al the worlde ryght as a dayèsye
 Y-courouned is with whitè levès lyte, 219
 So were the flourouns of hire cōroune white;
 For of o<sup>53</sup> perlè, fyne, óriental,
 Hire whitè cōroune was i-makèd al,
 For which the whitè cōroune above the grene
 Máde hire lyke a daysie for to sene,
 Considered eke hir fret of golde above. 225

Y-clothèd was this mighty god of Love
 In silke enbrouded, ful of grenè greves,<sup>54</sup>
 In-with a fret of redè rosè levès,
 The freshest syn the worlde was first bygonne.

 In stede of golde, for hevynesse and wyghte;
 Therwith me thoght his facé shon so brighte
 That wel unnethes<sup>55</sup> myght I him beholde;
 And in his hande me thoght I saugh him holde
 Two firy dartés as the gledés<sup>56</sup> rede, 235
 And aungelyke his wyngés saugh I sprede.
 And, al be that men seyn that bynd is he,
 Algate<sup>57</sup> me thoghté that he myghté se;
 For sternely on me he gan byholde,
 So that his lokyng doth myn herté colde. 240
 And by the hande he helde this noble quene,
 Crownéd with white, and clothéd al in grene,
 So womanly, so bénigne, and so meke,
 That in this world, thogh that men woldé seke,
 Hálf hire beuté shuldé men nat fynde 245

 My lady comith, that al this may disteyne.<sup>59</sup>

Thy fairé body lat it nat appere, 256
 Lavyne; and thou Lucesse of Romé toun
 And Polixene, that boghten love so dere,
 And Cloepatre, with all thy passyoun, 259
 Hyde ye your trouthe of love, and your renoun,
 And thou, Tesbé, that hast of love suche payne;
 My lady comith, that al this may disteyne.

Hero, Dido, Laudómia, alle yfere,<sup>60</sup>
 And Phillis, hangying for thy Demophon,
 And Canacé, espiéd by thy chere, 265
 Ysiphilié, betrayed with Jason,
 Maketh of your trouthe neythir boost ne soun,
 Nor Ypermystre, or Adriane, ye tweyne;
 My lady cometh, that al thys may disteyne.

This balade may ful wel y-songen be, 270
 As I have seyde erst, by my lady free;
 For certeynly al thise mowe nat suffice
 To apperen wyth my lady in no wyse.
 For as the sonnè wole the fire disteyne,
 So passeth al my lady sovereyne, 275
 That is so good, so faire, so debonayre,
 I prey to God that ever falle hire faire.
 For nadde<sup>61</sup> comfort ben of hire presénce,
 I hadde ben dede, withouten any defence,
 For drede of Lovés wordés, and his chere, 280
 As, when tyme is, hereafter ye shal here.

THE CANTERBURY TALES

THE PROLOGUE

Whan that Aprill<sup>1</sup> with hise shourés soote<sup>1</sup>
 The droghte of March hath percéd to the roote,
 And bathed every veyne in swich licour<sup>2</sup>

Of which vertú engendred is the flour;
 Whan Zephirus<sup>3</sup> eek with his sweté breeth 5
 Inspired hath in every holt<sup>4</sup> and heeth
 The tendré croppés<sup>5</sup> and the yongé sonne
 Hath in the Ram<sup>6</sup> his halfé cours y-ronne,
 And smalé fowelés maken melodye,
 That slepen al the nyght with open eye 10
 (So priketh hem Nature in hir coráges),<sup>7</sup>
 Thanne longen folk to goon on pilgrimages,
 And palmeres for to seken straungé strondés,
 To ferné halwés,<sup>8</sup> kowthe<sup>9</sup> in sondry londes;
 And specially, from every shirés ende 15
 Of Engeland, to Caunterbury they wende,
 The hooly blissful<sup>10</sup> martir for to seke,
 That hem hath holpen whan that they were seeke.<sup>11</sup>

Bifl that in that seson on a day,
 In Southwerk at the Tabard<sup>12</sup> as I lay, 20
 Redy to wenden on my pilgrmage
 To Caunterbury with ful devout corage,<sup>13</sup>
 At nyght were come into that hostelrye
 Wel nyne-and-twenty in a compaignye,
 Of sondry folk, by aventure<sup>14</sup> y-falle 25
 In felawshipe, and pilgrimes were they alle,
 That toward Caunterbury wolden ryde.
 The chambres and the stables weren wyde,
 And wel we weren esed<sup>15</sup> atté beste.
 And shortly, whan the sonnè was to reste, 30
 So hadde I spoken with hem everychon,
 That I was of hir felawshipe anon,
 And madé forward<sup>16</sup> erly for to ryse,
 To take oure wey, ther as I yow devyse.
 But natheless, while I have tyme and space,
 Er that I fether in this talé pacé, 36
 Me thynketh it accordaunt to resoun
 To tellé yow al the condicioun
 Of ech of hem, so as it seméd me,
 And whiche they weren, and of what degree,
 And eek in what array that they were inne;
 And at a Knyght than wol I first begynne. 42

A KNYGHT ther was and that a worthy man,
 That fro the tymé that he first bigan
 To riden out, he lovéd chivalrie, 45
 Trouthe and honour, freedom and curteisie.
 Ful worthy was he in his lordés werre,
 And thereto hadde he riden, no man ferre,
 As wel in cristendom as in hethénesse,
 And ever honoured for his worthynesse. 50
 At Alisaundre<sup>17</sup> he was whan it was wonne;
 Ful ofté tyme he hadde the bord bigonne<sup>18</sup>
 Aboven allé nacions in Pruce.<sup>19</sup>

 A lovyere and a lusty bacheler,<sup>15</sup> 80
 With lokked crulle<sup>16</sup> as they were leyd in presse.
 Of twenty year of age he was, I gesse,
 Of his stature he was of even lengthe,<sup>17</sup>
 And wonderly delivere<sup>18</sup> and greet of strengthe;
 And he hadde been somtyme in chyvachie,<sup>19</sup> 85
 In Flaundres, in Artoys and Pycardie,
 And born hym weel, as of so lifel space,
 In hope to stonden in his lady grace.
 Embrouded<sup>20</sup> was he, as it were a meede
 Al ful of fresshē flourēs whyte and reede; 90
 Syngynge he was, or floytynge,<sup>21</sup> al the day;
 He was as fressh as is the monthe of May.
 Short was his gowne, with sleves longe and wyde;

Wel koude he sitte on hors and faire ryde;
 He koude songes make and wel endite, 95
 Juste and eek daunce and weel purtreye<sup>22</sup> and write.

So hoot he lovedē that by nyghtertale<sup>23</sup>
 He sleep namoore than dooth a nyghtyngale.
 Curteis he was, lowly and servysable,
 And carf biforn his fader at the table. 100

A YEMAN hadde he and servantz namo<sup>24</sup>
 At that tyme, for hym listē ridē so;
 And he was clad in cote and hood of grene.
 A sheef of pockok<sup>25</sup> arwes, bright and kene,

Under his belt he bar ful thriftily — 105
 Wel koude he dresse his takel yemanly;
 His arwes drouped noght with fetheres lowe—
 And in his hand he baar a myghty bowe.
 A not-heed<sup>26</sup> hadde he, with a broun visage.
 Of woodecraft wel koude<sup>27</sup> he al the usage. 110
 Upon his arm he baar a gay bracer,<sup>28</sup>
 And by his syde a swerd and a bokeler.
 And on that oother syde a gay daggēre,
 Harneised well and sharpe as point of spere;
 A Cristophere<sup>29</sup> on his brest of silver sheene;
 An horn he bar, the bawdryk<sup>30</sup> was of grene. 115
 A forster was he, soothly as I gesse.

Ther was also a Nonne, a PRIORESSE,
 That of hir smylng was ful symple and coy;
 Hire grettest ooth was but by seintē Loy,<sup>31</sup> 120
 And she was clepēd<sup>32</sup> madame Eglentyne.
 Ful weel she soong the servise dyvyne,

A Monk ther was, a fair for the maistrie,<sup>4</sup>
An outridere, that lovéd venerie;<sup>5</sup> 166

A manly man, to been an abbot able.

Ful many a deyntee hors hadde he in stable,
And whan he rood men myghte his brydel heere

Gýnglen in a whistlyng wynd als cleere, 170

And eek as loude as dooth the chapel belle.

Ther as this lord was keepere of the celle,

The reule of seint Maure<sup>6</sup> or of seint Benét,

By-cause that it was olde and som-del streit,<sup>7</sup>

This ilké Monk leet oldé thyngés pace,<sup>8</sup> 175

And heeld after the newé world a space.

He yaf nat of that text<sup>9</sup> a pulled hen<sup>10</sup>

That seith that hunters beth nat hooly men,

Ne that a Monk whan he is reechéless<sup>11</sup>

Is likned til a fissh that is waterlees: 180

This is to seyn, a Monk out of his cloystre.

But thilké<sup>12</sup> text heeld he nat worth an oystre;

And I seyde his opintoun was good.

What sholde he studie and make hymselfen served?

Lat Austyn have his swynk<sup>17</sup> to him reserved.

Therefore he was a prikasour<sup>18</sup> aright;

Grehoundes he hadde; as swift as fowel in flight:

Of prikyng and of hunting for the hare 191

Was al his lust, for no cost wolde he spare.

I seigh his sleeves y-purfiled<sup>19</sup> at the hond

With grys,<sup>20</sup> and that the fyneste of a lond;

And for to festne his hood under his chyn 195

He hadde of gold y-wrought a curious pyn,

A love knotte in the getter ende ther was.

His heed was balled that shoon as any glas,

And eek his face as he hadde been enoynt.

He was a lord ful fat and in good poynt; 200

Hise eyen stepe<sup>21</sup> and rollynge in his heed,

That steméd as a forneys of a leed;<sup>22</sup>

His bootés souple, his hors in greet estaat.

His palfrey was as broun as is a berye.

A Frere ther was, a wantowne and a merye,
A lymytour,<sup>24</sup> a ful solempné<sup>25</sup> man;

In allé the ordres fouré<sup>26</sup> is noon that kan 210

So muchel of daliaunce and fair langage;

He haddé maad ful many a mariage

Of yongé wommen at his owené cost:

Unto his ordre he was a noble post.

Ful wel bilovéd and famulíer was he 215

With frankéleyns<sup>27</sup> over al in his contree;

And eek with worthy wommen of the toun,

For he hadde power of confessioun,

As seyde hym-self, moór than a curát,

For of his ordre he was licenciát.<sup>28</sup> 220

Ful swetély herde he confessioun,

And pleasaunt was his absolueioun.

He was an esy man to yeve penaunce

Ther as he wiste to have a good pitaunce;

For unto a poure ordre for to yive 225

Is signé that a man is wel y-shryve;

For, if he yaf, he dorsté make avaunt<sup>29</sup>

He wisté that a man was repétaunt:

For many a man so harde is of his herte 229

He may nat wepe al thogh hym sooré smerte,

Therefore in stede of wepyng and preyéres

Men moote yeve silver to the pouré freres.

His tyet<sup>30</sup> was ay farséd ful<sup>31</sup> of knyves

And pynnés for to yeven yongé wyves;

And certainly he hadde a murey note; 235

Wel koude he syngé and playen on a rote;<sup>32</sup>

Of yeddyinges<sup>33</sup> he baar outrelly the pris;

His nekké whit was as the flour-de-lys,

Ther-to<sup>34</sup> he strong was as a champioun.

He knew the tavernes well in al the toun 240

And everich hostiler and tappestere<sup>35</sup>

Yet wolde he have a ferthyng er he wente: 255
 His purchase<sup>1</sup> was wel better than his rente.
 And rage<sup>2</sup> he koude, as it were right a whelp.
 In love-dayes<sup>3</sup> ther koude he muchel helpe.
 For ther he was not lyk a cloysterer
 With a thredbare cope, as is a poure scolér, 260
 But he was lyk a maister, or a pope;
 Of double worstede was his semycope,<sup>4</sup>
 That rounded as a belle out of the presse.
 Somwhat he lipséd for his wantownesse,
 To make his Englishsh sweet upon his tonge,
 And in his harpyng, whan that he hadde
 songe, 266
 His eyen twynkled in his heed aryght
 As doon the sterrés in the frosty nyght.
 This worthy lymytour was cleped Hubert.

A MARCHANT was ther with a forkéd berd,
 In motteleye, and hye on horse he sat; 271
 Upon his heed a Flaundryssh bevere hat;
 His bootés claspéd faire and fetisly;
 His resons he spake ful solempnely,
 Sowynge alway thencreés of his wynnýng. 275
 He wolde the see were kept for any thing<sup>5</sup>

 Wel koude he in eschaungé sheeldés<sup>8</sup> sélle.
 This worthy man ful wel his wit bisette,
 Ther wisté no wight that he was in dette, 280
 So estatly was he of his governaunce
 With his bargaynes and with his chevys-saunce,<sup>9</sup>
 For sothe he was a worthy man with-alle,
 But sooth to seyn I noot<sup>10</sup> how men hym calle.

A CLERK ther was of Oxenford also 285
 That unto logyk haddé long y-go.
 As leené was his hors as is a rake.
 And he nas nat right fat, I undertake,
 But looked holwe, and ther-to sobely;
 Ful thredbare was his overeste courtpey;<sup>11</sup> 290
 For he hadde geten hym yet no benefice,
 Ne was so worldly for to have office;
 For hym was levere have at his beddés heed
 Twénty bookés clad in blak or reed
 Of Aristotile and his philosophie, 295
 Than robés riche, or fithele,<sup>12</sup> or gay sautrie;<sup>13</sup>
 But al be<sup>14</sup> that he was a philosóphre,
 Yet haddé he but litel gold in cofre;
 But al that he myghte of his freendés hente<sup>15</sup>
 On bookés and his lernynge he it spenté, 300
 And bisily gan for the souldés preyé
 Of hem that yaf hym wher-with to scoleye.<sup>16</sup>
 Of studie took he moost cure<sup>17</sup> and moost heed,
 Noght o<sup>18</sup> shak he mooré than was neede,

And that was seyde in forme and reverence, 305
 And short and quyk and ful of hy senténcé.<sup>19</sup>
 Sowynge<sup>20</sup> in moral vertu was his speche,
 And gladly wolde he lerne and gladly teche.

A SERGEANT OF THE LAWÉ, war and wys,<sup>21</sup>
 That often haddé been at the Parvys,<sup>22</sup> 310
 Ther was also, ful riche of excellence.
 Discreet he was, and of greet reverence;
 He seméd swich, hise wordés weren so wise.
 Justice he was full often in Assise,<sup>23</sup>
 By patente and by pleyn commissioun. 315
 For his science and for his heigh renoun,
 Of fees and robés hadde he many oon;
 So greet a purchasour<sup>24</sup> was nowher noon.
 Al was fee symple to hym in effect,
 His purchasyng myghté nat been infect. 320
 Nowher so bisy a man as he ther nas,
 And yet he seméd bisier than he was.
 In termés hadde he caas and doomés<sup>25</sup> alle
 That from the tyme of kyng William were falle;
 Ther-to he coude endite and make a thyng. 325
 Ther koudé no wight pynechen<sup>26</sup> at his writýng;
 And every statut coude he pleyn by rote.<sup>27</sup>
 He rood but hoomly in a medlee cote,
 Girt with a ceint of silk with barrés<sup>28</sup> smale;
 Of his array telle I no lenger tale. 330

A FRANKLEYN<sup>29</sup> was in his compaignye.
 Whit was his berd as is a dayséye,
 Of his complexion he was sangwýn.
 Wel loved he by the morwe<sup>30</sup> a sope in wyn;
 To lyven in delit was evere his wone,<sup>31</sup> 335
 For he was Epicurus owené sone,
 That heeld opinfoun that pleyn<sup>32</sup> delit
 Was verraily felicitée parfit.
 An householdere, and that a greet, was he:
 Saint Julian<sup>33</sup> was he in his contree; 340
 His breed, his ale, was always after oon;
 A better envynéd<sup>34</sup> man was nowher noon.
 Withouté baké mete was never his hous,
 Of fishh and fleshh, and that so plenteuous
 It snéwed in his hous of mete and drynke. 345

 By water<sup>34</sup> he sent hem hoom to every lond.
 But of his craft to rekene wel his tydes, 401
 His stremés and his daungers hym bisides,
 His herberwe and his moone, his lode-menage,<sup>35</sup>
 Ther nas noon swich from Hullé to Cartage.
 Hardy he was, and wys to undertake; 405
 With many a tempest hadde his berd ben shake;
 He knew wel alle the havenes, as they were,
 From Gootland<sup>36</sup> to the Cape of Fynystere,
 And every cryke in Britaigne and in Spayne.
 His barge y-cleped was the Maudélayne. 410

With us ther was a DOCTOUR OF PHISIK;
 In all this world ne was ther noon hym lik
 To speke of phisik and of surgerye;
 For he was grounded in astronomye.
 He kepte<sup>37</sup> his pacient a ful greet deel 415
 In hourés,<sup>38</sup> by his magyk natureel.
 Wel koude he fortuneten the ascendent<sup>39</sup>
 Of his ymáges for his pacient.
 He knew the cause of everich maladye,
 Were it of hoot, or cold, or moyste, or drye, 420
 And where they engendred and of what humóur;
 He was a verray parfit praktisour.
 The cause y-knowe and of his harm the roote,
 Anon he yaf the siké man his boote.<sup>40</sup>
 Ful redy hadde he his apothecaries 425
 To send him droggs and his letuaries,<sup>41</sup>
 For ech of hem made oother for to wynne,
 Hir friendshiphe nas nat newé to bigynne.
 Wel knew he the oldé Esculapius<sup>42</sup>
 And Deýscorides, and eke Rufus, 430
 Olde Ypocras, Haly and Galyen,
 Serapion, Razis and Aveyen,
 Averrois, Damascien and Constantyn,
 Bernard and Gatésden and Gilbertyn.
 Of his diété mesurable was he. 435
 For it was of no superfluitee,
 But of greet norissyng and digestible.
 His studie was but litel on the Bible.
 In sangwyn and in pers<sup>43</sup> he clad was al,
 Lyned with taffata and with sendal.<sup>44</sup> 440
 And yet he was but esy of dispence,<sup>45</sup>
 He kepté that he wan in pestilence.<sup>46</sup>
 For gold in phisik is a cordial,
 Therfore he lovéd gold in special.

A Good Wir was ther of bisidé Bathe, 445
 But she was som-del deaf, and that was scathe.<sup>47</sup>
 Of clooth-makyng she haddé swich an haunt<sup>48</sup>
 She passéd hem of Yprés and of Gaunt.
 In al the parisshe wif ne was ther noon

<sup>37</sup> He knew well how to make a fortunate horoscope (fortune the ascendent) of his patient by making images or characters stamped in metals, or wax, at a time when the stars were favorable.

That to the offrynge<sup>1</sup> bifore hire sholde goon;
 And if ther dide, certeyn so wrooth was she, 451
 That she was out of allé charitee.
 Hir coverchiefs<sup>2</sup> ful fyné weren of ground,
 I dorste swere they weyeden ten pound,
 That on a Sonday weren upon hir heed. 455
 Hir hosen weren of fyn scarlet reed, Ful streite y-teyd, and shoes ful moyste and newe;
 Boold was hir face, and fair, and reed of hewe.
 She was a worthy womman al hir lyve, 459
 Housbondes at chirché dore<sup>3</sup> she haddé fyve,
 Withouten oother compaignye in youthe,—
 But ther-of nedeth nat to speke as nowthe,<sup>4</sup>
 And thriës hadde she been at Jerusalem;
 She haddé passéd many a straungé strem;
 At Rome she haddé been, and at Boloigne, 465
 In Galice at Seint Jame, and at Coloigne,
 She koude muþel of wandrynge by the weye.
 Gat-tothéd<sup>5</sup> was she, soothly for to seye.
 Upon an amblere esily she sat,
 Y-wympléd<sup>6</sup> wel, and on hir heed an hat 470
 As brood as is a bokeler or targe;
 A foot mantel aboute her hipés large,
 And on hire feet a paire of sporés sharpe.
 In felawship wel koude she laughe and carpe;<sup>7</sup>
 Of remedies of love she knew per chaunce, 475
 For she koude of that art the oldé daunce.<sup>8</sup>

A goodman was ther of religioun,
 And was a POURE PERSON OF A TOWN;
 But riche he was of hooly thought and werk;
 He was also a lernéd man, a clerk, 480
 That Cristés Gospel trewely wolde preche
 His parisshe devoutly wolde he teche.
 Benygne he was and wonder diligent,
 And in adversitee ful patient;
 And swich he was y-prevéd<sup>9</sup> ofté sithes<sup>10</sup> 485
 Ful looth were hym to cursen for his tithes,
 But rather wolde he yeven out of doubte,
 Unto his pouré parisshe aboute,
 Of his offryng and eek of his substaunce:
 He koude in lital thyng have suffisaunce. 490
 Wyd was his parisshe and houses fer asonder,
 But he ne lafté nat for reyn ne thonder,
 In siknesse nor in meschief to visite
 The ferreste in his parisshe, muche and lite, 495
 Upon his feet, and in his hand a staf.
 This noble ensample to his sheepe he yaf
 That firste he wroghte and afterward he taughte.
 Out of the gospel he tho<sup>11</sup> wordes caughte,
 And this figure he addé eek ther to,
 That if gold rusté what shal iren doo? 500
 For if a preest be foul, on whom we truste,
 No wonder is a lewéd<sup>12</sup> man to ruste;
 And shame it is, if a preest také keepe,

A shiten shepherde and a clené sheepe.
 Wel oghte a preest ensample for to yive 505
 By his clenesse how that his sheepe sholde lyve.
 He setté nat his benefice to hyre
 And leet his sheepe encombred in the myre,
 And ran to Londoun, unto Seint Poules,
 To seken hyn a chaunterie<sup>13</sup> for soules; 510
 Or with a bretherhed to been withholde,<sup>14</sup>
 But dwelte at hoom and kepté wel his folde,
 So that the wolf ne made it nat myscaire,—
 He was a shepherde, and noght a mercenarie
 And though he hooly were and vertuous, 515
 He was to synful man nat despitous,<sup>15</sup>
 Ne of his spechè daungerous ne digne,
 But in his techyng déscreeet and benygne,
 To drawen folk to hevене by fairnesse,
 By good ensample, this was his bisynesne; 520
 But it were any persone obstinat,
 What so he were, of heigh or lough estat, Hym wolde he snybben<sup>16</sup> sharply for the nonys.
 A bettré preest I trowe that nowher noon ys;
 He waited after no pompe and reverence, 525
 Ne marked him a spicéd<sup>17</sup> conscience,
 But Cristés loore, and his Apostles twelve,
 He taughte, but first he folwed it hymselfe.

With hym ther was a PLOWMAN, was his brother, 529
 That hadde y-lad of dong ful many a fother,<sup>18</sup>
 A trefwé swynkere<sup>19</sup> and a good was he,
 Lyvyng in pees and parfit charitee.
 God loved he best, with all his hoolé herte,
 At allé tymés, thogh him gamed or smerte,<sup>20</sup> 534
 And thanne his neighebores right as hymselfe.
 He woldé thresshe, and therto dyke and delve,
 For Cristés sake, for every pouré wight,
 Withouten hire if it lay in his myght.
 His tithés paydé he ful faire and wel, 539
 Bothe of his propré swynk and his catel.<sup>21</sup>
 In a tabárd<sup>22</sup> he rood upon a mere.

Ther was also a REVE<sup>23</sup> and a MILLER.
 A SOMNOUR<sup>24</sup> and a PARDONER<sup>25</sup> also,
 A MAUNCIPE<sup>26</sup> and myself,—ther were namo. 544

The MILLERE was a stout carl for the nones,
 Ful byg was he of brawn and eek of bones;
 That provéd wel, for over-al ther, he cam,
 At wrastlyng he wolde have away the ram.<sup>27</sup>
 He was short-sholdred, brood, a thikke knarre,<sup>28</sup>

<sup>13</sup> Either an endowment for the payment of a priest to sing or say mass for the dead; or else the church or chapel in which such masses were celebrated. After the plague, many parish priests deserted their parishes and went to London to make money by officiating in the chaunteries.

Ther nas no dore that he nolde heve of harre,<sup>1</sup>
 Or breke it at a rennyng with his heed.
 His berd, as any sowe or fox, was reed, 552
 And therto brood, as though it were a spade.
 Upon the cope<sup>2</sup> right of his nose he hade
 A werte, and thereon stood a toft of herys, 555
 Reed as the brustles of a sowes erys;
 His nosethirles blake were and wyde;
 A swerd and a bokeler bar he by his syde;
 His mouth as wyde was as a greet forneys,
 He was a jangler and a goliardeys,<sup>3</sup> 560
 And that was moost of synne and harlotries.
 Wel koude he stelen corn and tollen thries,<sup>4</sup>
 And yet he hadde a thombe of golde,<sup>5</sup> pardee,
 A whit cote and a blew hood wered he. 564
 A baggepipe wel koude he blowe and sowne,
 And therewithal he broghte us out of towne.

A gentil MAUNCIPLE was ther of a temple,
 Of which achatours<sup>6</sup> myghte take exemple
 For to be wise in byrnyng of vitaille; 569
 For, whether that he payde or took by taille,<sup>7</sup>
 Algate<sup>8</sup> he wayted<sup>9</sup> so in his achaat<sup>10</sup>
 That he was ay biforn<sup>11</sup> and in good staat.
 Now is nat that of God a ful fair grace
 That swich a lewed<sup>12</sup> mannës wit shal pace
 The wisdom of an heepe of lerned men? 575
 Of maistrës hadde he mo than thries ten,
 That weren of lawe expert and curious,
 Of wiche ther weren a duszeyne in that hous
 Worthy to been stywardes of rente and lond
 Of any lord that is in Engelond, 580
 To maken hym lyvé by his propre good<sup>13</sup>
 In honour dettelees,<sup>14</sup> but he were wood,<sup>15</sup>
 Or lyve as scarsly as hym list desire;
 And able for to helpen al a shire
 In any caas that myghte falle or happe; 585
 And yet this Manciple sette hir aller cappe.<sup>16</sup>

The Revé was a sclendré colerik man
 His berd was shave as ny as ever he kan;
 His heer was by his erys round y-shorn,
 His top was doked lyk a preest biforn, 590
 Ful longé were his legges and ful lene,
 Y-lyk a staf, ther was no calf y-sene.
 Wel koude he kepe a gerner and a bynne,
 Ther was noon auditour koude on him wynne.
 Wel wiste he, by the droghte and by the reyn,
 The yeldyng of his seed and of his greyn. 596
 His lordës sheepe, his neet,<sup>17</sup> his dayerye,
 His swyn, his hors, his stoor,<sup>18</sup> and his pultrye,
 Was hoodly in this revës governyng,
 And by his covenant yaf the rekenyng 600

<sup>3</sup> Millers were allowed as toll a certain proportion of the grain in payment for the grinding. This miller tolled thrice, i. e. took three times the legal quantity of grain.

<sup>4</sup> An allusion to the proverb "An honest miller has a thumb of gold." The line may be ironical,—he stole corn, he tolled thrice, and yet was honest enough for a miller. The proverb itself is ambiguous, and the passage obscure.

Syn that his lord was twenty yeer of age;
 Ther koude no man brynge hym in arrage.
 There nas baillif, ne hierde,<sup>19</sup> nor oother
 hyne,<sup>20</sup>

That he ne knew his sleighte and his covyne;<sup>21</sup>
 They were adrad of hym as of the deeth. 605
 His wonyng<sup>22</sup> was ful faire upon an heeth,
 With grene trees y-shadwed was his place
 He koudé bettré than his lord purchase.
 Ful riche he was a-stored<sup>23</sup> pryvely,
 His lord wel koude he plesen subtilly 610
 To yeve and lene<sup>24</sup> hym of his owene good
 And have a thank, and yet a gowne and hood.

In youthe he lernéd hadde a good myster,<sup>25</sup>
 He was a wel good wrighte, a carpenter.
 This Revé sat upon a ful good stot,<sup>26</sup> 615
 That was al pomely<sup>27</sup> grey, and highte Scot;
 A long surcote of pers<sup>28</sup> upon he hade,
 And by his syde he baar a rusty blade.
 Of Northfolk was this Reve of which I telle,
 Biside a toun men clepen Baldeswelle. 620
 Tukked he was as is a frere, aboute
 And ever he rood the hyndreste<sup>29</sup> of oure route.

A SOMONOUR was ther with us in that place,
 That hadde a fyr-reed cherubynnés face, 624
 For sawcfeleem<sup>30</sup> he was, with eyen narwe.
 As hoot he was, and lecherous, as a sparwe,
 With scaled<sup>31</sup> browes blake and piled<sup>32</sup> berd,—
 Of his visagé children were aferd. . . .
 Ther nas quyk-silver, lytarge,<sup>33</sup> ne brymstoon,
 Boras,<sup>34</sup> ceruce, ne oille of Tartre noon, 630
 Ne oynement that woldé clense and byte,
 That hym myghte helpen of the whelkës<sup>35</sup> white

Nor of the knobbs sittyng on his chekes.
 Wel loved he garleek, oynons, and eke lekes,<sup>36</sup>
 And for to drynken strong wyn, reed as blood;
 Thanne wolde he speke, and crie as he were wood.<sup>36</sup>

And whan that he wel dronken hadde the
 wyn,

Than wolde he speké no word but Latyn.
 A fewé termes<sup>37</sup> hadde he, two or thre,
 That he had lernéd out of som decree,— 640
 No wonder is, he herde it al the day,
 And eek ye knowen wel how that a jay
 Kan clepen WATTE<sup>38</sup> as wel as kan the pope.
 But whoso koude in oother thyng hym grope,<sup>39</sup>
 Thanne hadde he spent all his philosophie; 645
 Ay Questio quid juris wolde he crie.
 He was a gentil harlot<sup>40</sup> and a kryde;
 A bettre felawe sholdé men noght fynde. . . .
 A gerland<sup>41</sup> hadde he set upon his heed, 656

As greet as it were for an alé stake;
A bokeleer hadde he maad him of a cake.<sup>1</sup>

With hym ther rood a gentil PARDONER
Of Rouncivale,<sup>2</sup> his freend and his compeer, 670
That straight was comen fro the court of Romé.

Ful loude he soong Com hider, love to me!
This Somonour bar to hym a stif burdoun,<sup>3</sup>
Was never trompe of half so greet a soun.
This Pardoner hadde heer as yelow as wax 675
But smothe it heeng as dooth a strike of flex;<sup>4</sup>
By ounces henge his lokkès that he hadde,
And therwith he his shuldres overspradde.
But thyne it lay by colpons<sup>5</sup> oon and oon;
But hood, for jolitee, ne wered he noon, 680
For it was trussed up in his walet.
Hym thoughte he rood al of the newé jet;<sup>6</sup>
Dischevelee, save his cappe, he rood al bare.
Swiche glarynge eyen hadde he as an hare,
A vernycle<sup>7</sup> hadde he sowed upon his cappe; 685
His walet lay bifrom hym in his lappe
Bret-ful<sup>8</sup> of pardon, comen from Rome al hoot.

A voys he hadde as smal as hath a goot; . . .
But of his craft, fro Berwyk unto Ware 692
Ne was ther swich another pardoner,
For in his male<sup>9</sup> he hadde a pilwé-beer,<sup>10</sup>
Which that, he seyde, was oure lady veyl; 695
He seyde he hadde a gobet<sup>11</sup> of the seyl
That Seinté Peter hadde, whan that he wente
Upon the see, til Jhesu Crist hym hente.<sup>12</sup>
He hadde a croys of latoun,<sup>13</sup> ful of stones,
And in a glas he haddé pigges bones. 700
But with thise reliks, whan that he foud
A pouré person dwellynge upon lond,
Upon a day he gat hym moore moneye
Than that the person gat in monthés tweye;
And thus with feynéd flaterye and japes<sup>14</sup> 705
He made the person and the peple his apes.
But, trewely to tellen atté laste,
He was in chirche a noble ecclesiaste;
Wel koude he rede a lessoun or a storie,
But alderbest he song an Offertorie; 710
For wel he wisté whan that song was songe,
He mosté preche, and wel affile his tonge
To wynné silver, as he ful wel koude;
Therefore he song the murierly<sup>15</sup> and loude.

Now have I toold you shortly, in a clause, 715
The staat, tharray, the nombre, and eek the

And al the remenaunt of oure pilgrimage.

But first, I pray yow of youre courtesye, 725
That ye narette it nat my vileynye,<sup>17</sup>
Thogh that I pleylnly speke in this mateere
To tellé yow hir wordés and hir cheere,<sup>18</sup>
Ne thogh I speke hir wordés proprely;<sup>19</sup>
For this ye knowen al-so wel as I, 730
Whoso shal telle a tale after a man,
He moote reherce, as ny as ever he kan,
Everich a word, if it be in his charge,
Al speke he never so rudéliche<sup>20</sup> or large;
Or ellis he moot telle his tale untrewe, 735
Or feyné thyng, or fyndé wordés newe.
He may nat spare, althogh he were his brother;
He moot as wel seye o word as another.
Crist spak hymself ful brode in hooly writ,
And wel ye woot no vileynye is it. 740
Eek Plato seith, whoso that kan hym rede,
'The wordés moote be eosyn to the dede.'

Also I prey yow to foryeve it me
Al have I nat set folk in hir degree 744

For to han been a marchal in an halle.
A largé man he was, with eyen stepe,
A fairer burgeys is ther noon in Chepe;<sup>22</sup> 754
Boold of his speche, and wys and well y-taught,
And of manhod hym lakkedé right naught.
Eek therto he was right a myrie man,
And after soper playen he bigan,
And spak of myrthe amongés othere thynges,
Whan that we haddé maad our rekenynges; 760
And seyde thus: 'Now, lordynges, trewely,
Ye been to me right welcome, hertely;
For by my trouthe, if that I shal nat lye,
I ne saugh this yeer so myrie a compaignye
At onés in this herberwe<sup>23</sup> as is now; 765
Fayn wolde I doon yow myrthé, wiste I how.
And of a myrthe I am right now bythoght,
To doon yow ese, and it shal costé noght.

"Ye goon to Canterbury—God yow speede,
The blisful martir quité yow youre meede!<sup>24</sup> 770
And, wel I woot, as ye goon by the weye,
Ye shapen yow to talen<sup>25</sup> and to pleye;
For trewely confort ne myrthe is noon
To ridé by the weye doumb as a stoon;
And therefore wol I maken yow disport, 775
As I seyde erste, and doon yow som confort.
And if you liketh alle, by oon assent,
Now for to stonden at my juggement,
And for to werken as I shal yow seye,
To-morwé, whan ye riden by the weye, 780
Now, by my fader soule, that is deed,
But ye be myrie, smyteth of myn heed!

Oure conseil was nat longé for to seehe; 784
Us thoghte it was noght worth to make it wys,<sup>1</sup>

And graunted hym withouten moore avys,<sup>2</sup>
And bad him seye his verdit, as hym leste.

"Lordynges," quod he, "now herkneth for the beste;

But taak it nought, I prey yow, in desdeyn; 789
This is the poynt, to speken short and pleyn,
That ech of yow, to shorté with your weye,
In this viage shal tellé talés tweye,—

To Caunterburyward, I mean it so,
And homward he shal tellen othere two,— 795
Of aventúres that whilom han bifalle.

And which of yow that bereth hym beste of alle,
That is to seyn, that telleh in this caas
Talés of best sentéce and most solaas,<sup>3</sup>

Shal have a soper at oure aller cost,
Heere in this placé, sittynge by this post, 800
Whan that we come agayn fro Caunterbury.

And, for to maké yow the mooré myry,
I wol myselven gladly with yow ryde
Right at myn owené cost, and be youre gyde;

And whoso wole my juggément withseye 805
Shal paye al that we spenden by the weye.
And if ye vouché-sauf that it be so

Tel me anon, withouten wordés mo,
And I wol erly shapé me therefore.<sup>4</sup>

This thyng was graunted, and oure othés swore 810

With ful glad herte, and preyden hym also
That he would vouché-sauf for to do so,
And that he woldé been oure governour,

And of our talés juge and réportour,
And sette a soper at a certeyn pris, 815
And we wol reuled been at his devys

In heigh and lough; and thus, by oon assent,
We been accorded to his juggément.
And therupon the wyn was fet anon;

We dronken, and to resté wente echon, 820
Withouten any lenger tarynge.
Amorwé, whan that day gan for to sprynge,

Up roos oure Hoost and was oure aller cok,<sup>4</sup>
And gadrede us togidre alle in a flok, 824
And forth we riden, a little moore than paas,<sup>5</sup>

Unto the warteryng of Saint Thomas;<sup>6</sup>
And there oure Hoost bigan his hors areste
And seyde, "Lordynges, herkneth, if yow leste:

Ye woot youre forward<sup>7</sup> and I yow recorde:
If even-song and morwé-song accorde, 830
Lat se now who shal telle the firsté tale.

As ever mote I drynke wyn or ale,
Whoso be rebel to my juggément
Shal paye for all that by the wey is spent! 834

Now draweth cut,<sup>8</sup> or that we ferrer twynne.<sup>9</sup>

Cometh neer," quod he, "my lady Prioresse, 839
And ye sire Clerk, lat be your shamefastnesse,
Ne studieth noght; ley hond to, every man."

Anon to drawn every wight bigan,
And, shortly for to tellen as it was,
Were it by aventure, or sort, or cas,<sup>10</sup>

The sothe is this, the cut fil to the knyght, 845
Of which ful blithe and glad was every wyght:
And telle he moste his tale, as was resoun,<sup>11</sup>

By foreward<sup>12</sup> and by composicioun,
As he han herd; what nedeth wordés mo? 849
And whan this goode man saugh that it was so,

As he that wys was and obedient
To kepe his foreward by his free assent,
He seyde, "Syn I shal bigynne the game,

What, welcome be the cut, a Goddés name! 854
Now lat us ryde, and herkneth what I seye."
And with that word we ryden forth oure weye;

And he bigan with right a myrie cheere
His tale anon, and seyde in this manére.

THE PARDONER'S TALE

. . . Thise riotourés thre, of whiche I telle, Longe erst er primé<sup>13</sup> rong of any belle,
Were set hem in a taverne for to drynke;

And as they sat they herde a bellé clynke
Biforn a cors, was carried to his grave. 665
That oon of hem gan callen to his knave:<sup>14</sup>

"Go bet," quod he, "and axé redily<sup>15</sup>
What cors is this that passeth heer forby,
And looke that thou reporte his namé weel."

"Sire," quod this boy, "it nedeth never a deel,
It was me toold er ye cam heere two houres; 671
He was, pardee, an old felawe of youre,

And sodeynly he was y-slayn to-nyght,
For-dronke, as he sat on his bench upright;
Ther cam a privee thief, men clepeth Deeth, 675

That in this cuntrye al the peple sleeth,
And with his spere he smoot his herte atwo,
And wente his wey withouten wordés mo.

He hath a thousand slayn this pestilence,<sup>16</sup>
And maister, er ye come in his presence, 680
Me thynketh that it weré necessarie

For to be war of swich an adversarie;
Beth redy for to meete hym evermoore;
Thus taughté me my dame; I sey na-moore."

"By Seinte Marie!" seyde this taverner, 685
"The child seith sooth, for he hath slayn this year,

Henne<sup>17</sup> over a mile, withinne a greet village, Bothe man and womman, child, and hyne,<sup>18</sup>
and page;

Er that he dide a man a dishonour."

"Ye, Goddés armés!" quod this riotour,
 "Is it swich peril with hym for to meete?
 I shal hym seke by weye and eek by strete;
 I make avow to Goddés digné bones 695
 Herkneht, felawés, we thre been al ones,
 Lat ech of us holde up his hand til oother,
 And ech of us bicomen otherés brother,
 And we wol sleen this falsé traytour, Deeth;
 He shal be slayn, he that so manye sleeth, 700
 By Goddés dignitee, er it be nyght!"

Togidres han this thre hir trouthes<sup>2</sup> plight
 To lyve and dyen ech of hem for oother;
 As though he were his owene y-boré brother;
 And up they sturte,<sup>3</sup> al dronken, in this rage;
 And forth they goon towardés that villáge 706
 Of which the taverner hadde spoke bifore;
 And many a grisly ooth thanne han they sworn,
 And Cristés blessed body they to-rente,<sup>4</sup>
 Deeth shal be deed, if that they may hym 710
 hente.<sup>5</sup>

Whan they han goon nat fully half a mile,
 Right as they wolde han troden over a stile,
 An oold man and a poure with hem mette;
 This oldé man ful mekely hem grette
 And seyde thus: "Now, lordés, God yow see!"<sup>6</sup>

The proudeste of thise riotours three 716
 Answerde agayn, "What, carl with sory grace,
 Why artow<sup>7</sup> al for-wrappéd, save thy face?
 Why lyvestow so longe in so greet age?"

This oldé man gan looke in his visage, 720
 And seyde thus: "For I ne kan nat fynde
 A man, though that I walkéd into Ynde,
 Neither in citee, ne in no village,
 That wolde chaunge his youthe for myn age;
 And therfore moot I han myn agé stille, 725
 As longé tyme as it is Goddés wille.

Ne Deeth, allas! ne wol nat han my lyf;
 Thus walke I, lyk a restéless kaityf,
 And on the ground which is my moodrés<sup>8</sup>
 gate,

I knokké with my staf, erly and late, 730
 And seyde, "Leeve mooder,<sup>9</sup> leet me in!
 Lo, how I vanysshe, flessch and blood and skyn;
 Allas! whan shul my bonés been at reste?

Móoder, with yow wolde I chaunge my cheste
 That in my chambré longé tyme hath be, 735
 Ye, for an heyré-clowt<sup>10</sup> to wrappé me!
 But yet to me she wol nat do that grace,
 For which ful pale and welked<sup>11</sup> is my face.

"But, sires, to yow it is no curteisye
 To speken to an old man vileynye, 740
 But he trespasse in word, or elles in dede.
 In Hooly Writ ye may your self wel rede,
 Agayns an oold man, hoor upon his heed,
 Ye sholde arise; wherfore I yewe yow reed,<sup>12</sup>
 Ne dooth unto an oold man noon harm now, 745
 Namooré than ye wolde men did to yow
 In agé, if that ye so longe abyde.
 And God be with yow, where ye go or ryde;
 I moote go thider as I have to go."

<sup>12</sup> Advice.

"Nay, oldé cherl, by God, thou shalt nat so!"

Seyde this oother hasardour<sup>13</sup> anon; 751
 "Thou partest nat so lightly, by Seint John!
 Thou spak right now of thilké traytour, Deeth,
 That in this contree alle oure freendés sleeth;
 Have heer my trouthe, as thou art his espye, 755
 Telle where he is, or thou shalt it abyde,<sup>14</sup>
 By God and by the hooly sacrament!

For soothly, thou art oon of his assent
 To sleen us yongé folk, thou falsé thief!" 759
 "Now, sires," quod he, "if that ye so be leef
 To fynde Deeth, turne up this croked wey,
 For in that grove I lafte hym, by my fey,
 Under a tree, and there he wole abyde;
 Noght for youre boost he wole him no thyng 765
 hyde.

Se ye that ook? Right there ye shal hym fynde. 765
 God savé yow that boghte agayn mankynde,
 And yow amende!" thus seyde this oldé man;
 And everich of thise riotours ran

Til he cam to that tree, and ther they founde,
 Of floryns fyne, of gold y-coynéd rounde, 770
 Wel ny a seven busshels, as hem thoughte.
 No lenger thanné after Deeth they soughte,
 But ech of hem so glad was of that sighte,
 For that the floryns been so faire and brighte,
 That doun they set hem by this precious hoord.

The worste of hem he spak the firsté word. 776
 "Bretheren," quod he, "taak kepé what I seye;

My wit is greet, though that I bourde<sup>15</sup> and pleye.

This tresor hath Fortúne unto us yeven
 In myrthe and jolitee oure lyf to lyven, 780
 And lightly as it comth so wol we spende.

Ey, Goddés precious dignitee! who wende<sup>16</sup>
 To-day, that we sholde hav so faire a grace?
 But myghte this gold be caried fro this place
 Hoom to myn hous, or ellés unto youre, 785
 (For wel ye woot that al this gold is oures),
 Thanne weré we in heigh felicitee.

But trewely, by day it may nat bee;
 Men woldé seyn that we were thevés stronge,
 And for oure owene tresor doon us honge. 790

This tresor moste y-caried be by nyghte
 As wisely and as slyly as it myghie.

Wherfore, I rede that cut<sup>17</sup> among us all
 Be drawe, and let se wher the cut wol falle;
 And he that hath the cut witherté blithe 795
 Shal renné to the towne, and that ful swythe,<sup>18</sup>

And bryngé us breed and wyn ful prively,
 And two of us shul kepen subtilly

This tresor wel; and if he wol nat tarie,
 When it is nyght we wol this tresor carie, 800
 By oon assent, wher as us thynketh best."

That oon of hem the cut broghte in his fest<sup>19</sup>
 And bad hem drawe and looke where it wol falle;

And it fil on the yongeste of hem alle,
 And forth toward the toun he wente anon; 805
 And al so sooné as that he was gon,
 That oon of hem spak thus unto that oother:

<sup>13</sup> Gambler.

<sup>19</sup> Fist.

"Thow knowest wel thou art my sworn brother
 Thy profit wol I tellé thee anon;
 Thou woost wel that oure felawe is agon, 810
 And heere is gold, and that ful greet plentee,
 That shal departed been among us thre;
 But natheless, if I kan shape it so
 That it departed were among us two,
 Hadde I nat doon a freendés torn to thee?" 815
 That oother answerde, "I noot how that may be;

He woot how that the gold is with us tweye;
 What shal we doon, what shal we to hym seye?"
 "Shal it be conseil?" seyde the firste shrewe,<sup>1</sup>
 "And I shal tellen thee in wordés fewe 820
 What we shal doon, and bryngen it wel aboute."
 "I graunte," quod that oother, "out of doute,
 That by my trouthe I shal thee nat biwreye."
 "Now," quod the firste, "thou woost wel we be tweye,

And two of us shul strenger be than oon. 825
 Looke whan that he is set, and right anon
 Arys, as though thou woldest with hym pleye,
 And I shal ryve hym thurgh the sydés tweye,
 Whil that thou strogelst with hym as in game,
 And with thy daggere looke thou do the same;
 And thanne shal al this gold departed be, 831
 My deeré freend, bitwixen me and thee.
 Thanne may we bothe oure lustés all fulfille,
 And pleye at dees<sup>2</sup> right at oure owene wille."
 And thus acorded been thise shrewés tweye, 835
 To sleen the thridde, as ye han herd me seye.

This yongeste, which that wente unto the town,

Ful oft in herte he rolleth up and doun
 The beautee of thise floryns newe and brighte;
 "O Lord," quod he, "if so were that I myghte 840
 Have al this tresor to myself alone,
 Ther is no man that lyveth under the trone<sup>3</sup>
 Of God, that sholdé lyve so murye as I!"
 And atté laste the feend, oure enemy,
 Putte in his thought that he sholde poyson
 beye,<sup>4</sup> 845

With which he myghté sleen his felawes tweye;
 For-why the feend foonnd hym in swich lyvyng,
 That he hadde levé hym to sorwé bryng,
 For this was outrély<sup>5</sup> his fulle entente
 To sleen hem bothe and never to repent. 850
 And forth he gooth, no lenger wolde he tarie,
 Into the town, unto a pothecarie,
 And preyde hym that he hym woldé selle
 Som poyson, that he myghte his rattés quelle;<sup>6</sup> 855

And eek ther was a polcat in his hawe,<sup>7</sup>
 That, as he seyde, his capouns hadde y-slawe,
 And fayne he woldé wreke hym,<sup>8</sup> if he myghte
 On vermy, that destroyed hym by nyghte.

The pothecarie answerde, "And thou shalt have

A thyng that, al so God my soulé save, 860
 In al this world ther nis no créature,
 That eten or dronken bath of this confiture,
 Noght but the montance<sup>9</sup> of a corn of whete,
 That he ne shal his lif anon forlete;<sup>10</sup>

Ye, sterve he shal, and that in lassé while 865
 Than thou wolt goon a-paas nat but a mile;
 This poyson is so strong and violent."

This curséd man hath in his hond y-hent
 This poyson in a box, and sith he ran
 Into the nexté strete unto a man, 870
 And borwed hym largé botellés thre,
 And in the two his poyson pouréd he;
 The thridde he kepte elene for his owenè drynke:
 For al the nyght he shoope<sup>11</sup> hym for to swynke

In cariynge of the gold out of that place. 875
 And whan this riotour with sory grace
 Hadde filled with wyn his greté botels thre,
 To his felawes agayn repaireth he.

What nedeth it to sermone of it moore?
 For right as they hadde cast his deeth bifoore,
 Right so they han hym slayn, and that anon, 881
 And whan that this was doon thus spak that oon;

"Now lat us sitte and drynke, and make us
 merie,

And afterward we wol his body berie;"
 And with that word it happéd hym, par cas, 885
 To take the botel ther the poyson was,
 And drank and yaf his felawe drynke also,
 For which anon they storven bothé two.

But certés, I suppose that Aveyen<sup>12</sup>
 Wroot never in no Canon,<sup>13</sup> ne in no fen 890
 Mo wonder signés of empoisonyng
 Than hadde thise wrecches two, er hir endyng.
 Thus ended been thise homycidés two,
 And eek the false empoysonere also.

O curséd synne of allé cursednesse! 895
 O traytorous homycide! O wikkednesse!
 O glotonye, luxúrie, and hasardrye!<sup>14</sup>
 Thou blasphemour of Crist with vileynye,
 And othés grete, of usage and of pride!
 Allas! mankyndé, how may it bitide 900
 That to thy Creatour which that thee wroghte,
 And with his precious herté-blood thee boghte,
 Thou art so fals and so unkynde, allas!

Now, goode men, God foryeve yow youre
 trespas,

And ware yow fro the synne of avarice. 905
 Myn hooly pardoun may yow alle warice.<sup>15</sup>

THE COMPLEYNT OF CHAUCER TO HIS PURSE

c. 1399

To you, my purse, and to noon other wyght
 Compleyne I, for ye be my lady dere!

I am so sory now that ye been light;
 For, certés, but ye make me hevye chere,
 Me were as leef be leyd upon my bere, 5
 Forwiche unto your mercy thus I crye,—
 Beth hevye ageyn, or allés mot I dye!

THE BALLAD OF GOOD COUNSEL OR TRUTH

(After 1386)

Flee fro the prees, and dwelle with sothefast-nesse 20
 Suffice unto thy thyng though hit be smal;
 For hord hath hate and clymyngyn tikelnesse,
 Prees hath envye, and welè blent<sup>1</sup> overal;

<sup>1</sup> This famous travel book and collection of marvels was long supposed to be the composition of one, Sir John Mandeville, who had actually travelled in the countries he mentions. It is now known to be a translation of a French original, supposedly by Jean de Burgogne (d. 1372), which in turn was a compilation from various classical and medieval writers.

and lady and sovereign of all other lands, and is blessed and hallowed with the precious body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; in the which land it pleased him to take flesh and blood of the Virgin Mary, to environ<sup>2</sup> that holy land with his blessed feet; and there he would of his blessedness shadow him in the said blessed and glorious Virgin Mary, and become man, and work many miracles, and preach and teach the faith and the law of Christian men unto his children; and there it pleased him to suffer many reprovings and scorns for us;
 and he that was king of heaven, of air, of earth, of sea, and of all things that are contained in them, would only be called king of that land, when he said, "Rex sum Judeorum," that is to say, I am king of the Jews; and that land he chose before all other lands, as the best and most worthy land, and the most virtuous land of all the world; for it is the heart and the middle of all the world; by witness of the philosopher, who saith thus, "Virtus rerum in medio consistit;" that is to say, "The virtue of things is in the middle;" and in that land he would lead his life, and suffer passion and death from the Jews for us, to redeem and deliver us from the pains of hell, and from death without end, which was ordained for us for the sin of our first father Adam, and for our own sins also:— . . .

Wherefore every good Christian man, that is of power, and hath whereof, should labour with all his strength to conquer our right heritage, and drive out all the unbelieving men. For we are called Christian men, after Christ our father. And if we be right children of Christ, we ought to claim the heritage that our father left us, and take it out of heathen men's hands.

And forasmuch as it is long time passed that there was no general passage or voyage over the sea, and many men desiring to hear speak of the Holy Land, and have thereof great solace and comfort, I, John Maundeville, knight, albeit I be not worthy, who was born in England, in the town of Saint Albans, passed the sea in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ 1322, on the day of St. Michael; and hitherto have been a long time over the sea, and have seen and gone through many divers lands, and many provinces, and kingdoms, and isles, and have passed through Tartary, Persia, Ermony (Armenia) the Little and the Great; through Lybia, Chaldea, and a great part of Ethiopia; through Amazonia, India the Less and the Greater, a great part; and throughout many other isles that are about India; where dwell many divers folks, and of divers manners and

laws, and of divers shapes of men. Of which lands and isles I shall speak more plainly hereafter. And I shall devise you some part of things that are there, when time shall be as it may best come to my mind; and especially for them that will and are in purpose to visit the holy city of Jerusalem, and the holy places that are thereabout. And I shall tell the way that they shall hold thither; for I have oftentimes passed and ridden the way, with good company of many lords: God be thanked!

And ye shall understand that I have put this book out of Latin into French, and translated it again out of French into English, that every 15 man of my nation may understand it; and that lords and knights and other noble and worthy men that know Latin but little, and have been beyond the sea, may know and understand, if I err from defect of memory, and may redress it 20 and amend it. For things passed out of long time from a man's mind or from his sight turn soon into forgetting; because a man's mind may not be comprehended or withheld, on account of the frailty of mankind.

WONDERS OF THE ISLES ABOUT JAVA

From that isle, in going by sea towards the south, is another great isle, called Dondun, in 30 which are people of wicked kinds, so that the father eats the son, the son the father, the husband the wife, and the wife the husband.

The king of this isle is a great and powerful 35 lord, and has under him fifty-four great isles, which give tribute to him; and in every one of these isles is a king crowned, all obedient to that king. In one of these isles are people of great stature, like giants, hideous to look upon; 40 and they have but one eye, which is in the middle of the forehead; and they eat nothing but raw flesh and fish. And in another isle towards the south dwell people of foul stature and cursed nature, who have no heads, but their eyes are 45 in their shoulders.

In another isle are people who have the face all flat, without nose and without mouth. In another isle are people that have the lip above the mouth so great, that when they sleep in the 50 sun they cover all the face with that lip. And in another isle there are dwarfs, which have no mouth, but instead of their mouth they have a little round hole; and when they shall eat or drink, they take it through a pipe, or a pen, or 55 such a thing, and suck it in. And in another isle are people that have ears so long that they hang down to their knees. And in another isle are people that have horses' feet. In another isle are people that go upon their hands and feet like beasts, and are all skinned and feathered, and would leap as lightly into trees, and from tree to tree, as squirrels or 5 apes. . . . And in another isle are people that go always upon their knees, and at every step they go it seems that they would fall; and they have eight toes on every foot. Many other divers people of divers natures there are in other isles about, of the which it were too long to tell.

KING ALEXANDER AND THE ISLE OF BRAGMAN

And beyond that isle is another isle, great and rich, where are good and true people, and of good living after their belief, and of good faith, and although they are not christened, yet by natural law they are full of all virtue, and eschew all vices. . . .

And that isle is called the isle of Bragman, and some men call it the Land of Faith; 25 and through it runs a great river called Thebe.

And in general all the men of those isles, and of all the borders thereabout, are truer than in any other country thereabout, and more just than others in all things. . . .

And because they are so true, and so just, and so full of all good conditions, they are never grieved with tempests, nor with thunder and lightning, nor with hail, nor with pestilence, nor with war, nor with famine, nor with any other tribulation, as we are many times amongst us for our sins; wherefore it appears evident that God loveth them for their good deeds. They believe well in God that made all things, and worship Him; and they prize no earthly riches; and they live full orderly, and so soberly in meat and drink, that they live right long. And the most part of them die without sickness, when nature faileth them for old age.

And it befell, in king Alexander's time, that he purposed to conquer that isle; but when they of the country heard it, they sent messengers to him with letters, that said thus:—"What may we be now to that man to whom all the world is insufficient? Thou shalt find nothing in us to cause thee to war against us; for we have no riches, nor do we desire any; and all the goods of our country are in common. Our meat, with which we sustain our bodies, is our riches; and instead of treasure of gold and silver, we make our treasure of acorns and peas, and to love one another. . . .

"Our wives are not arrayed to make any man pleased. When men labour to array the body, to make it seem fairer than God made it, they do great sin; for man should not devise nor ask greater beauty than God hath ordained him to have at his birth. The earth ministereth to us two things: our livelihood, that cometh of the earth that we live by, and our sepulchre after our death. We have been in perpetual peace till now that thou art come to disinherit us; and also we have a king, not to do justice to every man, for he shall find no forfeit among us; but to keep nobleness, and to show that we are obedient, we have a king. For justice has among us no place; for we do to no man otherwise than we desire that men do to us, so that righteousness or vengeance have nought to do among us; so that thou mayest take nothing from us but our good peace, that always hath endured among us." And when king Alexander had read these letters, he thought that he should do great sin to trouble them.

THE HILLS OF GOLD AND THE TERRESTRIAL PARADISE

Towards the east of Prester John's land<sup>1</sup> is a good and great isle called Taprobane, and it is very fruitful; and the king thereof is rich, and is under the obeisance of Prester John. And there they always make their king by election. In that isle are two summers and two winters; and men harvest the corn twice a year; and in all seasons of the year the gardens are in flower. . . .

Beside that isle, towards the east, are two other isles, one called Orille, the other Argyte, of which all the land is mines of gold and silver. And those isles are just where the Red Sea separates from the Ocean Sea. . . .

In the isle, also, of this Taprobane are great hills of gold, that ants keep full diligently.

And beyond the land, and isles, and deserts of Prester John's lordship, in going straight towards the east, men find nothing but mountains and great rocks; and there is the dark region, where no man may see, neither by day nor night, as they of the country say. And that desert, and that place of darkness, lasts from this coast unto Terrestrial Paradise, where Adam, our first father, and Eve were put, who dwelt there but a little while; and that is towards the east, at the beginning of the earth. But this is not that east that we call our east, on this half, where the sun rises to us; for when the sun is east in those parts towards Terrestrial Paradise, it is then midnight in our parts on this half, on account of the roundness of the earth of which I have told you before; for our Lord God made the earth all round, in the middle of the firmament. And there have mountains and hills been, and valleys, which arose only from Noah's flood, that wasted the soft and tender ground, and fell down into valleys; and the hard earth and the rock remain mountains, when the soft and tender earth was worn away by the water, and fell, and became valleys.

Of Paradise I cannot speak properly, for I was not there. It is far beyond; and I repent not going there, but I was not worthy. But as I have heard say of wise men beyond, I shall tell you with good-will. Terrestrial Paradise, as wise men say, is the highest place of the earth; and it is so high that it nearly touches the circle of the moon there, as the moon makes her turn. For it is so high that the flood of Noah might not come to it, that would have covered all the earth of the world all about, and above and beneath, except Paradise. And this Paradise is enclosed all about with a wall, and men know not whereof it is; for the wall is covered all over with moss, as it seems; and it seems not that the wall is natural stone. And that wall stretches from the south to the north; and it has but one entry, which is closed with burning fire, so that no man that is mortal dare enter.

And in the highest place of Paradise, exactly in the middle, is a well that casts out the four streams, which run by divers lands, of which the first is called Pison, or Ganges, that runs throughout India, or Emlak, in which river are many precious stones, and much lignum aloes,<sup>2</sup> and much sand of gold. And the other river is called Nile, or Gyson, which goes through Ethiopia, and after through Egypt. And the other is called Tigris, which runs by Assyria, and by Armenia the Great. And the other is called Euphrates, which runs through Media, Armenia, and Persia. And men there beyond say that all the sweet waters of the world, above and beneath, take their beginning from the well of Paradise; and out of that well all waters come and go. The first river is called Pison, that is, in our language, Assembly; for many other rivers meet there, and go into that river. And some call it Ganges, from an Indian king, called Gangeres because it ran through his land. And its water is in some places clear, and in some places troubled; in some places hot, and in some places cold. The second river is called Nile, or Gyson, for it is always troubled; and Gyson, in the language of Ethiopia, is to say Trouble, and in the language of Egypt also. The third river, called Tigris, is as much as to say, Fast Running; for it runs faster than any of the others. The fourth river is called Euphrates, that is to say, Well Bearing; for there grow upon that river corn, fruit, and other goods, in great plenty.

And you shall understand that no man that is mortal may approach to that Paradise; for by land no man may go for wild beasts, that are in the deserts, and for the high mountains, and great huge rocks, that no man may pass by for the dark places that are there; and by the rivers may no man go, for the water runs so roughly and so sharply, because it comes down so outrageously from the high places above, that it runs in so great waves that no ship may row or sail against it; and the water roars so, and makes so huge a noise, and so great a tempest, that no man may hear another in the ship, though he cried with all the might he could. Many great lords have essayed with great will, many times, to pass by those rivers towards Paradise, with full great companies; but they might not speed in their voyage; and many died for weariness of rowing against the strong waves; and many of them became blind, and many deaf, for the noise of the water; and some perished and were lost in the waves; so that no mortal man may approach to that place without special grace of God; so that of that place I can tell you no more.

A SHORT RULE OF LIFE

A SHORT RULE OF LIFE FOR EACH MAN IN GENERAL, AND FOR PRIESTS AND LORDS AND LABOURERS IN SPECIAL, HOW EACH MAN SHALL BE SAVED IN HIS DEGREE, IF HE WILL HIMSELF. First, when thou risest or fully wakest, think on the goodness of God; for his own goodness and none other need he made all things of naught, both angels and men, and all other creatures good in their kind. The second time think on the great passion and wilful death that Christ suffered for mankind. . . And think the third time, how God hath saved thee from death and other mischiefs, and suffered

many thousands to be lost that night, some in water, some in fire, some by sudden death, and some to be damned without end. And for these goodnesses and mercies thank thy God with all thine heart, and pray him to give thee grace to spend, in that day and evermore, all the mights of thy soul, as mind, reason, wit, and will, and all the mights of thy body, as strength, beauty, and thy five wits, in his service and worship; and in no thing forfeit again his commandments, but (be) ready to perform works of mercy, and to give good example of holy life, both in word and in deed, to all men abouts thee.

Look afterwards that thou be well occupied, and in no time idle for temptation. Take meat and drink in measure, not too costly nor too licourouse,<sup>1</sup> and be not too curious<sup>2</sup> thereabout, but such as God sendeth, with truth take it, in such measure that thou be fresher in mind and wits to serve God, and algates<sup>3</sup> thank him for his gift. Over this, look thou do right and equity to all men, both to sovereigns,<sup>4</sup> peers,<sup>5</sup> subjects, or servants; and stir all men to love truth and mercy, and over these charity; and suffer no man be at dissension, but accord them<sup>6</sup> if thou mayest in any good manner. Also most of all things dread God and his wrath, and most of all things love God and his law and his worship; and ask not principally worldly meed,<sup>7</sup> but in all thine heart desire the bliss of heaven, through the mercy of God and thine own goodness of life. . . . And in the end of the day think where thou hast offended God, and how much and how often, and therefore have entire sorrow, and amend it while thou may. . . . If thou be a priest, and especially a curate, live thou holily, passing others in holy prayer and holy desire and thinking, in holy speaking, counselling, and true teaching, and ever that God's hests<sup>8</sup> and his gospel be in thy mouth, and ever despise sin, to draw men therefrom. And that thy deeds be so rightful, that no man shall blame them with reason, but thine open deeds be a true book to all sogettis<sup>9</sup> and lewd men,<sup>10</sup> to serve God and do his hests thereby. For ensample of good, and open and lasting, stirreth rude men more than true preaching by the naked word. And waste not thy goods in great feasts of rich men, but live a mean<sup>11</sup> life of poor men's alms and goods, both in meat and drink and clothes; and the remnant give truly to poor men that have naught of their own, and may not labour for feebleness or sickness, and then thou shalt be a true priest both to God and man.

If thou be a lord, look thou live a rightful life in thine own person, both anent God and man, keeping the hests of God, doing the works of mercy, ruling well thy five wits, and doing reason and equity and good conscience to all men. The second time, govern well thy wife, thy children, and thy homely meyne<sup>12</sup> in 10 God's law, and suffer no sin among them, neither in word nor in deed, upon thy might, that they may be ensamples of holiness and righteousness to all others. . . . The third time, govern well thy tenants, and maintain 15 them in right and reason, and be merciful to them in their rents, and worldly merciments,<sup>13</sup> and suffer not thy officers to do them wrong nor extortions, and chastise in good manner them that rebel against God's hests and virtuous living, more than for rebellion against 20 thine own cause or person. . . . If thou be a labourer, live in meekness, and truly and wilfully<sup>14</sup> do thy labour; that if thy lord or thy master be an heathen man, that by thy meekness and wilful and true service, he have 25 not to gruche<sup>15</sup> against thee, nor slander thy God nor Christendom.<sup>16</sup> And serve not to Christian lords with gruching,<sup>17</sup> nor only in their presence, but truly and wilfully in their 30 absence, not only for worldly dread nor worldly reward, but for dread of God and good conscience, and for reward in heaven. For that God that putteth thee in such service wots<sup>18</sup> what state is best for thee, and will reward 35 thee more than all earthly lords may, if thou doest it truly and wilfully for his ordinance. And in all things beware of gruchying<sup>17</sup> against God and his visitation, in great labour and long, and great sickness, and other adversities; and beware of wrath, of cursing and wary- 40 ying,<sup>19</sup> or banning, of man or of beast. And ever keep patience, and meekness, and charity, both to God and man. And thus each man in these three estates oweth<sup>20</sup> to live, to save 45 himself and help others; and thus should good life, rest, peace, and charity be among Christian men, and they be saved, and heathen men soon converted, and God magnified greatly in all nations and sects, that now despise him 50 and his law, for the wicked living of false Christian men.

From A PRAISE OF WOMEN

For this ye knowe well, though I would lie,
In women is all truth and steadfastness; 135
For in good faith I never of them sye<sup>1</sup>
But much worship, bounty, and gentleness,
Right comyng, fair, and full of mekeness,
Good and glad, and lowly, I you ensure,
Is this goodly angelic creature. 140
And if it hap a man be in disease,<sup>2</sup>
She doth her business and her full fain
With all her might, him to comfort and please
If fro his disease she mighte him restrain;
In word nor deed, I wis, she will not feign, 145
But with all her might she doth her business
To bringe him out of his heaviness.
Lo, what gentleness these women have,
If we could know it for our rudeness!
How busy they be us to keep and save, 150
Both in health, and also in sickness!
And always right sorry for our distress,
In every manner; thus they shewe ruth,
That in them is all goodness and truth.
And since in them are gentleness and trouth, 155
Worship, bounty, and kindness evermore,
Let ne'er this gentylness through your slouth
In her kind truth be aught forlore,<sup>3</sup>
That in woman is, and hath been full yore;
For in reverence of the heaven's Queen, 160
We ought to worship all women that been.
For of all creatures that e'er were born,
This wot ye well, a woman was the beste:
By her recovered was the bliss that we had 165
lorne,<sup>4</sup>
And through the woman shall we come to reste,
And be y-saved, if that our selfe lest;<sup>5</sup>
Wherefore, me thinketh, if that we had grace,
We oughten honour women in every place.
Therefore I read that, to our lives ende,
Fro this time forth, the while that we have 170
space,
That we have trespassed, pursue to amend,
Praying our Lady, well of all grace,
To bringe us unto that blissful place,
Where she and all good women shall be infere<sup>6</sup>
In heaven above, among the angels clear. 175

THE CUCKOO AND THE NIGHTINGALE

(c. 1405)

The god of love, a! benedicite!
 How mighty and how great a lord is he!
 For he can make of lowé heartés hye,
 And of hye low, and líkè for to dye,
 And hardé heartés he can maken free. 5

And he can make, within a litle stoundé<sup>1</sup>
 Of seké<sup>2</sup> folk full wholé, fresh and soundé,
 And of the wholé, he can maké seke;
 And he can binden and unbinden eke
 What he will have bounden or unboundé. 10

To tell his might my wit may not suffysé;
 For he may do all that he will devysé
 For he can make of wíse folk full nice,
 And eke in lyther<sup>3</sup> folk destroyen vice;
 And proude heartés he can make agrysé.<sup>4</sup> 15

Shortly, all that e'er he wills he may;
 Ageinés<sup>5</sup> him there dare no wight say nay.
 For he can glad and grievé whom him liketh;
 And whom he will, he laugheth or he syketh;<sup>6</sup>
 And most his might he showeth ever in May. 20

For every trewé gentle hearté free
 That with him is, or thinketh for to be,
 Ageinés May now shall have some stirring,
 Either to joy, or allés to mourning,
 In no sesoun so great, as thinketh me. 25

For when they mowé<sup>7</sup> hear the briddés sing,
 And see the flowers and the leavés spring,
 That bringeth into heartés rémembráunce
 A kind of easé, mingled with greváunce,
 And lusty thoughtés fullé of longíng. . . . 30

THE TESTAMENT OF JOHN LYDGATE

(From Testamentum Johannis Lydgate)

Midst of a cloister, painted on a wall, 743
 I saw a crucifix with wounds not small,
 With this word VIDE, written there beside,— “Behold my meekness, Child, and learn thy pride.”

The which word when I came to understand,
 In my last agé taking the sentence,
 Thinking thereon, my pen I took in hand,
 And straightway wrote with humble rever- 750

 On this word vide with much diligence,
 In memory of Christés passioun
 This little song, this compilatioun. . . . 753

“Turn home again, thy sin do thou forsake, 867
 Behold and see if aught be left behind;
 To mercy I am ready thee to take, 869
 Give me thy heart and be no more unkind;
 Thy love and mine, together do them bind,
 And let them never part in any wise;
 When thou wast lost, thy soul again to find,
 My blood I gave for thee in sacrifice. . . . 874

Tarry no longer towards thine heritage: 890
 Haste on thy way and be of right good cheer;
 Go each day onward on thy pilgrimage,
 Think how short time thou shalt abide here!
 Thy place is built above the starrés clear,
 No earthly palace wrought in stately wise. 895
 Come on, my friend, my brother most entere,<sup>1</sup>
 For thee I shed my blood in sacrifice.”

THOMAS HOCCLEVE'S COMPLAINT

THE PROLOGUE

After that Harvest gathered had his sheavés,
 And that the brown sesoun of Michaelmessé<sup>1</sup>
 Was come, and gan the trees rob of their leavés,
 That green had been and in lusty freshnessé,

<sup>1</sup> The feast of St. Michael and All Angels, or Michaelmas, which falls on Sept. 29th.

- And them into colour of yellownesse 5
 Had died, and down were thrown under foot,
 That changè sank into mine heartes root.
- For freshly brought it to my rémembrancè,
 That stableness in this world there is none;
 There is no thing but change and variancè; 10
 How rich a man may be or well begun,
 Endure it shall not, he shall it foregone.
 Death under footè shall him thrust a-down:
 For that is every wight's conclusioun.
- Which for to waive is in no mannès might, 15
 How rich he be, strong, lusty, fresh, and gay.
 And at November's end, upon a night,
 Sighing most sore, as in my bed I lay,
 For this and other thoughts, which many a day
 Before I had, sleep came none in mine eye, 20
 So vexed me the thoughtful malady. . . .
- The grief about my heart so sorely swal
 And bolnèd ever to and fro so sore, 30
 That nedès out I must then with it all:
 I thought I could not keep it close no more,
 Nor let it in me, being old and hoar:
 And for to prove I came of a womán,
 I burst out on the morrow, and thus began. 35
- Here endeth my prologue, and followeth my Complaint.
- THE COMPLAINT
- Almighty God, as liketh His goodnèss,
 Visiteth folk all-day as men may see,
 With loss of goods and bodily sicknèss,
 And among other He forgot not me;
 Witness thereof the mad infirmitie<sup>2</sup> 40
 Which that I had, as many a man well knew,
 And which out of myself me cast and threw. . . .
- As said is in the Psalter,<sup>3</sup> might I say, 78
 All they that saw me fled away from me;
 Forgot I was, all out of mind away, 80
 Like as the dead, from heartès charitie;
 To a lost vessel likened might I be;
 For many a wight aboutè me dwelling, 83
 Heard I me blame and put in dispraising. . . .
- Some time I thought as lite<sup>4</sup> as any man, 106
 For to have fallen in that wildernessè,
 But God, when that Him list, may, will, and can,
 Our health withdraw and send a wight sick-
 nessè,
 Though man be well this day, no sykernessè<sup>5</sup>
 To him is promised that it shall endure; 111
 God now can hurt and now can heal and cure. . . .
- Through God's just doom and through His judgèment, 393
 And for my bestè now I take and deem,
 Gave that good Lord to me my punishment; 395
 In wealth I took of Him no heed or yeme,<sup>6</sup> Him for to please and Him honóur and queme,<sup>7</sup>
 And me He gave a bone<sup>8</sup> on which to gnaw,
 Me to correct and of Him to have awe.
- He gave me wit, and wit He took away 400
 When that He saw that I it sore misspent,
 And gave again, when it was His to pay
 And granted me my guiltès to repent,
 And then henceforth to set all mine intent
 Unto His Deity to do pleasaunce, 405
 And to amend my sinful governaunce.
- Laud and honóur and thanks unto Thee be,
 Lord God that salve art to all my heaviness!
 Thanks for my wealth and mine adversitie,
 Thanks for mine age and for my sicknèss,
 And thanks be to Thine infinite goodnèss 411
 For all Thy gifts and benefices all,
 And to Thy mercy and Thy grace I call.
- A LAMENT FOR CHAUCER
- (From The Regimen of Princes,<sup>1</sup> c. 1412)
- But welaway! so is my heartè woe 1958
 That the honóur of English tongue is deed,<sup>2</sup>
 Of whom I used to have counsèl and rede.<sup>3</sup>
- O master dear, and father reverent!
 My master Chaucer, flower of eloquence,
 Mirror of fructuous entendement,<sup>4</sup>
 O, universal father in sciéce!
 Alas! that thou thine excellent prudèce 1965
 On thy bed mortal mightest not bequeathè!
 What ailed death? alas! why would he slay thee?
- O death! thou didest not harm singular<sup>5</sup>
 In slaying him, but all this land it smarteth;
 But ne'ertheless, thou hast not any power 1970
 His name to slay; his high virtúe upstarteth Unslain by thee, which aye us lively heart-eth<sup>6</sup>
- With bookès of his ornate inditing,
 That are to all this land illumining. . . . 1974
- Simple my spirit, scarce my letterure<sup>7</sup> 2073
 Unto your excellency for to write
 Mine inward love, and yet, in aventure 2075
 I put myself, although I can but lyte.<sup>8</sup>
 My dearé master—(God his soul requite!) And father, Chaucer, fain would have me taught;
 But I was dull, and little learned or naught.
- <sup>6</sup> Care. <sup>7</sup> Appease.
<sup>8</sup> Possibly an allusion to the proverb: "He that gives thee a bone would not have thee die."
<sup>1</sup> A long didactic poem dedicated to Prince Henry, the future Henry V. The Prologue contains many autobiographical confessions, as well as the familiar passage on Chaucer, given above. <sup>2</sup> Dead.
<sup>5</sup> A single injury. <sup>6</sup> Hearteneth i. e. cheers.
<sup>7</sup> Learning. <sup>8</sup> Know but little.

Alas! my worthy master honourable, 2080
 This landès very treasure and richèssè,
 Death, by thy death, hath harm irreparable
 Done unto us; his vengeable duressè<sup>9</sup>
 Despoiled hath this land of the sweetnèssè
 Of rhetoric; for unto Tullius 2085
 Was never man so like amongst us.

Who was there nearer in philosophie
 To Aristotle, in our tongue, but thou?
 The foot-steps of Virgil in poesie
 Thou followedst sure, this men know well
 enow.<sup>10</sup> 2090
 That cumber-world,<sup>11</sup> that thee, my master slow<sup>12</sup>
 I would were slain! death went too hastily
 To run on thee, and rive thy life of thee.

Death hath but small consideracioun
 Unto the virtuouès, I have espied, 2095
 No more, as showeth the probacioun,<sup>13</sup>
 Than to a vicious master-soundrel tried;<sup>14</sup>
 Among a crowd, is every man maistrifed;<sup>15</sup>
 By him, as well the rich man as the poor;
 Learned or unlearned, alike they stand—no
 more. 2100

He might have held his vengeance yet awhile,
 Till that some man might equal to thee be.
 Nay, let that be! he knew well that this isle Might never bring forth man like unto thee,
 And his officè needès do must he; 2105
 God bade him so, I trust as for the best;
 O master, master, God thy soulè rest! . . . 2107

The firstè finder<sup>16</sup> of our fair langage, 4978
 Hath writ of death as many another one,
 So highly well that it is my dotage<sup>17</sup> 4980
 To speak, I cannot reach what they have done.

Alas! my father from the world is gone—
 My worthy master Chaucer, him I mean—
 Be thou advôcate for him, heaven's queen!

As thou well knowest, O blessèd virgine, 4985
 With loving heart, and high devocioun
 In thine honour he wrought full many a line;
 Grant now thy help and thy promocioun!
 To God thy Son, make thou a mocion,<sup>18</sup>
 How he thy servant was, maiden Marie, 4990
 And let his love flower and fructifie.

Although his life be quenched, the resemb-launcè
 Of him hath in me sô fresh liveliness
 That, to put other men in remembrauncè

<sup>16</sup> Probably the first discoverer of the full resources of our language, not the first poet, as the expression is sometimes explained. Chaucer trusted to his native tongue, while Gower, for instance, wrote in English, Latin and French.

Of his persôn, I have here his likenèss<sup>10</sup> 4995
 Essayed, to this end in truthfulness,
 That they who have of him least thought and
 mind,
 By this portrayal may again him find.

A BALLAD OF GOOD COUNSEL

Since through virtûe increases dignity,
 And virtue, flower and root, is of noblay,<sup>1</sup>
 Of any weal or what estate thou be,
 His steps ensue and dread thou no affray;
 Exile all vice, and follow truth alway; 5
 Luvè most thy God, who first thy luvè began,
 And for each inch He will thee quit a span.

Be not o'er proud in thy prosperity,
 For as it comes, so will it pass away;
 Thy time to count is short, thou may'st well
 see, 10

For of green grass soon cometh withered hay.
 Labour in truth while there is light of day.
 Trust most in God, for He best guide thee can,
 And for an inch He will thee quit a span.

Since word is thrall, and only thought is free, 15
 Tame thou thy tongue, that power has and may,

Shut thou thine eyes on worldly vanity;
 Refrain thy lust and hearken what I say;
 Seize lest thou slide, and creep forth on the way;

Keep thy behest unto thy God and man, 20
 And for each inch He will thee quit a span.

THE TALE OF THE PADDOCK AND THE MOUSE

Upon a time, as Æsop could report,
 A little Mouse came to a river side;
 She might not wade, her shankès were sa short;
 She could not swim, she had na horse to ride;
 Of very force behovèd her to bide, 5
 And to and fra beside the river deep,
 Crying she ran, with mony a piteous peep.

"Help ower, help ower!" this silly Mouse gan cry,

"For Goddès luvè, some body o'er this brim!"<sup>1</sup>

With that a Paddock<sup>2</sup> in the water by, 10
 Put up her heid, and on the bank gan clym;<sup>3</sup>
 Whilk by nature could duck, and gaily swim

<sup>3</sup> Climb.

With voice full rauk,<sup>4</sup> she said in this manéir:
 "Gude morn, Sir Mouse, what is your errand
 here?"

"See'st thou," quoth she, "of corn yon jolie flat<sup>5</sup> 15

Of ripened oats, of barley, pease, and wheat;
 I am hungrie, and fain would be thereat,
 But I am stoppit by this water great;
 And on this side I get na thing to eat
 But hardest nuts, whilk with my teeth I bore. 20
 Were I beyond, my feast were far the more.

"I haf na boat, here is na marinére;
 And though there were, I haf no freight to pay."

Quoth she: "Sister, let be your heavy cheer;
 Do my counsél, and I shall find the way 25
 Withouten horse, brig,<sup>6</sup> boat, or yet gallay,
 To bring you o'er safely—be not afeard—
 Nor even wet the tip of your long beard."

"I haf great wonder," quoth the silly Mouse,
 "How thou can'st float without feathér or fin!

This river is sa deep and dangerous, 31
 Methinks that thou would drownéd be therein.

Tell me, therefore, what facultie or gin,<sup>7</sup>
 Thou hast to bring thee o'er this water?"
 Than<sup>8</sup>

Thus to declare, the Paddock soon began: 35

"With my twa feet," quoth she, "webbéd and braid,<sup>9</sup>

Instead of oars, I row the stream full still;
 And though the flood be perilous to wade,
 Baith to and fra I row at my ain will.

I may not drown,—for why?"—my open gill 40
 Devoidis<sup>10</sup> aye the water I resai<sup>11</sup>,
 Therefore to droun, forsooth, na dreid I haif." 42

The Mouse looked hard upon her fronsit<sup>12</sup> face,
 Her wrinkled cheekès, and her lippès wide;
 Her hanging browès, and her voice sa hace; 45
 Her sprawling leggès, and her harsky<sup>13</sup> hide.

She ran aback, and to the Paddock cried:
 "If I have ony skill in phisnomie,<sup>14</sup>
 Thou hast some part of falsehood and envie.

"For wise men say the inclinaioun 50
 Of mannès thought proceedeth commonlie
 After the corporal complexioun

To guid or ill, as nature will applie;
 A twisted face, a twisted phisnomie.
 The auld provérb is witness of this lorum:<sup>17</sup> 55
Distortum vultum, sequitur distortio morum."

"Na," quoth the Toad, "that proverb is not true;

For fairest things are oftentimes found faikyn.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>17</sup> Deceitful.

The blue-berriès, though they be sad of hue,
 Are gathered when the primrose is forsaken.
 The face may fail to be the heart's true takin,<sup>16</sup>
 Therefore I find this Scripture all in place: 62
 Thou should not judge a man after his face.

"Though I unwholesome be to luik upon,
 I have na cause why I should blaméd be; 65
 Were I as fair as jolie Absalom,
 I am na causer of that great beautie.
 This difference in form and qualitie
 Almighty God hath causéd Dame Natúre
 To print, and set in every créature. 70

"Of some the face may be full flourishing;
 Of silken tongue and cheer richt amorous;
 With mind inconstant, false, and varying,
 With tricky ways, and full of sly deceit."
 "Leave preaching," quoth the Mouse, who longed to eat,
 "And by what craft, now mak me understand,
 You mean to bear me unto yonder land!" 77

"Thou know'st," quoth she, "a body that has need,
 To help himself should mony methods cast;<sup>20</sup>
 Therefore go tak a double twisted threid,<sup>21</sup> 80
 And bind thy leg to mine with knottès fast;
 I shall thee learn to swim, be not aghast."
 "Is that thy counsél?" quoth the silly Mous,
 To prove that play't were over perilous!

"Should I be bound and fast where I am free, 85
 In hope of help? Nay, then beshrew us baith
 For I might lose baith life and libertie!
 If it were so, who might amend my skaith? 22
 But wilt thou swear to me the murther-aith,<sup>23</sup>
 To bring me ower, renouncing fraud or ill, 90
 And safe from hurt?" "In faith," quoth she,
 "I will."

Then up she gazed, and to the heavens gan cry:
 "O Jupiter! of Nature, god and king,
 I mak an aith truly to thee, that I
 This little Mouse shall o'er this water bring."
 This aith was made. The Mouse not pérceiving
 The false device of this foul trickster Taid,<sup>24</sup> 97
 Tuik threid, and bound her leg, as she her bade.

Then foot for foot they leapt baith in the brim;
 But in their minds they were quite different:
 The Mouse thought of na thing but for to swim,
 The Paddock for to drown<sup>25</sup> set her intent.
 When they had gainéd mid-stream, as on they went, 103
 With all her force the Paddock presséd down,
 And thought the Mouse without mercie to drown. 105

<sup>21</sup> Thread.

<sup>22</sup> Apparently an oath by which a person solemnly binds himself not to murder or injure another, or deceive him to his hurt.

Perceiving this, the Mouse on her gan cry:

"Traitor to God, and man-sworn unto me,
Thou swore the murther-aith right now, that I Sans force or harm should ferried be and free!"

And when she saw there was but do or dee,<sup>110</sup>
With all her micht she forced her to swim
And struggled on the Paddock's back to clim.<sup>26</sup>

The dread of death then made her strength increase;

Forced her to save herself with micht and main.

The Mouse upwârd, the Paddock down gan
preis;<sup>27</sup>

Now to, now fra, now duck, now up again. <sup>116</sup>
This silly Mouse thus plunged in great pain,
So fought as lang as breath was in her breist,
Till at the last she cryed for a priest.

As thus she sighed, a Gled<sup>28</sup> perched on a bough, <sup>120</sup>

And to this wretched battle tuik guid heid,<sup>29</sup>
And with a whisk, ere either one knew how,
He clutched his claw between them in the threid;

Then to the land he bore them with guid
speed,

Glad of his prize, which shrieked for fear of skaith, <sup>125</sup>

Then loosed he them, and ruthless slew them
baith. . . .

Blesséd be simple life, withouten dreid;
Blesséd be sober feast in quietie;
Who has enough, of no more has he need,
Though it be little into quantitie. <sup>215</sup>
Great abundáncie, and blind prosperitie,
Of times mak an ill conclusion;
The sweetest life, therefore, in this countrie,

NO TREASURE WITHOUT GLADNESS

Be merry, man! and tak not sair<sup>1</sup> in mind
The wavering of this wretched world of sorrow!

To God be humble and to thy friend be kind,
And with thy neighbours gladly lend and borrow:

His chance to-night, it may be thine tomorrow; <sup>5</sup>

Be blithe in heart for ony adventúre;
For oft with wise men, 't has been said
aforrow,<sup>2</sup>

Without gladnéss availis no treasúre.

Mak thee gude cheer of it that God thee sends,
For warldis wrack<sup>3</sup> but welfare nocht availis.
No gude is thine, save only that thou spends;<sup>11</sup>
Remanent all thou brookis but with bales.
Seek to soláce when sadness thee assails;
In dolour long thy life may not endure,
Wherefore of comfort set up all thy sails; <sup>15</sup>
Without gladnéss availis no treasúre.

Follow on pity, flee trouble and debate,

With famous folk aye hold thy company;
Be charitable and humble in thine estate,
For wardly honour lastés but a cry;<sup>4</sup> <sup>20</sup>
For trouble in earth tak no melancholy;
Be rich in patience, if thou in goods be poor;
Who livés merry he lives michtily;
Without gladnéss availis no treasúre.

Thou seest these wretches set with sorrow and care <sup>25</sup>

To gather goods in all their livés space;
And, when their bags are full, their selves are bare,

And of their riches but the keeping hes;<sup>5</sup> While others come to spend it, that have
grace,

Whilk of thy winnings no labour had nor cure;<sup>6</sup>
Tak thou example, and spend with merriness;
Without gladnéss availis no treasúre. <sup>32</sup>

Though all the wealth<sup>7</sup> that e'er had living wight
Were only thine, no more thy part does fall

But meat, drink, clothes, and of the rest a sight, Yet, to the Judge, thou shalt give 'compt of
all. <sup>36</sup>

Ane reckoning richt comes of ane ragment<sup>8</sup> small,

Be just and joyous, and do to nane injúre,
And truth shall mak thee strong, as ony wall;
Without gladnéss availis no treasúre. <sup>40</sup>

THE DANCE OF THE SEVEN DEADLY SINS

Of Februar the fifteenth nicht,
Full lang before the dayes licht,

I lay in-till a trance;
And then I saw baith Heaven and Hell;

Methocht, among the fiendés fell, <sup>5</sup>
Mahoun<sup>1</sup> gan cry ane dance

Of sinners that were never shriven,
Against the feast of Fastern's even,<sup>2</sup>

To mak their observáncie.

<sup>2</sup> Fastens or fastings even, Shrove Tuesday, the evening preceding the fast of Lent. It was a season of riotous festivity.

He bad mak ready masqueris' guise, 10
To cut up capers in the skies,
As varlets do in France.<sup>3</sup> . . . 12

"Let see," quoth he, "now who begins," 19
With that the foul Seven Deadly Sins
Began to leap at anis.<sup>4</sup>
And first of all in dance was Pride,
With hair thrown back, and bonnet on side,
Like to mak vastie wanis;<sup>5</sup>
And round about him, as a wheel, 25
Hangs all in rumples to the heel
His cassock for the nanis;<sup>6</sup>
Many a proud troumpour<sup>7</sup> with him tripped;
Through scalding fire aye as they skipped
They girmed with hideous granis.<sup>8</sup> 30

Then Ire came in with sturt<sup>9</sup> and strife:
His hand was aye upon his knife,
He brandished like a bear:
Boasters, braggers, and bargainérs,
After him passed in in pairs,
All clad in garb of weir;<sup>10</sup>
In jacks, and mail, and bonnets of steel,
They were in armour to the heel,
Full froward was their air;
Some upon other with brands beft,<sup>11</sup>
Some jaggit others to the heft,
With knives that sharp could shear.

Next in the dance followed Envy,
Filled full with feud and felony,
Hid malice and despite;
For privy hatred that traitor trembled;
Him followed many a rogue dissembled
With feigned wordis white:
And flatterers untó men's faces;
And backbiters in secret places
To lie that had delight;
And whisperers of false lesings,<sup>12</sup>
Alace! that courts of noble kings
Of them can never be quyte.<sup>13</sup>

Next him in dance came Covetice, 55
Root of all ill, and ground of vice,
That never could be content:
Catiffs, wretches, and usurers,
Misers, hoarders, gatherers,
All with that warlook went:
Out of their throats they shot on other
Hot, molten gold, me thoct, a futher<sup>14</sup>
As fire-flaught<sup>15</sup> maist fervent;
Aye, as they emptied them of shot,
Fiends filled them new up to the throat,
With gold of all kind prent.<sup>16</sup> . . .

Nae minstrels played to them nae doubt, 103
For gleemen there were holden out,
By day and eke by nicht; 105

Except a minstrel that slew a man,
So to his heritage he wan,
And entered by brief of richt.<sup>17</sup>
Then cried Mahoun for a Hielan' Padyane:<sup>18</sup>
Syne ran a fiend to fetch Makfadyane,<sup>19</sup> 110
For northwast in a nook:
When he the coronach had done shout,
Erse<sup>20</sup> men so gatherèd him about,
In hell great room they took.

Thae termagents, with tag and tatter, 115
Ful loud in Erse began to chatter,
And roup<sup>21</sup> like raven and rook.
The Devil sae deaved was with their yell,
That in the deepest pot of hell
He smorit<sup>22</sup> them with smoke! 120

THE LAMENT FOR THE MAKERS<sup>1</sup>

WHEN HE WAS SICK

I that in health was and gladnéss,
Am troubled now with great sicknéss,
And feeble with infirmity;
Timor Mortis conturbat me.
Our pleasunce here is all vain glory, 5
This false world is but transitory,
The flesh is bruckle,<sup>2</sup> the Fiend is slee;<sup>3</sup>
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

The state of man does change and vary,
Now sound, now sick, now blithe, now sary,<sup>4</sup> 10
Now dancing merry, now like to dee;
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

No state on earth stands fast, I find;
As osiers light wave in the wind,
So waveth this world's vanity; 15
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

Down unto death go all estates,
Prelates, and kings, and potentates,
Baith rich and poor of all degree; 20
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

Death strikes the knights up'n the field,
Full armoured, under helm and shield,
Victor in every fight is he;
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

That strong, unmerciful tyránd<sup>5</sup> 25
Taks, on the mother's breast sowkand,<sup>6</sup>
The babe full of benignity;
Timor Mortis conturbat me.

<sup>18</sup> In Dunbar's time and for long after, the Highlanders were regarded with a feeling of mingled dread and contempt by the more settled and prosperous people of the South. Cf. the attitude of Baillie Nichol Jarvie in Scott's Rob Roy.

<sup>19</sup> An opponent of Wallace, the Scotch patriot. After swearing allegiance to Edward Ist, Makfadyane fled to a cave, where he was surprised and killed. Hence the assertion that he was surised from a "nook" in the "northwest."

WELCOME TO THE SUMMER SUN

(From the Prologue to the Æneid,<sup>1</sup> Bk. XII)

Welcome, the lord of licht, and lamp of day,
 Welcome, fost'rer of tender herbés green,
 Welcome, quick'ner of blooming blossoms
 sheen,

Welcome, support of every root and vein,
 Welcome, comfórt of all-kind fruit and grain,<sup>2</sup>
 Welcome, the birdés bield<sup>3</sup> upon the brere,<sup>4</sup>
 Welcome, maistér and ruler of the year,
 Welcome, welfare<sup>5</sup> of farmers at the ploughs,
 Welcome, repairer of woods, trees, and boughs,
 Welcome, depainter of the blooming meads,<sup>6</sup>
 Welcome, the life of everything that spredes,
 Welcome, the strength of all-kind bestial,
 Welcome be thy bricht beamés gladding all,
 Welcome, celestial mirror and aspy,<sup>7</sup>
 Arresting all that practise sluggardy. 15

<sup>1</sup> The translation of the Æneid is generally acknowledged to be Douglas's most important work. It is noteworthy as the earliest attempt to reproduce a great classical poem in English verse. The prologues prefaced to the various books, contain some vivid and forcible descriptions of Nature, and are intrinsically the most interesting parts of the work.

<sup>10</sup> Among the twenty-four poets celebrated by Dunbar, Chaucer alone remains a living power in literature. Barbour, Gower, Lydgate and Henryson hold a secure and honorable place; while a few others, as Blind Harry and Walter Kennedy, although less known, are still nominally remembered. Some of the remainder are more or less securely established on the right side of oblivion, while others, in Sir T. Browne's phrase, "Subsist under naked nominations, without deserts and noble acts, which are the balm of our memories."

AN APOLOGY FOR WRITING IN THE VULGAR AND MATERNAL LAN-GUAGE(From The Monarchy,<sup>1</sup> 1553)

Gentle redár, have at me na despite,
Thinking that I presumptuously pretend,
In vulgar<sup>2</sup> tongue sa high matter to write: 540
But, where I miss, I pray thee to amend,
By the unlearned I would the cause were kend,
Of our maist miserable travail and torment,
And how in earth na place is permanent.

Howbeit that divers devoted cunning clerks,<sup>3</sup>
In Latin tongue have written sundry books: 546
Our unlearned know little of their werks;
Mair than they do the raving of the rooks:
Wherefore to colliers, carters, and to cooks,
To Jock and Tom, my rime shall be directet,
By cunning men howbeit it will be lacket.<sup>4</sup> 551

Though every common may not be a clerk,
And have no lore except their tongue maternal,
Why should of God the marvellous heavenly werk

Be hid from them, I think it not fraternal: 555
The Father of heaven, who was and is eternal,
To Moses gave the law on Mount Sináy
Neither in Greek nor Latin, as I hear say.

He writ the law in tables hard of stone,
In their ain vulgar language of Hebréw; 560
That all the bairns of Israel, every one,
Micht know the law, and so the same ensue.
But had he writ in Latin or in Grew,<sup>5</sup>
It had to them been but a savourless jest,
Ye may well wist God wrought all for the best.

Aristotell, nor Plato, I hear sane,<sup>6</sup> 566
Writ not their high philosophie natúral,
In Danish, Dutch, nor tongue Italián,
But in the maist ornate<sup>7</sup> tongue máternal,
Whose fame and name do ring perpetual; 570
Famous Virgill, the prince of poetrie,
Nor Cicero, the flower of oratrie,

Writ not in Caldíe language, nor in Grew;
Nor yet writ in the language Saracene;
Nor in the natural<sup>8</sup> language of Hebréw; 575
But in the Roman tongue, as may be seen,
Whilk was their proper language, as I ween,
When Romans ranked dominators, indeed,
The ornate Latin was their proper leid.<sup>9</sup> . . . 579

<sup>1</sup> The Monarchy, or Ane Dialog betwix Experience and ane Courtour, Lyndsay's last poem, is a lengthy survey of the history of the world, with a prophecy of the mil-lenium, when all things shall be made new.

And Solomon, who was his son and heir,
Did mak his buke intill the tongue vulgair,
Why should not their saying be to us shown 669
In our language, I would the cause were known.

Let doctors write their curious questiouns,
And arguments, sown full of sophistrie;
Their logic, and their high opiniouns,
And their dark judgments of astronomie, 675
Their medicine, and their philosophie;
Let poets show their glorious ingyne,<sup>10</sup>
As ever they please, in Greek, or in Latine:

But let us have the bookés necessare
To commonweal and our salvatioun,
Justly translated in our tongue vulgaire: 680
And so I mak the supplicatioun,
O gentle redar, have na indignatioun,
Thinking I meddle with so high mattair:
Now to my purpose forward will I fare.

LEAVE ME NOT

(Psalm XXVII, 9)

Ah! my Lord, leave me not,
Leave me not, leave me not,
Ah! my Lord, leave me not,
Thus mine alone:
With ane burden on my back 5
I may not bear, I am so weak,
Lord, this burden from me tak,
Or else I am gone.

With sins I am laden sair,<sup>1</sup>
Leave me not, leave me not, 10
With sins I am laden sair,
Leave me not alone:
I pray thee, Lord, therefore,
Keep not my sins in store;
Loose me, or I am forlore,<sup>2</sup> 15
And hear thou my moan.

With Thy hands Thou hast me wrought,
Leave me not, leave me not,
With Thy hands Thou hast me wrought,
Leave me not alone: 20
I was sold and Thou me bought,
With Thy blood Thou hast me coft;<sup>3</sup>
Now am I hither sought
To Thee, Lord, alone.

I cry and call to Thee, 25
To leave me not, to leave me not,
I cry and call to Thee,
To leave me not alone:

<sup>10</sup> Genius.

All they that laden be,
Thou bidst them come to Thee,
Then shall they saved be,
Through Thy mercy alone.

Thou savest all the penitent,
And leav'st them not, and leav'st them not.
Thou savest all the penitent,
And leav'st them not alone.
All that will their sins repent,
None of them shall be shent,<sup>4</sup>
Suppose Thy bow be ready bent,
Of them Thou killest none.

Faith, hope, and charity,
Leave me not, leave me not,
Faith, hope, and charity,
Leave me not alone.
I pray Thee, Lord, grant me,
These godly giftes three,
Then shall I saved be,
Doubt have I none.

To the Father be all glore,<sup>5</sup>
That leaves us not, that leaves us not,
To the Father be all glore,
That leaves us not alone.
Son and Holy Ghost e'rmore,
As it is and was before;
Through Christ our Saviour
We are safe every one.

BALLADS OF UNCERTAIN DATE

ROBIN HOOD AND GUY OF GISBORNE

When shaws<sup>1</sup> be sheen, and shradd<sup>2</sup> full fair,
And leaves both large and long,
It is merry, walking in the fair forest,
To hear the small birds' song.

The witwall<sup>3</sup> sang, and would not cease,
Sitting upon the spray,
So loud, he wakened Robin Hood,
In the greenwood where he lay.

"Now by my fay," said jolly Robin,
"A sweven<sup>4</sup> I had this night,
I dreamt me of two wight yeomen,
That fast with me gan fight.

"Me thought they did me beat and bind,
And took my bow me fro;
If I be Robin alive in this land,
I'll be wrocken<sup>5</sup> on both them two."

"Sweavens are swift, master," quoth John,
"As the wind that blows o'er a hill:
For if it be never so loud this night,
Tomorrow it may be still."

"Busk ye, bowne ye,<sup>6</sup> my merry men all,
For John shall go with me;
For I'll go seek yond wight yeomen
In greenwood where they be."

They cast on their gown of green,
A shooting gone are they,
Until they came to the merry greenwood,
Where they had gladdest be;
There were they ware of a wight yeoman,
His body leaned to a tree.

A sword and a dagger he wore by his side,
Had been many a man's bane,
And he was clad in his capull-hide,<sup>7</sup>
Top, and tail, and mane.

"Stand you still, master," quoth Little John, <sup>35</sup>
"Under this trusty tree,
And I will go to yonder wight yeoman,
To know his meaning truly."

"Ah, John, by me thou sett'st no store,
And that's a farley<sup>8</sup> thing; <sup>40</sup>
How oft send I my men before,
And tarry myself behind?"

"It is no cunning a knave to ken,
An<sup>9</sup> a man but hear him speak;
An it were not for bursting of my bow, <sup>45</sup>
John, I would thy head break."

But often words they breeden bale,<sup>10</sup>
That parted Robin and John;
John is gone to Barnesdale,
The gates<sup>11</sup> he knows each one. <sup>50</sup>

And when he came to Barnesdale,
Great heaviness there he had;
He found two of his fellows
Were slain both in a slade,<sup>12</sup>

And Scarlett afoot a-flying was, <sup>55</sup>
Over stocks and stone,
For the sheriff with seven score men
Fast after him is gone.

"Yet one shot I'll shoot," says Little John,
"With Christ his might and main; <sup>60</sup>
I'll make yond fellow that flies so fast
To be both glad and fain."

John bent up a good yew bow,
And fettle<sup>13</sup> him to shoot;
The bow was made of a tender bough, <sup>65</sup>
And fell down to his foot.

"Woe worth thee, wicked wood," said Little John,
"That ere thou grew on a tree!
For this day thou art my bale,
My boot<sup>14</sup> when thou should be!" <sup>70</sup>

- This shot it was but loosely shot,
The arrow flew in vain,
And it met one of the sheriff's men;
Good William of Trent was slain.
- It had been better for William of Trent 75
To hang upon a gallow
Than for to lie in the greenwood,
There slain with an arrow.
- And it is said, when men be met,
Six can do more than three: 80
And they have ta'en Little John,
And bound him fast to a tree.
- "Thou shalt be drawn by dale and down,"
quoth the sheriff,
"And hanged high on a hill:"
"But thou may fail," quoth Little John, 85
"If it be Christ's own will."
- Let us leave talking of Little John,
For he is bound fast to a tree,
And talk of Guy and Robin Hood
In the greenwood where they be. 90
- How these two yeomen together they met,
Under the leaves of lime,
To see what merchandise they made
Even at that same time.
- "Good morrow, good fellow," quoth Sir Guy; 95
"Good morrow, good fellow," quoth he;
"Methinks by this bow thou bear'st in thy hand
A good archer thou seems to be."
- "I am wilful of my way," quoth Sir Guy,
"And of my morning tide:"<sup>15</sup> 100
"I'll lead thee through the wood," quoth Robin,
"Good fellow, I'll be thy guide."
- "I seek an outlaw," quoth Sir Guy,
"Men call him Robin Hood;
I had rather meet with him upon a day 105
Than forty pound of gold."
- "If you two met, it would be seen whether were better
Afore ye did part away;
Let us some other pastime find,
Good fellow, I thee pray. 110
- "Let us some other masteries<sup>16</sup> make,
And we will walk in the woods even;
We may chance meet with Robin Hood
At some unset steven."<sup>17</sup>
- They cut them down the summer shroggs<sup>18</sup> 115
Which grew both under a brere,<sup>19</sup>
And set them three score rods in tawn,
To shoot the pricks<sup>20</sup> full neare.
- "Lead on, good fellow," said Sir Guy,
"Lead on, I do bid thee:" 120
"Nay, by my faith," quoth Robin Hood,
"The leader thou shalt be."
- The first good shot that Robin led,
Did not shoot an inch the prick fro;
Guy was an archer good enough, 125
But he could ne'er shootè so.
- The second shot Sir Guy shot,
He shot within the garland;<sup>21</sup>
But Robin Hood shot it better than he,
For he clove the good prick-wand. 130
- "God's blessing on thy heart!" says Guy,
"Good fellow, thy shooting is good;
For an thy heart be as good as thy hands,
Thou were better than Robin Hood.
- "Tell me thy name, good fellow," quoth Guy,
"Under the leaves of lynce:" 136
"Nay, by my faith," quoth good Robin,
"Till thou have told me thine."
- "I dwell by dale and down," quoth Guy,
"And I have done many a curst turn;
And he that calls me by my right name,
Calls me Guy of good Gisborne."
- "My dwelling is in the wood," says Robin;
"By thee I set right nought;
My name is Robin Hood of Barnesdale, 145
A fellow thou hast long sought."
- He that had neither been of kith nor kin
Might have seen a full fair sight,
To see how together these yeomen went,
With blades both brown and bright. 150
- To have seen how these yeomen together fought
Two hours of a summer's day;
It was neither Guy nor Robin Hood
That fettle<sup>22</sup> them to fly away.
- Robin was reckless of a root, 155
And stumbled at that tide,<sup>23</sup>
And Guy was quick and nimble withal,
And hit him o'er the left side.
- "Ah, dear Lady!" said Robin Hood,
"Thou art both mother and may!"<sup>24</sup> 160
I think it was never man's destiny
To die before his day."
- Robin thought on Our Lady dear,
And soon leapt up again,
And thus he came with an awkward<sup>25</sup> stroke; 165
Good Sir Guy he has slain.
- He took Sir Guy's head by the hair,
And stuck it on his bow's end:
"Thou hast been traitor all thy life,
Which thing must have an end." 170

<sup>15</sup> Time. <sup>16</sup> Trials of skill. <sup>17</sup> Unappointed time.<sup>18</sup> Stunted shrubs.<sup>19</sup> Briar.<sup>20</sup> A wand or white mark used as the bull's eye of the target.<sup>21</sup> The ring around the centre of the target.<sup>22</sup> Made ready.<sup>23</sup> Time.<sup>24</sup> Maid, virgin.<sup>25</sup> Unexpected.

- Robin pulled forth an Irish knife,
And nicked Sir Guy in the face,
That he was never of a woman born
Could tell who Sir Guy was.
- Says, "Lie there, lie there, good Sir Guy, 175
And with me be not wroth;
If thou have had the worse strokes at my hand,
Thou shalt have the better cloth."
- Robin did off his gown of green,
Sir Guy he did it throw; 180
And he put on that capull-hide
That clad him top to toe.
- "The bow, the arrows, and little horn,
And with me now I'll bear;
For now I will go to Barnesdale, 185
To see how my men do fare."
- Robin set Guy's horn to his mouth,
A loud blast in it he did blow;
That beheard the sheriff of Nottingham,
As he leanéd under a lowe.<sup>26</sup> 190
- "Hearken! hearken!" said the sheriff,
"I heard no tidings but good;
For yonder I hear Sir Guy's horn blow,
For he hath slain Robin Hood.
- "For yonder I hear Sir Guy's horn blow, 195
It blows so well in tide,<sup>27</sup>
For yonder comes that wighty yeoman,
Clad in his capull-hide.
- "Come hither, thou good Sir Guy,
Ask of me what thou wilt have;" 200
"I'll none of thy gold," says Robin Hood,
"Nor I'll none of it have.
- "But now I have slain the master," he said,
"Let me go strike the knave;
This is all the reward I ask, 205
Nor no other will have."
- "Thou art a madman," said the sheriff,
"Thou should'st have had a knight's fee;
Seeing thy asking hath been so bad,
Well granted it shall be." 210
- But Little John heard his master speak,
Well he knew that was his steven;<sup>28</sup>
"Now shall I be loosed," quoth Little John,
"With Christ's might in heaven."
- But Robin he hied him towards Little John, 215
He thought he would loose him belive;<sup>29</sup>
The sheriff and all his company
Fast after him did drive.
- "Stand aback! stand aback!" said Robin;
"Why draw you me so near?" 220
It was never the use in our country One's shrift another should hear."
- But Robin pulled forth an Irish knife,
And loosed John hand and foot,
And gave him Sir Guy's bow in his hand, 225
And bade it be his boot.<sup>30</sup>
- But John took Guy's bow in his hand
(His arrows were rusty by the root);
The sheriff saw Little John draw a bow
And fettle<sup>31</sup> him to shoot. 230
- Towards his house in Nottingham
He fled full fast away,
And so did all his company,
Not one behind did stay.
- But he could neither so fast go, 235
Nor away so fast run,
But Little John, with an arrow broad,
Did cleave his heart in twinn.<sup>32</sup>
- ### THE HUNTING OF THE CHEVIOT
- The Percy out of Northumberland,
And a vow to God made he
That he would hunt in the mountains
Of Cheviot within days three, 5
In the maugre of doughty Douglas,
And all that ever with him be.
- The fattest harts in all Cheviot
He said he would kill, and carry them away:
"By my faith," said the doughty Douglas again,
"I will let<sup>1</sup> that hunting if I may." 10
- Then the Percy out of Bamboro came,
With him a mighty meyne,<sup>2</sup>
With fifteen hundred archers bold of blood and bone;
They were chosen out of shires three.
- This began on a Monday at morn, 15
In Cheviot the hills so hie;<sup>3</sup>
The child may rue that is unborn,
It was the more pitie.
- The drivers through the woodès went,
For to rouse the deer; 20
Bowmen bickered<sup>4</sup> upon the bent<sup>5</sup>
With their broad arrows clear.
- Then the wild<sup>6</sup> through the woodès went,
On every sidè sheer;<sup>7</sup>
Greyhoundès through the grovès glent, 25
For to kill their deer.
- This began in Cheviot the hills about,
Early on a Monnyn-day;<sup>8</sup>
By that it drew to the hour of noon,
A hundred fat harts dead there lay. 30
- They blew a mort<sup>9</sup> upon the bent,
They assembled on sidès sheer;
To the quarry then the Percy went,
To see the brittling<sup>10</sup> of the deer.

- He said, "It was the Douglas' promise 35
This day to meet me here;
But I wist he would fail, verament;"<sup>11</sup>
A great oath the Percy swear.<sup>12</sup>
- At the last a squire of Northumberland
Looked at his hand full nie; <sup>13</sup> 40
He was ware of the doughty Douglas coming,
With him a mighty meyné.<sup>14</sup>
- Both with spear, bill, and brand,
It was a mighty sight to see;
Hardier men, both of heart nor hand, 45
Were not in Christiantie.
- They were twenty hundred spearmen good,
Withouté any fail;
They were born along by the water of Tweed,
In the bounds of Tividale. 50
- "Leave off the brittling of the deer," he said,
"And to your bows look you take good heed;
For never since ye were of your mothers born
Had ye never so mickle need."
- The doughty Douglas on a steed, 55
He rode all his men before;
His armor glittered as did a glede;<sup>15</sup>
A bolder bairn was never born.
- "Tell me whose men ye are," he says,
"Or whose men that ye be: 60
Who gave you leave to hunt in this Cheviot chase,<sup>16</sup>
In the spite of mine and of me."
- The first man that ever him an answer made,
It was the good lord Percé:
"We will not tell thee whose men we are," he 65
says,
"Nor whose men that we be;
But we will hunt here in this chase,
In the spite of thine and of thee."
- "The fattest hartés in all Cheviot
We have killed, and cast to carry them away;" 70
"By my troth," said the doughty Douglas again,
"Therefore the one of us shall die this day."
- Then said the doughty Douglas Unto the lord Percé:
"To kill all these guiltless men, 75
Alas, it were great pitie!
- "But, Percé, thou art a lord of land,
I am an earl called within my countrie;
Let all our men upon a party<sup>17</sup> stand,
And do<sup>18</sup> the battle of thee and of me." 80
- "Now Christ's curse on his crown," said the lord Percé,
"Whosoever thereto says nay;
By my troth, doughty Douglas," he says,
"Thou shalt never see that day."
- "Neither in England, Scotland, nor France, 85
Nor for no man of a woman born,
But, an<sup>19</sup> fortune be my chance,
I dare meet him, one man for one."
- Then bespake a squire of Northumberland,
Richard Wytharynton was his name: 90
"It shall never be told in South England," he
says,
"To King Harry the Fourth for shame."
- "I wot you be great lordés two,
I am a poor squire of land:
I will never see my captain fight on a field, 95
And stand myself and look on,
But while I may my weapon wield,
I will not fail both heart and hand."
- That day, that day, that dreadful day!
The first fit<sup>20</sup> here I fynde;<sup>21</sup> 100
An you will hear any more of the hunting of the Cheviot,
Yet is there more behind.
- The English men had their bows i-bent,
Their hearts were good enough;
The first of arrows that they shot off, 105
Seven score spearmen they slough.<sup>22</sup>
- Yet bideth the earl Douglas upon the bent,
A captain good enough,
And that was seené verament,
For he wrought them both woe and wough.<sup>23</sup>
- The Douglas parted his host in three, 111
Like a chief chieftan of pride;
With sure spears of mighty tree,
They came in on every side:
- Though our English archery 115
Gave many a wound full wide;
Many a doughty they gared to dee,<sup>24</sup>
Which gained them no pride.
- The English men let their bowés be,
And pulled out brands that were bright; 120
It was a heavy sight to see
Bright swords on basnets<sup>25</sup> light.
- Through riché mail and manople,<sup>26</sup>
Many stern<sup>27</sup> they struck down straight;
Many a freke<sup>28</sup> that was full free, 125
There under foot did light.
- At last the Douglas and the Percy met,
Like to captains of might and of main;
They swapped<sup>29</sup> together till they both sweat,
With swords that were of fine Millan.<sup>30</sup> 130
- These worthy frekés for to fight,
Thereto they were full fain,
Till the blood out of their basnets sprent,<sup>31</sup>
As ever did hail or rain.

- "Yield thee, Percy," said the Douglás, 135
 "And i'faith I shall thee bring
 Where thou shalt have an earl's wagés
 Of Jamie our Scottish king.
- "Thou shalt have thy ransom free,
 I hight<sup>32</sup> thee here this thing; 140
 For the manfullest man yet art thou
 That ever I conquered in field fighting."
- "Nay," said the lord Percé,
 "I told it thee befor,
 That I would never yielded be 145
 To no man of a woman born."
- With that there came an arrow hastily,
 Forth of a mighty one;
 It hath stricken the earl Douglás 150
 In at the breast-bone.
- Thorough liver and lungés both
 The sharp arrow is gone,
 That never after in all his life-days
 He spake more wordés but one:
 That was, "Fight ye, my merry men, whiles ye
 may,
 For my life-days be gone." 156
- The Percy leanéd on his brand,
 And saw the Douglas dee;<sup>33</sup>
 He took the dead man by the hand,
 And said, "Woe is me for thee! 160
- "To have saved thy life, I would have parted with
 My landés for years three,
 For a better man, of heart nor of hand,
 Was not in all the north countrié."
- Of all that saw a Scottish knight, 165
 Was called Sir Hugh the Montgomery;
 He saw the Douglas to the death was dight,<sup>34</sup>
 He spendés<sup>35</sup> a spear of trusty tree.
- He rode upon a corsiare<sup>36</sup>
 Through a hundred archerý: 170
 He never stinted,<sup>37</sup> nor never stopped,
 Till he came to the good lord Percé.
- He set upon the lord Percé
 A dint that was full sore;
 With a sure spear of a mighty tree, 175
 Clean through the body he the Percy ber,<sup>38</sup>
- On the other side that a man might see
 A large cloth-yard and mare:
 Two better captains were not in Christiantié 180
 Than that day slain were there.
- An archer of Northumberland
 Saw slain was the lord Percé;
 He bare a bended bow in his hand,
 Was made of trusty tree.
- An arrow, that a cloth-yard was long, 185
 To the hard steel hauled he;
 A dint that was both sad and sore
 He set on Sir Hugh the Montgomery.
- The dint it was both sad and sore,
 That he on Montgomery set; 190
 The swan-feathers that his arrow bore
 With his heart-blood they were wet.
- There was never a man one foot would flee,
 But still in stour<sup>39</sup> did stand,
 Hewing on each other, while they mighté 195
 dree,<sup>40</sup>
 With many a baleful brand.
- This battle began in Cheviot
 An hour before the noon,
 And when even-song bell was rung,
 The battle was not half doon. 200
- They took . . .<sup>41</sup> on either hand
 By the light of the moon;
 Many had no strength for to stand,
 In Cheviot the hills about.<sup>42</sup>
- Of fifteen hundred archers of England 205
 Went away but seventy and three;
 Of twenty hundred spearmen of Scotland,
 But even five and fifty.
- But all were slain Cheviot within;
 They had no strength to stand on hie;<sup>43</sup> 210
 The child may rue that is unborn,
 It was the more pittie.
- There was slain, with the lord Percy,
 Sir John of Agerstone,
 Sir Roger, the hinde<sup>44</sup> Hartly, 215
 Sir William, the bold Hearone.
- Sir Jorg, the worthy Lumley,
 A knight of great renown,
 Sir Ralph, the riché Rugby,
 With dints were beaten down. 220
- For Wetharryngton my heart was woe,
 That ever he slain should be;
 For when both his legs were hewn in two,
 Yet he kneeled and fought on his knee.
- There was slain, with the doughty Douglas, 225
 Sir Hugh the Montgomery,
 Sir Davy Lambwell, that worthy was,
 His sister's son was he.
- Sir Charles of Murray in that place,
 That never a foot would flee; 230
 Sir Hugh Maxwell, a lord he was,
 With the Douglas did he dee.
- So on the morrow they made them biers
 Of birch and hazel so gray;
 Many widows, with weeping tears,
 Came to fetch their mates away. 235

<sup>32</sup> Promise. <sup>33</sup> Die. <sup>34</sup> Prepared.<sup>35</sup> Placed in rest.<sup>36</sup> Swift horse.<sup>37</sup> Stopped.<sup>38</sup> Bore, thrust.<sup>39</sup> Stress of battle.<sup>41</sup> Omission in the Ms.<sup>42</sup> Stand upright.<sup>43</sup> Endure.<sup>44</sup> Above.<sup>45</sup> Gentle.

Tivdale may carp of care,
Northumberland may make great moan,
For two such captains as slain were there,
On the border-side shall never be none. 240

Word is comen to Edinboro,
To Jamie the Scottish king,
That doughty Douglas, lieutenant of the Marches,<sup>46</sup>
He lay slain Cheviot within.

His handes did he weal<sup>46</sup> and wring, 245
He said, "Alas, and woe is me!
Such another captain Scotland within,"
He said, "i' faith should never be."

Word is comen to lovely London,
To the fourth Harry our King, 250
That lord Percy, lieutenant of the Marches,
He lay slain Cheviot within.

"God have mercy on his soul," said King Harry,
"Good Lord, if thy will it be!
I have a hundred captains in England," he said, 255
"As good as ever was he:
But, Percy, an I brook<sup>47</sup> my life,
Thy death well quit shall be."

As our noble king made his avow,
Like a noble prince of renown, 260
For the death of the lord Percy
He did<sup>48</sup> the battle of Hombill-down;

Where six and thirty Scottish knights
On a day were beaten down:
Glendale glittered on their armor bright, 265
Over castle, tower, and town.

This was the hunting of the Cheviot,
That there began this spurn;<sup>49</sup>
Old men that know the ground well enough
Call it the battle of Otterburn. 270

At Otterburn began this spurn
Upon a Monnyn-day;
There was the doughty Douglas slain,
The Percy never went away.

There was never a time on the Marches' side
Since the Douglas and the Percy met, 276
But it is marvel an the red blood ran not,
As the rain does in the stret.<sup>50</sup>

Jesu Christ our balès bring,<sup>51</sup>
And to the bliss us bet!
Thus was the hunting of the Cheviot:
God send us all good ending! 280

SIR PATRICK SPENS

The king sits in Dumferling town,
Drinking the blude-red wine:
"O whare will I get guid sailor,
To sail this ship of mine?"

Up and spak an eldern knight, 5
Sat at the king's right knee:
"Sir Patrick Spens is the best sailor,
That sails upon the sea."

The king has written a braid<sup>1</sup> letter, 10
And signed it wi his hand,
And sent it to Sir Patrick Spens,
Was walking on the sand.

The first line that Sir Patrick read,
A loud laugh laughed he; 15
The next line that Sir Patrick read,
The tear blinded his ee.

"O wha is this has done this deed,
This ill deed done to me,
To send me out this time o' the year,
To sail upon the sea! 20

"Mak haste, mak haste, my merry men all,
Our guid ship sails the morn:"
"O say na sae, my master dear,
For I fear a deadlie storm.

"Late late yestreen I saw the new moon, 25
Wi the auld moon in her arm,
And I fear, I fear, my dear master,
That we will come to harm."

O our Scots nobles were right loth, 30
To wet their cork-heeled shoon;
But lang or a' the play were played,
Their hats they swam aboon.

O lang, lang may the ladies sit,
Wi their fans into their hand,
Or ere they see Sir Patrick Spens 35
Come sailing to the land.

O lang, lang may the ladies stand,
Wi their gold kems in their hair,
Waiting for their ain dear lords, 40
For they'll see them na mair.

Half o'er, half o'er to Aberdour,
Its fifty fathom deep,
And there lies guid Sir Patrick Spens,
Wi' the Scots lords at his feet.

THE TWA CORBIES <sup>1</sup>

As I was walking all alane,
I heard twa corbies making a mane:<sup>2</sup>
The tane unto the tither did say,
"Whar sall we gang and dine the day?"

"In behint yon auld fail<sup>3</sup> dyke, 5
I wot there lies a new-slain knight;
And naeboddy kens that he lies there
But his hawk, his hound, and his lady fair.

"His hound is to the hunting gane,
His hawk to fetch the wild-fowl hame, 10
His lady's ta'en anither mate,
Sae we may mak' our dinner sweet.

<sup>2</sup> Moan.

<sup>3</sup> Turf, sod.

"Ye'll sit on his white hause-bane,<sup>4</sup>
 And I'll pike out his bonny blue e'en;
 Wi' ae lock o' his gowden hair
 We'll theek<sup>5</sup> our nest when it grows bare.

"Mony's the one for him makes mane,
 But nane sall ken whar he is gane.
 O'er his white banes, when they are bare,
 The wind sall blaw for evermair."

THE TWA SISTERS O' BINNORIE

There were twa sisters sat in a bow'r;
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 A knight cam' there, a noble wooer,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

He courted the eldest wi' glove and ring,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 But he lo'ed the youngest aboon a' thing,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

The eldest she was vexed sair,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 And sair envied her sister fair,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

Upon a morning fair and clear,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 She cried upon her sister dear,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

"O sister, sister, tak' my hand,"
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 "And let's go down to the river-strand,"
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

She's ta'en her by the lily hand,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 And down they went to the river-strand
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

The youngest stood upon a stane,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 The eldest cam' and pushed her in,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

"O sister, sister, reach your hand!"
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 "And ye sall be heir o' half my land"—
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

"O sister, reach me but your glove!"
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 "And sweet William sall be your love"—
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

Sometimes she sank, sometimes she swam,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 Till she cam' to the mouth o' yon mill-dam,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

Out then cam' the miller's son
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 15 And saw the fair maid soummin' in,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

"O father, father, draw your dam!"
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 45 "There's either a mermaid or a swan,"
 20 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

The miller quickly drew the dam,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 50 And there he found a drown'd woman,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

Round about her middle sma'
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 5 There went a gouden girdle bra'
 55 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

All amang her yellow hair
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 10 A string o' pearls was twisted rare,
 60 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

On her fingers lily-white,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 The jewel-rings were shining bright,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

And by there cam' a harper fine,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 65 Harp'd to nobles when they dine,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

And when he looked that lady on,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 70 He sigh'd and made a heavy moan,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

He's ta'en three locks o' her yellow hair,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 75 And wi' them strung his harp sae rare,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

He went into her father's hall,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 And played his harp before them all,
 80 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

And sune the harp sang loud and clear,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 "Fareweel, my father and mither dear!"
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

And neist when the harp began to sing,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 85 'Twas "Fareweel, sweetheart!" said the string,
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie.

And then as plain as plain could be,
 (Binnorie, O Binnorie!)
 90 "There sits my sister wha drown'd me!"
 By the bonny mill-dams o' Binnorie."

<sup>4</sup> Neck-bone.

<sup>5</sup> Thatch.

BONNIE GEORGE CAMPBELL

(From Motherwell's Minstrelsy, 1827. Date of ballad uncertain)

Hie upon Hiellands,
And low upon Tay,
Bonnie George Campbell
Rade out on a day.
Saddled and bridled
And gallant rade he;
Hame cam his gude horse,
But never cam he!
Out cam his auld mither
Greeting fu' sair,
And out cam his bonnie bride
Rivin' her hair.
Saddled and bridled
And bootied rade he;
Toom<sup>1</sup> hame cam the saddle
But never cam he!
"My meadow lies green,
And my corn is unshorn;
My barn is to big,
And my babie's unborn."
Saddled and bridled
And bootied rade he;
Toom hame cam the saddle,
But never cam he.

THE NUT-BROWN MAID

(c. 1500)

HE. Be it right or wrong, these men among
On women do complain;
Affirming this, how that it is
A labour spent in vain
To love them wele; for never a dele 5
They love a man again:
For let a man do what he can
Their favour to attain,
Yet if a new to them pursue,
Their first true lover than 10
Laboureth for naught; for from her thought
He is a banished man.
SHE. I say not nay, but that all day
It is both written and said
That woman's faith is, as who saith, 15
All utterly decayed:
But nevertheless, right good witness
In this case might be laid
That they love true and continue:
Record the Nut-brown Maid, 20
Which, when her love came her to prove,
To her to make his moan,
Would not depart; but in her heart
She loved but him alone.
HE. Then between us let us discuss 25
What was all the manere
Between them two: we will also Tell all the pain in fere<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> In company together.

That she was in. Now I begin,
So that ye me answer:
Wherefore all ye that present be,
I pray you give an ear.
I am the Knight. I come by night,
As secret as I can,
Saying, Alas! thus standeth the case, 35
I am a banished man.

SHE. And I your will for to fulfil
In this will not refuse;
Trusting to show, in wordes few,
That men have an ill use— 40
To their own shame—women to blame,
And causeless them accuse.
Therefore to you I answer now,
All women to excuse—
Mine own heart dear, with you what cheer? 45
I pray you, tell anone;
For, in my mind, of all mankind
I love but you alone.

HE. It standeth so: a deed is do
Whereof great harm shall grow: 50
My destiny is for to die
A shameful death, I trow;
Or else to flee. The t' one must be.
None other way I know
But to withdraw as an outlaw, 55
And take me to my bow.
Wherefore adieu, mine own heart true!
None other rede<sup>3</sup> I can.<sup>3</sup>
For I must to the green-wood go,
Alone, a banished man. 60

SHE. O Lord, what is this worldis bliss,
That changeth as the moon!
My summer's day in lusty May
Is darked before the noon.
I hear you say, farewell: Nay, nay, 65
We départ not so soon.
Why say ye so? Whither will ye go?
Alas! what have ye done?
All my welfáre to sorrow and care
Should change, if ye were gone: 70
For, in my mind, of all mankind
I love but you alone.

HE. I can believe it shall you grieve,
And somewhat you distrust;
But afterward, your paines hard 75
Within a day or twain
Shall soon aslake; and ye shall take Comfort to you again.
Why should ye ought? for, to make
thought,
Your labour were in vain. 80
And thus I do; and pray you to,
As heartily as I can:
For I must to the green-wood go,
Alone, a banished man.

SHE. Now, sith that ye have showed to me 85
The secret of your mind,

<sup>2</sup> Counsel.

<sup>3</sup> Know.

I shall be plain to you again,
 Like as ye shall me find.
 Sith it is so that ye will go,
 I will not live behind. 90
 Shall never be said the Nut-brown Maid
 Was to her love unkind.
 Make you ready, for so am I,
 Although it were anone;
 For, in my mind, of all mankind 95
 I love but you alone.

HE. Yet I you rede to make good heed
 What men will think and say:
 Of young, of old, it shall be told
 That ye be gone away 100
 Your wanton will for to fulfil,
 In green-wood you to play;
 And that ye might for your delight
 No longer make delay.
 Rather than ye should thus for me 105
 Be called an ill woman
 Yet would I to the green-wood go,
 Alone, a banished man.

SHE. Though it be sung of old and young
 That I should be to blame, 110
 Theirs be the charge that speak so large
 In hurting of my name:
 For I will prove that faithful love
 It is devoid of shame:
 In your distress and heaviness 115
 To part with you the same;
 And sure all tho<sup>4</sup> that do not so
 True lovers are they none:
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone. 120

HE. I counsel you, Remember how
 It is no maiden's law
 Nothing to doubt, but to run out
 To wood with an outlaw.
 For ye must there in your hand bear 125
 A bow ready to draw;
 And as a thief thus must you live
 Ever in dread and awe;
 Whereby to you great harm might grow:
 Yet had I liefer than 130
 That I had to the green-wood go,
 Alone, a banished man.

SHE. I think not nay but as ye say;
 It is no maiden's lore;
 But love may make me for your sake, 135
 As I have said before,
 To come on foot, to hunt and shoot,
 To get us meat and store;
 For so that I your company
 May have, I ask no more. 140
 From which to part it maketh my heart
 As cold as any stone;
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone.

HE. For an outlaw this is the law, 145
 That men him take and bind:
 Without pitie, hanged to be,
 And waver with the wind.

<sup>4</sup> Those.

If I had need (as God forbede!)
 What socours could ye find? 150
 Forsooth I trow, you and your bow
 For fear would draw behind.
 And no mervail; for little avail
 Were in your counsel than:
 Wherefore I'll to the green-wood go, 155
 Alone, a banished man.

SHE. Right well know ye that women be
 But feeble for to fight;
 No womanhede it is, indeed,
 To be bold as a knight; 160
 Yet in such fear if that ye were
 With enemies day and night,
 I would withstand, with bow in hand,
 To grieve them as I might,
 And you to save; as women have 165
 From death men many one:
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone.

HE. Yet take good hede; for ever I drede
 That ye could not sustain 170
 The thorny ways, the deep valléys,
 The snow, the frost, the rain,
 The cold, the heat; for dry or wete,
 We must lodge on the plain;
 And, us above, no other roof 175
 But a brake bush or twain:
 Which soon should grieve you, I believe;
 And ye would gladly than
 That I had to the green-wood go,
 Alone, a banished man. 180

SHE. Sith I have here been partynere
 With you of joy and bliss,
 I must also part of your woe
 Endure, as reason is:
 Yet I am sure of one pleasúre, 185
 And shortly it is this—
 That where ye be, me seemeth, pardé,
 I could not fare amiss.
 Without more speech I you beseech
 That we were shortly gone; 190
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone.

HE. If ye go thyder, <sup>5</sup> ye must consider,
 When ye have lust to dine,
 There shall no meat be for to gete, 195
 Neither beer, ale, nor wine,
 No sheetes clean, to lie between,
 Made of thread and twine;
 None other house, but leaves and boughs
 To cover your head and mine. 200
 Lo, mine heart sweet, this ill diéte
 Should make you pale and wan:
 Wherefore I'll to the green-wood go,
 Alone, a banished man.

SHE. Among the wild deer such an archére 205
 As men say that ye be,
 Ne may not fail of such vitayle
 Where is so great plenté:

<sup>5</sup> Thither.

- And water clear of the rivere
 Shall be full sweet to me; 210
 With which in hele<sup>6</sup> I shall right wele
 Endure, as ye shall see;
 And, or we go, a bed or two
 I can provide anone;
 For, in my mind, of all mankind 215
 I love but you alone.
- HE. Lo yet, before, ye must do more,
 If ye will go with me:
 As, cut your hair up by your ear,
 Your kirtle by the knee; 220
 With bow in hand for to withstand
 Your enemies, if need be:
 And this same night, before daylight,
 To woodward will I flee.
 If that ye will all this fulfil, 225
 Do it shortly as ye can:
 Else will I to the green-wood go,
 Alone, a banished man.
- SHE. I shall as now do more for you
 Than 'longeth to womanhede; 230
 To short my hair, a bow to bear,
 To shoot in time of need.
 O my sweet mother! before all other
 For you I have most drede!
 But now, adieu! I must ensue 235
 Where fortune doth me lead.
 All this make ye: Now let us flee;
 The day cometh fast upon:
 For, in my mind, of all mankind 240
 I love but you alone.
- HE. Nay, nay, not so; ye shall not go,
 And I shall tell you why—
 Your appetite is to be light
 Of love, I well espy:
 For, right as ye have said to me, 245
 In likewise hardily
 Ye would answer whosoever it were,
 In way of company:
 It is said of old, Soon hot, soon cold;
 And so is a woman: 250
 Wherefore I to the wood will go,
 Alone, a banished man.
- SHE. If ye take heed, it is no need
 Such words to say to me; 254
 For oft ye prayed, and long assayed,
 Or I loved you, pardé:
 And though that I of ancestry
 A baron's daughter be,
 Yet have you proved how I you loved,
 A squire of low degree; 260
 And ever shall, whatso befall,
 To die therefore anone;
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone.
- HE. A baron's child to be beguiled,
 It were a curséd deed!
 To be feláw with an outlaw—
 Almighty God forbede!
- Yet better were the poor squyere
 Alone to forest yede<sup>7</sup> 270
 Than ye shall say another day
 That by my curséd rede
 Ye were betrayed. Wherefore, good maid,
 The best rede that I can,
 Is, that I to the green-wood go, 275
 Alone, a banished man.
- SHE. Whatever befall, I never shall
 Of this thing be upbraid:
 But if ye go, and leave me so,
 Then have ye me betrayed. 280
 Remember you wele, how that ye dele;
 For if ye, as ye said,
 Be so unkind to leave behind
 Your love, the Nut-brown Maid,
 Trust me truly that I shall die 285
 Soon after ye be gone:
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone.
- HE. If that ye went, ye should repent;
 For in the forest now 290
 I have purveyed me of a maid
 Whom I love more than you:
 Another more fair than ever ye were
 I dare it well avow; 294
 And of you both each would be wroth
 With other, as I trow:
 It were mine ease to live in peace;
 So will I, if I can:
 Wherefore I to the wood will go, 300
 Alone, a banished man.
- SHE. Though in the wood I understood
 Ye had a paramour,
 All this may nought remove my thought,
 But that I will be your':
 And she shall find me soft and kind 305
 And courteous every hour;
 Glad to fulfil all that she will Command me, to my power:
 For had ye, lo, an hundred mo,
 Yet would I be that one: 310
 For, in my mind, of all mankind
 I love but you alone.
- HE. Mine own dear love, I see the prove<sup>8</sup>
 That ye be kind and true;
 Of maid, of wife, in all my life 315
 The best that ever I knew;
 Be merry and glad; be no more sad;
 The case is changéd new;
 For it were ruth that for your truth
 Ye should have cause to rue. 320
 Be not dismayed, whatsoever I said
 To you when I began:
 I will not to the green-wood go;
 I am no banished man.
- SHE. These tidings be more glad to me 325
 Than to be made a queen,
 If I were sure they should endure;
 But it is often seen

<sup>6</sup> Health.<sup>7</sup> Went.<sup>8</sup> Proof

When men will break promise they speak
 The wordis on the splene. 330
 Ye shape some wile me to beguile,
     And steal from me, I ween:
 Then were the case worse than it was,
     And I more woe-begone:
 For, in my mind, of all mankind 335
     I love but you alone.

He. Ye shall not need further to drede:
     I will not disparage
 You (God defend), sith you descend 340
     Of so great a linage.
 Now understand: to Westmoreland,
     Which is my heritage,
 I will you bring; and with a ring,
     By way of marriage
 I will you take, and lady make, 345
     As shortly as I can:
 Thus have you won an Earlês son,
     And not a banished man.

Here may ye see that women be
     In love meek, kind, and stable; 350
 Let never man reprove them than,
     Or call them variable;
 But rather pray God that we may
     To them be comfortable;
 Which sometime proveth such as He 355
     loveth,
     If they be charitable.
 For sith men would that women should
     Be meek to them each one;
 Much more ought they to God obey,
     And serve but Him alone. 360

HELEN OF KIRCONNELL

PART SECOND

(From Scott's Border Minstrelsy, 1802-3)

I wish I were where Helen lies!
 Night and day on me she cries;
 O that I were where Helen lies,
     On fair Kirconnell Lee!
 Curst be the heart that thought the thought, 5
 And curst the hand that fired the shot,
 When in my arms burd Helen<sup>1</sup> dropt,
     And died to succour me!
 O think na ye my heart was sair,
 When my love dropt down and spak nae mair!
 There did she swoon wi' mickle care 11
     On fair Kirconnell Lee.
 As I went down the water-side,
 None but my foe to be my guide,
 None but my foe to be my guide, 15
     On fair Kirconnell Lee!

I lighted down, my sword did draw,
 I hackèd him in pieces sma',
 I hackèd him in pieces sma',
     For her sake that died for me. 20

<sup>1</sup>Maid Helen.

O, Helen fair, beyond compare!
 I'll make a garland of thy hair,
 Shall bind my heart for evermair,
     Until the day I die.

O that I were where Helen lies! 25
 Night and day on me she cries;
 Out of my bed she bids me rise,
     Says, "Haste, and come to me!"

O Helen fair! O Helen chaste!
 If I were with thee, I were blest, 30
 Where thou lies low, and takes thy rest,
     On fair Kirconnell Lee.

I wish my grave were growing green,
 A winding-sheet drawn ower my een, 35
 And I in Helen's arms lying,
     On fair Kirconnell Lee.

I wish I were where Helen lies!
 Night and day on me she cries;
 And I am weary of the skies, 40
     For her sake that died for me.

POEMS, SONGS AND CAROLS OF THE EARLY TUDOR PERIOD

A LYKE-WAKE DIRGE<sup>1</sup>

This ae night, this ae night.
Every night and alle,
 Fire, and sleet,<sup>2</sup> and candle-light,
And Christ receive thy saule.

When thou from hence away art past, 5
Every night and alle,
 To Whinny-muir<sup>3</sup> thou comest at last,
And Christ receive thy saule.

If ever thou gavest hosen and shoon, 10
Every night and alle,
 Sit thee down and put them on,
And Christ receive thy saule.

If hosen and shoon thou gavest nane,
Every night and alle,
 The Whinnes shall prick thee to the bare bane,
And Christ receive thy saule. 16

From Whinny-muir when thou mayst pass,
Every night and alle,
 To Brigg o' Dread thou comest at last,
And Christ receive thy saule. . . . 20

<sup>1</sup> A lyke-wake is the watch or vigil over a corpse. (O. E. lic, a dead body). The dirge here given is said to have been sung at funerals in Yorkshire "down to 1624."

<sup>3</sup> The whin is a furze or gorse, the moor-whin grows on bleak heaths, and has sharp spines or needles. "Whinny-muir" therefore suggests a great plain full of prickles, and most painful to traverse.

From Brigg o' Dread<sup>4</sup> when thou mayst pass,
Every night and alle,
 To Purgatory Fire thou comest at last,
And Christ receive thy saule.

If ever thou gavest meat or drink, 25
Every night and alle,
 The fire shall never make thee shrink,
And Christ receive thy saule.

If meat or drink thou gavest nane,
Every night and alle,
 The fire will burn thee to the bare bane,
And Christ receive thy saule.

This ae night, this ae night,
Every night and alle,
 Fire, and sleet, and candle-light,
And Christ receive thy saule.

CAROL

*Make we merry in hall and bour.
 This time was born our Saviour.*

In this timè God hath sent
 His own Son, to be présent,
 To dwell with us in verament,
God that is our Saviour.

In this time that is befall,
 A child was born in an ox stall,
 And after, He dièd for us all,
God that is our Saviour.

In this time an angel bright
 Met three shepherds on a night,
 He bade them go full quickly, right
God that is our Saviour.

In this timè now pray we 15
 To Him that dièd for us on tree,
 Upon us all to have pitee,
God that is our Saviour.

THE JOLLY SHEPHERD

*Can I not sing but hoy,
 When the jolly shepherd made so much joy?*

The shepherd upon a hill he sat,
 He had on him his tabard<sup>1</sup> and hat,
 His tar-box, his pipe, and his flagat;<sup>2</sup>
 His name was called jolly, jolly Wat;
 For he was a good herdès boy,
 Ut hoy!
 For in his pipe he made so much joy,
 Can I not sing but hoy 10
 When the jolly shepherd made so much joy?

<sup>4</sup> Bridge of Dread, a bar, or bridge of red-hot iron over which, according to the Mahometan belief, the dead must pass to judgment. The feet of the true believer will be protected by his good works, when he comes to cross this bridge, but the wicked, without this protection, must fall into a bottomless abyss below.

<sup>2</sup> Bottle.

The shepherd upon a hill was laid,
 Unto his girdle his dog was tayed;<sup>3</sup>
 He had not slept but a little brayd,<sup>4</sup>
 But "Gloria in excelsis" was to him said. 15
 Ut hoy!

For in his pipe he made so much joy.
 Can I not sing but hoy,
 When the jolly shepherd made so much joy?

The shepherd on a hill he stode, 20
 Round about him his sheep they yode;<sup>5</sup>
 He put his hand under his hode,<sup>6</sup>
 He saw a star as red as blode:
 Ut hoy!

For in his pipe he made so much joy, 25
 Can I not sing but hoy,
 When the jolly shepherd made so much joy?

"Now farewell Mall, and also Will,
 For my love go ye all still
 Unto I come again you till, 30
 And evermore, Will, ring thy bell."
 Ut hoy!

For in his pipe he made so much joy,
 Can I not sing but hoy,
 When the jolly shepherd made so much joy?

"Now must I go where Christ was born; 36
 Farewell, I come again at morn.
 Dog, keep my sheep well fro the corn,
 And warn well, Warrock, when I blow my horn."

Ut hoy! 40
 For in his pipe he made so much joy.
 Can I not sing but hoy,
 When the jolly shepherd made so much joy?

THE HUNT IS UP<sup>1</sup>

(In the Time of Henry VIII)

The hunt is up, the hunt is up, 15
 And it is well nigh day:
 And Harry our King, is gone hunting,
 To bring his deer to bay.

The east is bright with morning light, 5
 And darkness it is fled,
 And the merry horn wakes up the morn
 To leave his idle bed. . . .

The horses snort to be at the sport,
 The dogs are running free, 10
 The woods rejoice at the merry noise
 Of hey tantara tee ree!

The sun is glad to see us clad
 All in our lusty green,
 And smiles in the sky as he riseth high, 15
 To see and to be seen.

<sup>1</sup> This opening "The Hunt is Up," appears to have been so common in old songs, that the tune or song played to arouse hunters in the morning was called a hunts-up, and this expression was afterwards extended to include "any song intended to arouse in the morning."

Awake, all men, I say again,
 Be merry as you may,
 For Harry our King is gone hunting,
 To bring his deer to bay. 20

MY HEART IS HIGH ABOVE

(16th Century)

My heart is high above, my body is full of bliss,
 For I am set in luv as well as I would wiss;
 I luv my lady pure and she luv me again,
 I am her serviture, she is my soverane;
 She is my very heart, I am her hope and heill, 5
 She is my joy inwârd, I am her luvlar leal;
 I am her bond and thrall; she is at my command;

I am perpetual her man, both foot and hand;
 The thing that may her please my body shall fulfil;

Whatever her disease, it does my body ill. 10
 My bird, my bonny ane, my tender babe venust,<sup>1</sup>

My luv, my life alane, my liking and my lust! . . .

Lovers in pain, I pray God send you sic remeid
 As I have nict and day, you to defend from deid.

Therefore be ever true unto your ladies free, 15
 And they will on you rue as mine has done on me.

DEATH<sup>1</sup>

O Death, rock me to sleep,
 Bring me to quiet rest,
 Let pass my weary guiltless ghost
 Out of my careful breast. 5
 Toll on the passing bell;
 Ring out my doleful knell;
 Thy sound my death abroad will tell,
 For I must die,
 There is no remedy.

My pains who can express? 10
 Alas, they are so strong;
 My dolours will not suffer strength
 My life for to prolong.
 Toll on the passing bell;
 Ring out my doleful knell; 15
 Thy sound my death abroad will tell,
 For I must die,
 There is no remedy.

Alone in prison strong
 I wail my destiny. 20
 Woe worth this cruel hap that I
 Must taste this misery.
 Toll on the passing bell;
 Ring out my doleful knell;
 Thy sound my death abroad will tell, 25
 For I must die,
 There is no remedy.

Delightful.

<sup>1</sup> This poem is supposed to date from "about the time of Henry VIII." It has been suggested that "the verses were written either by or in the person of Anne Boleyn"—but this—while possible—is a pure conjecture.

Farewell, my pleasures past,
 Welcome my present pain.
 I feel my torment so increase 30
 That life cannot remain.
 Toll on the passing bell;
 Ring out my doleful knell;
 Thy sound my death abroad will tell,
 For I must die, 35
 There is no remedy.

Cease now the passing bell;
 Ring out my doleful knell,
 For thou my death dost tell;
 Lord pity thou my soul. 40
 Death doth draw nigh.
 Sound dolefully;
 For now I die,
 I die, I die.

GOD'S CARE FOR MAN

Pleasure it is
 To hear, iwis,<sup>2</sup>
 The birdes sing.
 The deer in the dale, 5
 The sheep in the vale,
 The corn springing;
 God's purveyance
 For sustenance
 It is for man. 10
 Then we always
 To Him give praise,
 And thank Him than,<sup>3</sup>
 And thank Him than.

A DIRGE FOR PHILIP SPARROW<sup>1</sup>

Pla ce bo,
 Who is there, who?
Di le xi,
 Dame Marjery;
Fa re my my, 5
 Wherefore and why, why?

<sup>1</sup> Cornish or Cornyshe, was a Court musician in the reigns of Henry VII and Henry VIII. He was connected with the court as early as 1493, and in 1509 he was made Master of the children of the Chapel Royal.

<sup>1</sup> This is an Elegy addressed to Jane Scroupe, a pupil of the Black nuns at Carrow near Norwich, on the death of her pet sparrow. Dirge is a name given to the church service for the repose of the dead, and the poem is not merely an elegy but a lament in which the solemn words of the Church's requiem for the departed are heard at intervals, and the echoes of distant chants mingle with little Jane Scroupe's childish distress. Thus Placebo, l. 1, is the initial word of the opening Antiphon (Placebo Domino in regione vivorum). Dilexi, l. 3, is the first word of the Psalm which follows the placebo (Dilexi quoniam exaudivit Dominus vocem orationis meam) and Ad Dominum, (l. 66) is the opening of the second antiphon Ad Dominum, cum tribularer clamavi.

For the soul of Philip Sparrow
That was late slain at Carow,
Among the nunnés blake,<sup>2</sup>
For that sweet soul's sake, 10
And for all sparrows' souls
Set in our bead roules,
Pater noster qui
With an Ave Maria,
And with the corner of a creed 15
The more shall be your meed.

When I remember again
How my Philip was slain,
Never half the pain
Was between you twain, 20
Pyramus and Thisbe,
As then befell to me;
I wept and I wailed,
The tears down hailed,
But nothing it availed 25
To call Philip again
Whom Gib our cat hath slain.

Gib, I say, our cat,
Worowed<sup>3</sup> her on that
Which I lovéd best; 30
It cannot be expressed,
My sorrowful heaviness,
But all without redress;
For within that stound,<sup>4</sup>
Half slumbering in a swoonde,<sup>5</sup> 35
I fell down to the ground.

Scarcely I cast mine eyes
Toward the cloudy skies,
But when I did behold
My Sparrow dead and cold, 40
No creature but that wold<sup>6</sup>
Have pitied upon me
To behold and see
What heaviness did me pange<sup>7</sup>
Wherewith my hands I wrange, 45
That my sinews cracked
As though I had been racked,
So pained and so strained,
That no life well remained.

I sighéd, and I sobbed, 50
For that I was robbed
Of my Sparrow's life;
O maiden, widow, and wife,
Of what estate ye be
Of high or low degree, 55
Great sorrow then ye might see,
And learn to weep at me;
Such pains did me freat<sup>8</sup>
That mine heart did beat,
My visage pale and dead, 60
Wan, and blue as lead,
The pangs of hateful death
Well-nigh stopped my breath
Heu, heu, me,

That I am woe for thee! 60
Ad dominum cum tribularer clamavi,
Of God nothing else crave I. . . .

From COLIN CLOUT<sup>1</sup>

And if ye stand in doubt
Who brought this rime about:
My name is Colin Clout.
I purpose to shake out
All my cunning bag, 5
Like a clerky hag;
For though my rime be ragged,
Tattered and jagged,
Rudely rain beaten, 10
Rusty and moth eaten,
If ye talk well therewith
It hath in it some pith.
For as far as I can see,
It is wrong with each degree;
For the temporality 15
Accuseth the spirituality;
The spiritual again
Doth grudge and complain
Upon tempóral men; 20
Thus each of other blother,<sup>2</sup>
The one against the other:
Alas they make me shudder!
For in hugger mugger
The church is put at fault;
The prelates be so haut<sup>3</sup> 25
They say, and look so high,
As though they would fly
Above the starry sky.

Laymen say indeed
How they take no heed 30
Their silly sheep to feed,
But pluck away and pull
The fleeces of their wool;
Unnethes<sup>4</sup> they leave a lock
Of wool among their flock. 35
And as for their cunning
A glumming and a mumming,
And make thereof a jape,<sup>5</sup>
They gaspé and they gape 40
All to have promotion;
There is their whole devotion,
With money, if it will hap<sup>6</sup>
To catch the forked cap,
Forsooth they are too lewd<sup>7</sup> 45
To say so all be shrewd.

<sup>1</sup> In this poem Skelton voices the popular discontent, blames the clergy for the wrongs which the people suffer, and attacks Cardinal Wolsey. The arraignment is put into the mouth of one Colin Clout. Colin suggests a shepherd, or countrvman: Clout may mean ragged or patched, hence we may assume that Colin Clout (the patched rustic or shepherd) was intended to stand for the humbler, or lower classes.

THE ROYAL POWER IN FRANCE AND ENGLAND

(From The Difference Between an Absolute and a Limited Monarchy, 1450?)

There be two kinds of Kingdoms, of the 10 which that one is a Lordship, called in Latin, Dominium Regale, and that other is called, Dominium Politicum et Regale. And they differ, in that the first may rule his people by such laws as he maketh himself; and therefore 15 he may set upon them Talys,<sup>1</sup> and other impositions, such as he will himself, without their assent. The second may not rule his people, by other laws than such as they assent unto; and therefore he may set upon them no 20 Impositions without their own assent.

[After treating of the origin and nature of royal power, and considering why one King rules as an absolute and another as a limited monarch, 25 the author passes on to consider the effects of absolute monarchy ("The fruits of Jus Regale") in France.]

And howso be it, that the French King reigneth upon his people Dominio Regali: yet St. Lewis<sup>2</sup> 30 sometime King there, nor any of his progenitors set never Talys or other Impositions, upon the people of that land, without the assent of the three Estates, which when they be assembled are like to the Court of Parlement in England. 35 And this order kept many of his successors until late days, that Englishmen made such a war in France, that the three Estates durst not come together. And then for that cause and for great necessity which the French king had of goods, for the defence of that land, he took upon him to set Talys and other Impositions upon the Commons, without the assent of the three Estates; but yet he would not set any such charges, nor hath set, upon the nobles, 45 for fear of rebellion. And because the Commons, though they have grudged, have not rebelled or be hardy to rebel, the French Kings have yearly since set such charges upon them, and so augmented the same charges, as the 50 same Commons be so impoverished and destroyed, that they may scarcely live. They drink water, they eat apples, with bread right brown made of rye. They eat no flesh, but if<sup>3</sup> it be seldom, a little lard, or of the entrails, or 55 heads of beasts slain for the nobles and merchants of the land. They wear no woollen, but if it be a poor coat under their outermost garment, made of great<sup>4</sup> canvas, and call it a frock. Their hose be of like canvas, and pass not their knee; wherefore they be gartered and 5 their thighs bare. Their wives and children go barefoot; they may in no otherwise live. For some of them, that was wont to pay to his lord for his tenement, which he hireth by the year, a scute,<sup>5</sup> payeth now to the King, over that scute, five scutes. Through which they be forced by necessity, so to watch, labor, and grub in the ground, for their sustenance, that their nature is much wasted, and the kind<sup>6</sup> of them brought to naught. They are gone 10 crooked, and are feeble, not able to fight, nor to defend the realm; nor have they weapons, nor money to buy them weapons withal; but verily they live in the most extreme poverty and misery, and yet they dwell in one of the 15 most fertile realms of the world; wherefore the French King hath not men of his own realm to defend it, except his nobles, which bear no such Impositions; and therefore they are right likely of their bodies, by which cause the said King is compelled to make his armies, and 20 retinue for the defence of the land, of strangers, as Scots, Spaniards, Arragonars, men of Almaine, and of other nations, or else his enemies might over-run him. For he hath no defense of his own, except his castles and fortresses. Lo, this is the fruit of his Jus Regale. If the realm of England, which is an isle, and therefore may not lightly get succours from other lands, were ruled under such a law, 25 and under such a Prince, it would be then a prey to all other nations that would conquer, rob, and devour it; which was well proved in the time of the Britons, when the Scots and the Picts so beat and oppressed this land, that the 30 people thereof sought help of the Romans, to whom they had been tributary.

But blessed be God, this land is ruled under a better law, and therefore the people thereof be 35 not in such penury, nor thereby hurt in their persons, but they be wealthy and have all things necessary to the sustenance of nature. Wherefore they be mighty, and able to resist the adversaries of the realm, and to beat other 40 realms, that do or will do them wrong. Lo, this is the fruit of the Jus Politicum et Regale under which we live. Somewhat now I have showed you of the fruits of both laws, Ut ex fructibus eorum cognoscatis eos.<sup>7</sup>

THE DRAWING OF THE SWORD

(From the Morte d'Arthur, c. 1470)

So on the morn all the barons with Merlin came before the king; then Merlin said aloud unto king Uther, Sire, shall your son Arthur be king after your days, of this realm with all the appurance? Then Uther Pendragon turned him and said in hearing of them all, I give him God's blessing and mine, and bid him pray for my soul, and righteously and worshipfully that he claim the crown upon forfeiture of my blessing, and therewith he yielded up the ghost, and then was he interred as longed<sup>1</sup> to a king. Wherefore the queen, fair Igraine, made great sorrow, and all the barons.

Then stood the realm in great jeopardy long while, for every lord that was mighty of men made him strong, and many weened to have been king. Then Merlin went to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and counselled him for to send for all the lords of the realm, and all the gentlemen of arms, that they should to London come by Christmas, upon pain of cursing; and for this cause, that Jesus, that was born on that night, that He would of His great mercy show some miracle, as He was come to be king of mankind, for to show some miracle who should be right-wise king of this realm. So the Archbishop, by the advice of Merlin, sent for all the lords and gentlemen of arms that they should come by Christmas even unto London. And many of them made them clean of their life, that their prayer might be the more acceptable unto God. So in the greatest church of London, whether it were Paul's or not, the French book maketh no mention, all the estates were long ere day in the church for to pray. And when matins and the first mass was done, there was seen in the churchyard, against the high altar, a great stone four square, like unto a marble stone, and in midst thereof was like an anvil of steel a foot on high, and therein stuck a fair sword naked by the point, and letters there were written in gold about the sword that said thus:—Whoso pulleth out this sword of this stone and anvil, is rightful king born of all England. Then the people marvelled, and told it to the Archbishop. I command, said the Archbishop, that ye keep you within your church, and pray unto God still; that no man touch the sword till the high mass be all done. So when all masses were done all the lords went to behold the stone and the sword. And when they saw the scripture, some assayed, such as would have been king. But none might stir the sword nor move it. He is not here, said the Archbishop, that shall achieve the sword, but doubt not God will make him known. But this is my counsel, said the Archbishop, that we let purvey<sup>2</sup> ten knights, men of good fame, and they to keep this sword. So it was ordained, and then there was made a cry, that every man should assay that would, for to win the sword. And upon New Year's Day the barons let make a joust and a tournament, that all knights that would joust or tourney there might play, and all this was ordained for to keep the lords together, and the commons, for the Archbishop trusted that God would make him known that should win the sword. So upon New Year's Day, when the service was done, the barons rode unto the field, some to joust and some to tourney, and so it happened that Sir Ector, that had great livelihood about London, rode unto the jousts, and with him rode Sir Kay his son, and young Arthur that was his nourished brother;<sup>3</sup> and Sir Kay was made knight at All Hallowmass afore. So as they rode to the jousts-ward, Sir Kay lost his sword, for he had left it at his father's lodging, and so he prayed young Arthur for to ride for his sword. I will well, said Arthur, and rode fast after the sword, and when he came home, the lady and all were out to see the jousting. Then was Arthur wroth, and said to himself, I will ride to the churchyard, and take the sword with me that sticketh in the stone, for my brother Sir Kay shall not be without a sword this day. So when he came to the churchyard, Sir Arthur alit and tied his horse to the stile, and so he went to the tent, and found no knights there, for they were at jousting; and so he handled the sword by the handles, and lightly and fiercely pulled it out of the stone, and took his horse and rode his way until he came to his brother Sir Kay, and delivered him the sword. And as soon as Sir Kay saw the sword, he wist well it was the sword of the stone, and so he rode to his father Sir Ector, and said: Sir, lo here is the sword of the stone, wherefore I must be king of this land. When Sir Ector beheld the sword, he returned again and came to the church, and there they alit all three, and went into the church. And anon he made Sir Kay swear upon a book how he came to that sword. Sir, said Sir Kay, by my brother Arthur, for he brought it to me. How gat ye this sword? said Sir Ector to Arthur. Sir, I will tell you. When I came home for my brother's sword, I found nobody at home to deliver me his sword, and so I thought my brother Sir Kay should not be swordless, and so I came hither eagerly and pulled it out of the stone without any pain. Found ye any knights about this sword, said Sir Ector. Nay, said Arthur. Now, said Sir Ector to Arthur, I understand ye must be king of this land. Wherefore I, said Arthur, and for what cause? Sir, said Ector, for God will have it so, for there should never man have drawn out this sword, but he shall be rightwise king of this land. Now let me see whether ye can put the sword there as it was, and pull it out again. That is no mastery, said Arthur, and so he put it in the stone. Wherewith Sir Ector assayed to pull out the sword and failed.

Now assay, said Sir Ector unto Sir Kay. And anon he pulled at the sword with all his might, but it would not be. Now shall ye assay, said Sir Ector to Arthur. I will well, said Arthur, and pulled it out easily. And therewithal Sir Ector knelt down to the earth, and Sir Kay.

ARTHUR'S ENCOUNTER WITH PELLINORE

And so Arthur rode a soft pace till it was day, and then was he aware of three churls chasing Merlin, and would have slain him. Then the king rode unto them, and bade them: Flee, churls! then were they afeared when they saw a knight, and fled. O Merlin, said Arthur, here hadst thou been slain for all thy crafts had I not been. Nay, said Merlin, not so, for I could save myself an I would; and thou art more near thy death than I am, for thou goest to the deathward, an God be not thy friend. So as they went thus talking they came to the fountain, and the rich pavilion there by it. Then King Arthur was ware where sat a knight armed in a chair. Sir knight, said Arthur, for what cause abidest thou here, that there may no knight ride this way but if he joust with thee? said the king. I rede thee leave that custom, said Arthur. This custom, said the knight, have I used and will use maugre who saith nay, and who is grieved with my custom let him amend it that will. I will amend it, said Arthur. I shall defend<sup>1</sup> thee, said the knight. Anon he took his horse and dressed his shield and took a spear, and they met so hard either in other's shields, that all to-shivered<sup>2</sup> their spears. Therewith anon Arthur pulled out his sword. Nay, not so, said the knight; it is fairer, said the knight, that we twain run more together with sharp spears. I will well, said Arthur, an I had any more spears. I have enow, said the knight; so there came a squire and brought in good spears, and Arthur chose one and he another; so they spurred their horses and came together with all their mights, that either brake their spears to their hands. Then Arthur set hand on his sword. Nay, said the knight, ye shall do better; ye are a passing good jouter as ever I met withal; and once for the love of the high order of knighthood let us joust once again. I assent me, said Arthur. Anon there were brought two great spears, and every knight gat a spear, and therewith they ran together, that Arthur's spear all to-shivered. But the other knight hit him so hard in midst of the shield, that horse and man fell to the earth, and therewithal Arthur was eager, and pulled out his sword, and said, I will assay thee, sir knight, on foot, for I have lost the honour on horseback. I will be on horseback, said the knight. Then was Arthur wroth, and dressed his shield toward him with his sword drawn. When the knight saw that, he alit, for him thought no worship to have a knight at such avail,<sup>3</sup> he to be on horseback and he on foot; and so he alit and dressed his shield unto Arthur. And there began a strong battle with many great strokes, and so hewed with their swords that the cantels<sup>4</sup> flew in the fields, and much blood they bled both, that all the place there as they fought was overbled with blood. And thus they fought long and rested them, and then they went to the battle again, and so hurtled together like two rams that either fell to the earth. So at the last they smote together that both their swords met even together. But the sword of the knight smote King Arthur's sword in two pieces, wherefor he was heavy. Then said the knight unto Arthur, Thou art in my danger whether me list to save thee or slay thee, and but thou yield thee as overcome and recreant, thou shalt die. As for death, said King Arthur, welcome be it when it cometh. But to yield me unto thee as recreant I had liefer die than to be so shamed. And therewithal the king leapt unto Pellinore, and took him by the middle and threw him down, and rased off his helm.<sup>5</sup> When the knight felt that, he was adread, for he was passing big man of might, and anon he brought Arthur under him, and rased off his helm and would have smitten off his head.

Therewithal came Merlin and said, Knight, hold thy hand, for an thou slay that knight thou putttest this realm in the greatest damage that ever was realm; for this knight is a man of more worship than thou wotest of. Why, who is he? said the knight. It is King Arthur.

Then would he have slain him<sup>6</sup> for dread of his wrath, and heaved up his sword, and therewith Merlin cast an enchantment to the knight, that he fell to the earth in a great sleep. Then Merlin took up King Arthur, and rode forth on the Knight's horse. Alas! said Arthur, what hast thou done, Merlin? hast thou slain this good knight by thy crafts? There liveth not so worshipful a knight as he was; I had liefer than the stint<sup>7</sup> of my land a year that he were alive. Care ye not, said Merlin, for he is wholler than ye; for he is but asleep, and will awake within three hours. I told you, said Merlin, what a knight he was; here had ye been slain had I not been. Also there liveth not a bigger knight than he is one, and he shall hereafter do you right good service; and his name is Pellinore.

HOW ARTHUR GOT THE SWORD FROM THE LADY OF THE LAKE

Right so the king and he departed, and went unto an hermit that was a good man and a great leech. So the hermit searched all his wounds and gave him good salves; so the king was there three days, and then were his wounds well amended that he might ride and go, and so departed. And as they rode, Arthur said, I have no sword. No force,<sup>1</sup> said Merlin, hereby is a sword that shall be yours, an I may. So they rode till they came to a lake, the which was a fair water and broad. And in the midst of the lake Arthur was ware of an arm clothed in white samite,<sup>2</sup> that held a fair sword in that hand. Lo! said Merlin, yonder is that sword that I spake of. With that they saw a damosel going upon the lake. What damosel is that? said Arthur. That is the Lady of the lake, said Merlin; and within that lake is a rock, and therein is as fair a place as any on earth, and richly besene;<sup>3</sup> and this damosel will come to you anon, and then speak ye fair to her that she will give you that sword. Anon withal came the damosel unto Arthur, and saluted him, and he her again. Damosel, said Arthur, what sword is that, that yonder the arm holdeth above the water? I would it were mine, for I have no sword. Sir Arthur, king, said the damosel, that sword is mine, and if ye will give me a gift when I ask it you, ye shall have it. By my faith, said Arthur, I will give you what gift ye will ask. Well! said the damosel, go ye into yonder barge, and row yourself to the sword, and take it and the scabbard with you, and I will ask my gift when I see my time. So Sir Arthur and Merlin alit and tied their horses to two trees, and so they went into the ship, and when they came to the sword that the hand held, Sir Arthur took it up by the handles, and took it with him, and the arm and the hand went under the water. And so they came unto the land and rode forth, and then Sir Arthur saw a rich pavilion. What signifieth yonder pavilion? That is the knight's pavilion, said Merlin, that ye fought with last, Sir Pellinore; but he is out, he is not there. He hath ado with a knight of yours that hight Egglame, and they have foughten together, but at the last Egglame fled, and else he had been dead, and he hath chased him even to Carleon, and we shall meet with him anon in the highway. That is well said, said Arthur, now have I a sword, now will I wage battle with him, and be avenged on him. Sir, ye shall not so, said Merlin, for the knight is weary of fighting and chasing, so that ye shall have no worship to have ado with him; also he will not be lightly matched of one knight living, and therefore it is my counsel, let him pass, for he shall do you good service in short time, and his sons after his days. Also ye shall see that day in short space, ye shall be right glad to give him your sister to wed. When I see him, I will do as ye advise, said Arthur. Then Sir Arthur looked on the sword, and liked it passing well. Whether liketh you better, said Merlin, the sword or the scabbard? Me liketh better the sword, said Arthur. Ye are more unwise, said Merlin, for the scabbard is worth ten of the swords, for whiles ye have the scabbard upon you, ye shall never lose no blood, be ye never so sore wounded; therefore keep well the scabbard always with you. So they rode unto Carleon, and by the way they met with Sir Pellinore; but Merlin had done such a craft, that Pellinore saw not Arthur, and he passed by without any words. I marvel, said Arthur, that the knight would not speak. Sir, said Merlin, he saw you not, for an he had seen you, ye had not lightly departed. So they came unto Carleon, whereof his knights were passing glad. And when they heard of his adventures, they marvelled that he would jeopard his person so alone. But all men of worship said it was merry to be under such a chieftan, that would put his person in adventure as other poor knights did.

SIR LAUNCELOT DEPARTS OUT OF ENGLAND

My fair fellows, said Sir Launcelot, I must depart out of this most noble realm, and now I shall depart it grieveth me sore, for I shall depart with no worship, for a flemyd<sup>1</sup> man

departed never out of a realm with no worship; and that is my heaviness, for ever I fear after my days that men shall chronicle upon me that I was flemyd out of this land; and else my fair lords be ye sure, an I had not dread shame, my lady Queen Guenever and I should never have departed. Then spake many noble knights, as Sir Palomides, Sir Safere his brother, and Sir Bellangere le Beuse, and Sir Urre, with Sir Lavaine, with many others, Sir, an ye be so disposed to abide in this land, we will never fail you; and if ye list not to abide in this land there is none of the good knights that here be will fail you, for many causes. One is, All we that be not of your blood shall never be welcome to the court. And sithen<sup>2</sup> it liked us to take a part with you in your distress and heaviness in this realm, wit you well it shall like us as well to go in other countries with you, and there to take such part as ye do. My fair lords, said Sir Launcelot, I well understand you and as I can, thank you: and ye shall understand, such livelihood as I am born unto I shall depart with you in this manner of wise, that is for to say; I shall depart all my livelihood and all my lands freely among you, and I myself will have as little as any of you, for have I sufficient that may long to my person, I will ask none other rich array; and I trust to God to maintain you on my lands as well as ever were maintained any knights. Then spake all the knights at once, He have shame that will leave you; for we all understand, in this realm will be now no quiet, but ever strife and debate; now the fellowship of the Round Table is broken; for by the noble fellowship of the Round Table was King Arthur upborne, and by their noblesse the King and all his realm was in quiet and rest, and a great part they said all was by cause of your noblesse.

KING ARTHUR MAKES MORDRED CHIEF RULER

So leave we Sir Launcelot in his lands, and his noble knights with him, and return we again unto King Arthur and to Sir Gawaine, that made a great host ready, to the number of threescore thousand; and all thing was made ready for their shipping to pass over the sea, and so they shipped at Cardiff. And there King Arthur made Sir Mordred chief ruler of all England, and also he put Queen Guenever under his governance; by cause Sir Mordred was King Arthur's son, he gave him the rule of his land and of his wife; and so the king passed the sea and landed upon Sir Launcelot's lands, and there he brent and wasted, through the vengenance of Sir Gawaine, all that they might overrun.

TIDINGS MAKE ARTHUR RETURN TO ENGLAND

Alas, said the King, that ever this unhappy war was begun; for ever Sir Launcelot forbearth me in all places, and in likewise my kin, and that is seen well this day by my nephew Sir Gawaine. Then King Arthur fell sick for sorrow of Sir Gawaine, that he was so sore hurt, and by cause of the war betwixt him and Sir Launcelot. So then they on King Arthur's party<sup>1</sup> kept the siege with little war without-forth; and they withinforth kept their walls, and defended them when need was. . . .

Thus as this siege endured, and as Sir Gawaine lay sick near a month; and when he was well recovered and ready within three days to do battle again with Sir Launcelot, right so came tidings unto Arthur from England that made King Arthur and all his host to remove.

As Sir Mordred was ruler of all England, he did so make letters as though that they came from beyond the sea and the letters specified that King Arthur was slain in battle with Sir Launcelot. Wherefore Sir Mordred made a parliament, and called the lords together, and there he made them to choose him King; and so was he crowned at Canterbury, and held a feast there fifteen days.

Then came word to Sir Mordred that King Arthur had araised the siege for Sir Launcelot, and he was coming homeward with a great host, to be avenged upon Sir Mordred; wherefore Sir Mordred made write writs to all the barony of this land, and much people drew to him.

For then was the common voice among them that with Arthur was none other life but war and strife, and with Sir Mordred was great joy and bliss. Thus was Sir Arthur depraved<sup>2</sup> and evil said of. And many there were that King Arthur had made up of naught, and given them lands, might not then say him a good word. Lo ye all Englishmen, see ye not what a mischief here was, for he that was the most king and knight of the world, and most loved the fellowship of noble knights, and by him they were all upholden, now might not these Englishmen hold them content with him. Lo thus was the old custom and usage of this land; and also men say that we of this land have not yet lost nor forgotten that custom and usage. Alas, this is a great default of us Englishmen, for there may no thing please us now term. And so fared the people at that time, they were better pleased with Sir Mordred than they were with King Arthur; and much people drew unto Sir Mordred, and said they would abide with him for better and for worse. And so Sir Mordred drew with a great host to Dover, for there he heard say that Sir Arthur would arrive, and so he thought to beat his own father from his lands; and the most party of all England held with Sir Mordred, the people were so new fangle.

And so as Sir Mordred was at Dover with his host, there came King Arthur with a great navy of ships, and galleys, and carracks.<sup>3</sup> And there was Sir Mordred ready awaiting upon his landing, to let<sup>4</sup> his own father to land upon the land that he was King over. Then there was launching of great boats and small, and full of noble men of arms; and there was much slaughter of gentle knights, and many a full bold baron was laid full low, on both parties. But King Arthur was so courageous that there might no manner of knights let him to land, and his knights fiercely followed him; and so they landed maugre Sir Mordred and all his power, and put Sir Mordred aback, that he fled and all his people.

THE DEATH OF ARTHUR

Then was it told the King that Sir Mordred had pyghte<sup>1</sup> a new field upon Barham Down. And upon the morn the King rode thither to him, and there was a great battle betwixt them, and much people was slain on both parties; but at the last Sir Arthur's party stood best, and Sir Mordred and his party fled unto Canterbury. . . .

Then the King commanded Sir Lucan the Butler and his brother Sir Bedivere, with two bishops with them, and charged them in any wise, an they might, take a treaty for a month day<sup>2</sup> with Sir Mordred, and spare not, proffer him lands and goods as much as ye think best. So then they departed, and came to Sir Mordred, where he had a grim host of an hundred thousand men. And there they entreated Sir Mordred long time; and at the last Sir Mordred was agreed for to have Cornwall and Kent, by Arthur's days: after, all England, after the days of King Arthur.

Then were they condescended that King Arthur and Sir Mordred should meet betwixt both their hosts, and each of them should bring fourteen persons; and they came with this word unto Arthur. Then said he, I am glad that this is done: and so he went into the field. And when Arthur should depart, he warned all his host that an they see any sword drawn, Look ye come on fiercely, and slay that traitor Sir Mordred, for I in no wise trust him.

In likewise Sir Mordred warned his host that, An ye see any sword drawn, look that ye come on fiercely, and so slay all that ever before you standeth; for in no wise I will not trust for this treatise, for I know well my father will be avenged on me. And so they met as their appointment was, and so they were agreed and accorded thoroughly; and wine was fetched, and they drank. Right soon came an adder out of a little heath bush and it stung a knight on the foot. And when the knight felt him stung, he looked down and saw the adder, and then he drew his sword to slay the adder, and thought of none other harm. And when the host on both parties saw that sword drawn, then they blew beamous,<sup>3</sup> trumpets, and horns, and shouted grimly. And so both hosts dressed them together. And King Arthur took his horse and said, Alas this unhappy day, and so rode to his party. And Sir Mordred in like wise. And never was there seen a more dolefuller battle in no Christian land; for there was but rushing and riding, feigning and striking, and many a grim word was there spoken either to other, and many a deadly stroke. But ever King Arthur rode throughout the battle<sup>4</sup> of Sir Mordred many times, and did full nobly as a noble knight should, and at all times he fainted never; and Sir Mordred that day put him in devoir,<sup>5</sup> and in great peril. And thus they fought all the long day, and never stinted till the noble knights were laid to the cold earth; and ever they fought still till it was near night, and by that time was there an hundred thousand laid dead upon the ground. Then was Arthur wood<sup>6</sup> wroth out of measure, when he saw his people so slain from him. Then the king looked about him, and then was he ware, of all his host and of all his good knights, were left no more alive but two knights; that one was Sir Lucan the Butler, and his brother Sir Bedivere, and they were full sore wounded. Jesu mercy, said the king, where are all my noble knights become? Alas that ever I should see this doleful day, for now, said Arthur, I am come to mine end. But would to God that I wist where were that traitor Sir Mordred, that hath caused all this mischief. Then was King Arthur ware where Sir Mordred leaned upon his sword among a great heap of dead men. Now give me my spear, said Arthur unto Sir Lucan, for yonder I have espied the traitor that all this woe hath wrought. Sir, let him be, said Sir Lucan, for he is unhappy; and if ye pass this unhappy day ye shall be right well revenged upon him. Good lord remember ye of your night's dream, and what the spirit of Sir Gawaine told you this night, yet God of His great goodness hath preserved you hitherto. Therefore, for God's sake, leave off by this, for blessed be God ye have won the field, for here we be three alive, and with Sir Mordred is none alive; and if ye leave off now, this wicked day of destiny is past. Tide me death, betide me life,<sup>7</sup> said the king, now I see him yonder alone, he shall never escape mine hands, for at a better avail shall I never have him. God speed you well, said Sir Bedivere. Then the King gat his spear in both his hands, and ran towards Sir Mordred, crying, Traitor, now is thy death day come. And when Sir Mordred heard Sir Arthur, he ran unto him with his sword drawn in his hand. And there King Arthur smote Sir Mordred under the shield, with a foin<sup>8</sup> of his spear, throughout the body, more than a fathom; and when Sir Mordred felt that he had his death's wound he thrust himself with the might that he had up to the bur<sup>9</sup> of King Arthur's spear; and right so he smote his father Arthur, with his sword holden in both his hands, on the side of the head, that the sword pierced the helmet and the brain pan, and therewithal Sir Mordred fell stark dead to the earth; and the noble Arthur fell in a swoon to the earth, and there he swooned oftentimes. And Sir Lucan the Butler and Sir Bedivere oftentimes heave him up. And so weakly they led him betwixt them both, to a little chapel not far from the sea side. And when the king was there he thought him well eased. Then heard they people cry in the field. Now go thou Sir Lucan, said the King, and do me to wit what betokens that noise in the field. So Sir Lucan departed, for he was grievously wounded in many places. And so as he went he saw and hearkened by the moonlight, how that pillers<sup>10</sup> and robbers were come into the field, to pill and rob many a full noble knight of brooches, and beads, and many a good ring, and of many a rich jewel; and who that were not dead all out, they slew them for their harness and their riches. When Sir Lucan understood this work, he came to the king as soon as he might and told him all what he had heard and seen. Therefore by my rede,<sup>11</sup> said Sir Lucan, it is best that we bring you to some town. I would it were so, said the king.

But I may not stand, mine head works so. Ah Sir Launcelot, said King Arthur, this day have I sore missed thee; alas that ever I was against thee, for now have I my death, whereof Sir Gawaine me warned in my dream. Then Sir Lucan took up the king, the one part, and Sir Bedivere the other part, and in the lifting the king swooned; and Sir Lucan fell in a swoon with the lift, . . . and therewith the noble knight's heart brast.<sup>12</sup> And when the king awoke, he beheld Sir Lucan, how he lay foaming at the mouth. . . . Alas, said the king, this is to me a full heavy sight, to see this noble duke so die for my sake, for he would have holpen me that had more need of help than I. Alas he would not complain him, his heart was so set to help me; now Jesu have mercy upon his soul. Then Sir Bedivere wept for the death of his brother. Leave this mourning and weeping, said the king, for all this will not avail me, for wit thou well that an I might live myself, the death of Sir Lucan would grieve me evermore; but my time hieth fast, said the king. Therefore, said Arthur unto Sir Bedivere, take thou Excalibur my good sword, and go with it to yonder water side, and when thou comest there I charge thee throw my sword in that water, and come again and tell me what thou there seest. My lord, said Bedivere, your commandment shall be done, and lightly bring you word again. So Sir Bedivere departed, and by the way he beheld that noble sword, that the pommel and the haft was all of precious stones; and then he said to himself, if I throw this rich sword in the water, thereof shall never come good, but harm and loss. And then Sir Bedivere hid Excalibur under a tree. And so, as soon as he might, he came again unto the king, and said he had been at the water, and had thrown the sword into the water. What saw thou there? said the king. Sir, he said, I saw nothing but waves and wind. That is untrue said of thee, said the king, therefore go thou lightly again, and do my commandment; as thou art to me lief and dear, spare not but throw it in. Then Sir Bedivere returned again, and took the sword in his hand; and then him thought sin and shame to throw away that noble sword, and so oft<sup>13</sup> he hid the sword, and returned again, and told to the king that he had been at the water, and done his commandment. What saw thou there? said the king. Sir, he said, I saw nothing but the waters wappe<sup>14</sup> and the waves wanne. Ah, traitor untrue, said King Arthur, now hast thou betrayed me twice. Who would have weened that thou that hast been to me so lief and dear, and thou art named a noble knight, and would betray me for the riches of the sword. But now go again lightly, for thy long tarrying putteth me in great jeopardy of my life, for I have taken cold. And but if<sup>15</sup> thou do now as I bid thee, if ever I may see thee, I shall slay thee with mine own hands; for thou wouldst for my rich sword see me dead. Then Sir Bedivere departed, and went to the sword, and lightly took it up, and went to the water side; and there he bound the girdle about the hilts, and then he threw the sword as far into the water as he might; and there came an arm and an hand above the water and met it, and caught it, and shook it thrice and brandished, and then vanished away the hand with the sword in the water. So Sir Bedivere came again to the King, and told him what he saw. Alas, said the king, help me hence, for I dread me I have tarried over long. Then Sir Bedivere took the king upon his back, and so went with him to that water side. And when they were at the water side, even fast by the bank hove a little barge with many fair ladies in it, and among them all was a queen, and all they had black hoods, and all<sup>25</sup> they wept and shrieked when they saw King Arthur. Now put me into the barge, said the king. And so he did softly; and there received him three queens with great mourning; and so they set them down, and in one of their laps<sup>30</sup> King Arthur laid his head. And then that queen said, Ah, dear brother, why have ye tarried so long from me? Alas, this wound on your head hath caught over much cold. And so then they rowed from the land, and Sir<sup>35</sup> Bedivere beheld all those ladies go from him. Then Sir Bedivere cried, Ah, my lord Arthur, what shall become of me, now ye go from me and leave me here alone among mine enemies? Comfort thyself, said the king, and do as well<sup>40</sup> as thou mayest, for in me is no trust for to trust in, for I will into the vale of Avalon to heal me of my grievous wounds: and if thou hear never more of me, pray for my soul. But ever the queens and ladies wept and shrieked, that it was pity to hear. And as soon as Sir Bedivere had lost the sight of the barge, he wept and wailed, and so took the forest; and so he went all that night, and in the morning he was ware betwixt two holts<sup>50</sup> hoar,<sup>16</sup> of a chapel and an hermitage.

Then was Sir Bedivere glad, and thither he went; and when he came into the chapel, he saw where lay an hermit grovelling on all four, there fast by a tomb was new graven. When<sup>55</sup> the hermit saw Sir Bedivere he knew him well, for he was but little tofore Bishop of Canterbury, that Sir Mordred flemed.<sup>17</sup> Sir, said

Sir Bedivere, what man is there interred that ye pray so fast for? Fair son, said the hermit, I wot not verily, but by my deeming.<sup>18</sup> But this night, at midnight, here came a number of<sup>5</sup> ladies, and brought hither a dead corpse, and prayed me to bury him; and here they offered an hundred tapers, and they gave me an hundred besants.<sup>19</sup> Alas, said Sir Bedivere, that was my lord King Arthur, that here lieth buried<sup>10</sup> in this chapel. Then Sir Bedivere swooned; and when he awoke he prayed the hermit he might abide with him still there, to live with fasting and prayers. For from hence will I never go, said Sir Bedivere, by my will, but all<sup>15</sup> the days of my life here to pray for my lord Arthur. Ye are welcome to me, said the hermit, for I know you better than ye ween that I do. Ye are the bold Bedivere, and the full noble duke Sir Lucan the Butler was your<sup>20</sup> brother. . . .

More of the death of King Arthur could I never find, but that ladies brought him to his burial; and such one was buried there, that the hermit bare witness that sometime was Bishop<sup>25</sup> of Canterbury, but yet the hermit knew not in certain that he was verily the body of King Arthur: for this tale Sir Bedivere, knight of the Table Round, made it to be written. Yet some men say in many parts of England that King<sup>30</sup> Arthur is not dead, but had by the will of our Lord Jesu into another place; and men say that he shall come again, and he shall win the Holy Cross. I will not say it shall be so, but rather I will say, here in this world he changed his<sup>35</sup> life. But many men say that there is written upon his tomb this verse:

Hic jacet Arthurus Rex, quondam Rex que futurus.<sup>20</sup>

SIR LAUNCELOT

And when Sir Ector heard such noise and light in the choir of Joyous Gard, he alit and put his horse from him, and came into the<sup>45</sup> choir, and there he saw men sing and weep. And all they knew Sir Ector, but he knew not them. Then went Sir Bors unto Sir Ector, and told him how there lay his brother Sir Launcelot dead; and then Sir Ector threw his shield,<sup>50</sup> sword, and helm from him. And when he beheld Sir Launcelot's visage, he fell down in a swoon. And when he waked it were hard any tongue to tell the doleful complaints that he made for his brother. Ah, Launcelot, he said, thou wert head of all christian knights. And now I dare say, said Sir Ector, thou Sir Launcelot, there thou liest, that thou were never matched of earthly knight's hands. And thou were the courteoust knight that ever bare lover that ever bestrad horse, and thou were the truest lover of a sinful man that ever loved woman. And thou were the kindest man that ever strake with sword. And thou were the goodliest person that ever came among the press of knights. And thou was the meekest man and the gentlest that ever ate in hall among ladies. And thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in the breast. Then there was weeping and dolour out of measure. Thus they kept Sir Launcelot's corpse on loft fifteen days, and then they buried it with great devotion.

THE NEW INVENTION OF PRINTING

(From The Recuyell<sup>1</sup> of the Histories of Troye, Epilogue to Book III, 1475?)

Thus end I this book, which I have translated after mine author as nigh as God hath given me cunning,<sup>2</sup> to whom be given the laud and praising. And for as much as in the writing of the same, my pen is worn, mine hand weary, and not steadfast, mine eyen<sup>3</sup> dimmed with overmuch looking on the white paper, and my courage not so prone and ready to labour as it hath been, and that age creepeth on me daily and feebleth all the body, and also because I have promised to divers gentlemen and to my friends to address to them as hastily as I might this said book; therefore I have practised and learned, at my great charge and dispense,<sup>4</sup> to ordain<sup>5</sup> this said book in print, after the manner and form as ye may here see;
 and (it) is not written with pen and ink, as other books be, to the end that every man may have them attones.<sup>6</sup> For all the books of this story, named the recule of the histories of Troye, thus imprinted as ye here see, were begun in one day, and also finished in one day:
 which book I have presented to my said re-doubted lady as afore is said. And she hath well accepted it and hath largely rewarded me, wherefore I beseech Almighty God, to reward her everlasting bliss after this life, praying her said Grace, and all them that shall read this book, not to disdain the simple and rude work, neither to reply against the saying of the matters touched in this book,<sup>7</sup> though it accord not unto the translation of others which have written it. For divers men have made divers books, which in all points accord not, as Dictes,<sup>8</sup> Dares,<sup>9</sup> and Homer. For Dictes and Homer, as Greeks, say and write favourably for the Greeks, and give to them more worship than to the Trojans; and Dares writeth otherwise than they do. And also as for the proper names, it is no wonder that they accord not,

 for some one name in these days has divers equivocations,<sup>10</sup> after the countries that they dwell in; but all accord in conclusion the general destruction of that noble city of Troy, and the death of so many noble princes, as Kings, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights and common people, and the ruin irreparable of that city that never since was reëdified,<sup>11</sup> which may be ensample to all men during the world how dreadful and jeopardous it is to begin a war,
 and what harms, losses, and death followeth.
 Therefore the Apostle<sup>12</sup> saith, "All that is written is written to our doctrine," which doctrine for the common weal I beseech God may be taken in such place and time as shall be most needful in increasing of peace, love, and charity; which grant us He that suffered for the same to be crucified on the rood tree. And so say we all Amen, for charity.

KING ARTHUR

(From Caxton's Prologue to his edition of Malory's Morte d'Arthur, 1485)

After that I had accomplished and finished divers histories, as well of contemplation as of other historical and worldly acts of great conquerors and princes, and also certain books of ensamples and doctrine, many noble and divers gentlemen of this realm of England came and demanded me many and oftentimes, wherefore that I have not done made and imprinted the noble history of the Sangrael, and of the most renowned Christian king, first and chief of the three best Christian and worthy, King Arthur, which ought most to be remembered among us English men tofore all other Christian kings. For it is notoriously known through the universal world that there be nine worthy and the best that ever were; that is to wit three Paynims, three Jews, and three Christian men. As for the Paynims they were tofore the Incarnation of Christ, which were named,—the first, Hector of Troy, of whom the history is come both in ballad and in prose; the second, Alexander the Great; and the third, Julius Caesar, Emperor of Rome, of whom the histories be well-known and had. And as for the three Jews which also were tofore the Incarnation of our Lord, of whom the first was Duke Joshua, which brought the children of Israel into the land of behest; the second, David, King of Jerusalem; and the third Judas Maccabæus: of these three the Bible rehearseth all their noble histories and acts. And sith the said Incarnation, have been three noble Christian men stilled and admitted through the universal world into the number of the nine best and worthy, of whom was first the noble Arthur, whose noble acts I purpose to write in this present book here following. The second was Charlemagne, or Charles the Great, of whom the history is had in many places both in French and English; and the third and last was Godfrey of Boulogne, of whose acts and life I made a book unto the excellent prince and king of noble memory, King Edward the Fourth. The said noble gentlemen instantly required me to imprint the history of the said noble king and conqueror, King Arthur, and of his knights, with the history of the Sangrael, and of the death and ending of the said Arthur; affirming that I ought rather to imprint his acts and noble feats, than of Godfrey of Boulogne, or any of the other eight, considering that he was a man born within this realm, and king and emperor of the same; and that there be in French divers and many noble volumes of his acts, and also of his knights. To whom I answered, that divers men hold opinion that there was no such Arthur, and that all such books as be made of him be but feigned and fables, by cause that some chronicles make of him no mention, nor remember him nothing, nor of his knights. Whereto they answered, and one in special said, that in him that should say or think that there was never such a king called Arthur, might well be credited great folly and blindness; for he said that there were many evidences of the contrary; first ye may see his sepulture in the Monastery of Glastonbury. And also in “Polychronicon,” in the fifth book, the sixth chapter, and in the seventh book, the twenty-third chapter, where his body was buried, and after found and translated into the said monastery. Ye shall see also in the history of Boccaccio, in his book De Casu Principum, part of his noble acts, and also of his fall. Also Galfridus in his British book recounteth his life; and in divers places of England many remembrances be yet of him and shall remain perpetually, and also of his knights. First in the Abbey of Westminster, at Saint Edward’s shrine, remaineth the print of his seal in red wax closed in beryl, in which is written Patrius Arthurus, Britanniae, Galliae, Germaniae, Daciae, Imperator. Item, in the castle of Dover ye may see Gawain’s skull and Craddock’s mantle: at Winchester the Round Table: in other places Launcelot’s sword and many other things. Then all these things considered, there can no man reasonably gainsay but here was a king of this land named Arthur. For in all places, Christian and heathen, he is reputed and taken for one of the nine worthy, and the first of the three Christian men. And also he is more spoken of beyond the sea, more books made of his noble acts than there be in England, as well in Dutch, Italian, Spanish, and Greek, as in French. And yet of record remain in witness of him in Wales, in the town of Camelot the great stones and marvellous works of iron, lying under the ground, and royal vaults, which divers now living hath seen. Wherefore it is a marvel why he is no more renowned in his own country, save only it accordeth to the word of God, which saith that no man is accept for a prophet in his own country. Then all these things aforesaid alleged, I could not well deny but that there was such a noble king named Arthur, and reputed one of the nine worthy, and first and chief of the Christian men; and many noble volumes be made of him and of his noble knights in French, which I have seen and read beyond the sea, which be not had in our maternal tongue, but in Welsh be many and also in French, and some in English, but nowhere nigh all. Wherefore, such as have late been drawn out briefly into English I have, after the simple cunning that God hath sent to me, under the favour and correction of all noble lords and gentlemen, emprised to imprint a book of the noble histories of the said King Arthur, and of certain of his knights, after a copy unto me delivered, which copy Sir Thomas Malory did take out of certain books of French, and reduced it into English. And I, according to my copy, have done set it in imprint, to the intent that noble men may see and learn the noble acts of chivalry, the gentle and virtuous deeds that some knights used in those days, by which they came to honour; and how they that were vicious were punished and oft put to shame and rebuke; humbly beseeching all noble lords and ladies, with all other estates, of what estate or degree they be of, that shall see and read in this said book and work, that they take the good and honest acts in their remembrance, and to follow the same. Wherein they shall find many joyous and pleasant histories, and noble and renowned acts of humanity, gentleness, and chivalry. For herein may be seen noble chivalry, courtesy, humanity, friendliness, hardiness, love, friendship, cowardice, murder, hate, virtue, and sin. 10 Do after the good and leave the evil, and it shall bring you to good fame and renown. And for to pass the time this book shall be pleasant to read in; but for to give faith and believe that all is true that is contained herein, ye be at your liberty; but all is written for our doctrine, 5 and for to beware that we fall not to vice nor sin, but to exercise and follow virtue; by which we may come and attain to good fame and renown in this life, and after this short and transitory life, to come unto everlasting bliss in heaven, the which He grant us that reigneth in heaven, the Blessed Trinity. Amen.

THE LOVER'S LIFE COMPARED TO THE ALPS

(From Tottel's Miscellany, 1557)

Like unto these unmeasurable mountains
So is my painful life, the burden of ire;
For high be they, and high is my desire;
And I of tears, and they be full of fountains:
Under craggy rocks they have barren plains; 5
Hard thoughts in me my woful mind doth tire:
Small fruit and many leaves their tops do attire:
With small effect great trust in me remains:
The boisterous winds oft their high boughs do blast;
Hot sighs in me continually be shed: 10
Wild beasts in them, fierce love in me is fed;
Unmovable am I, and they steadfast.
Of singing birds they have the tune and
note;
And I alone complaints passing through my throat.

AND WILT THOU LEAVE ME THUS?

And wilt thou leave me thus?
Say nay! say nay! for shame!
To save thee from the blame
Of all my grief and grame.<sup>1</sup>
And wilt thou leave me thus? 5
Say nay! say nay!
And wilt thou leave me thus?
That hath lov'd thee so long?
In wealth and woe among:
And is thy heart so strong 10
As for to leave me thus?
Say nay! say nay!
And wilt thou leave me thus?
That hath given thee my heart
Never for to depart;
Neither for pain nor smart: 15
And wilt thou leave me thus?
Say nay! say nay!
And wilt thou leave me thus?

<sup>1</sup> Sorrow.

And have no more pity,
Of him that loveth thee?
Alas! thy cruelty!
And wilt thou leave me thus?
Say nay! say nay!

DESCRIPTION OF SPRING

(From Tottel's Miscellany, 1557)

The soot<sup>1</sup> season that bud and bloom forth brings,
With green hath clad the hill, and eke the vale.
The nightingale with feathers new she sings;
The turtle to her mate hath told her tale.
Summer is come, for every spray now springs, 5
The hart hath hung his old head on the pale;
The buck in brake his winter coat he slings;
The fishes fleet with new repaired scale;
The adder all her slough away she slings;
The swift swallow pursueth the flies' smale;<sup>2</sup>
The busy bee her honey now she mings;<sup>3</sup> 11
Winter is worn that was the flowers' bale.
And thus I see among these pleasant things
Each care decays, and yet my sorrow springs!

THE FRAILTY OF BEAUTY

(From Tottel's Miscellany, 1557)

Brittle beauty, that Nature made so frail, Whereof the gift is small, and short the season;
Flowering to-day, tomorrow apt to fail;
Tickle treasure, abhorred of reason:
Dangerous to deal with, vain, of no avail; 5
Costly in keeping, past not worth two pe-son;<sup>1</sup>
Slipper<sup>2</sup> in sliding, as is an eel's tail;
Hard to obtain, once gotten, not reason:<sup>3</sup>
Jewel of jeopardy, that peril doth assail;
False and untrue, enticed oft to treason; 10
Enemy to youth, that most may I bewail;
Ah! bitter sweet, infecting as the poison,
Thou fairest as fruit that with the frost is taken;
To-day ready ripe, tomorrow all to shaken.

THE MEANS TO ATTAIN A HAPPY LIFE

(From Tottel's Miscellany, 1557)

Martial, the things that do attain
The happy life, be these, I find:
The riches left, not got with pain;
The fruitful ground, the quiet mind:

The equal friend, no grudge, no strife; 5
No charge of rule, nor governance;
Without disease, the healthful life;
The household of continuance:

The mean diet, no delicate fare;
True wisdom join'd with simpleness; 10
The night discharged of all care;
Where wine the wit may not oppress:

The faithful wife, without debate;
Such sleeps as may beguile the night.
Contented with thine own estate; 15
Ne wish for death, ne fear his might.

THE DEATH OF LAOCOÖN

Us caitiffs then a far more dreadful chance
Befel, that troubled our unarmed breasts.
While Laocoön, that chosen was by lot
Neptunus' priest, did sacrifice a bull
Before the holy altar; suddenly 5
From Tenedon, behold! in circles great
By the calm seas came floating adders twain,
Which plied towards the shore (I loath to tell)
With reared breast lift up above the seas;
Whose bloody crests aloft the waves were seen; 10

The hinder part swam hidden in the flood.
Their grisly backs were linked manifold.
With sound of broken waves they gat the strand,
With glowing eyen, tainted with blood and fire;
Whose welt'ring tongues did lick their hissing mouths. 15

We fled away; our face the blood forsook:
But they with gait direct to Lacon ran.
And first of all each serpent doth enwrap
The bodies small of his two tender sons;
Whose wretched limbs they bit, and fed thereon. 20
Then raught<sup>1</sup> they him, who had his weapon caught

To rescue them; twice winding him about,
With folded knots and circled tails, his waist:
Their scaled backs did compass twice his neck,
With reared heads aloft and stretched throats.
He with his hands strave to unloose the knots, 25 (Whose sacred fillets all-besprinkled were
With filth of gory blood, and venom rank)
And to the stars such dreadful shout he sent,
Like to the sound the roaring bull forth lows, 30
Which from the altar wounded doth astart,

<sup>1</sup> Reached.

The swerving axe when he shakes from his neck.
The serpents twain, with hasted trail they glide
To Pallas' temple, and her towers of height:
Under the feet of the which Goddess stern, 35
Hidden behind her target's boss they crept.

NIGHT

It was then night; the sound and quiet sleep
Had through the earth the wearied bodies
caught;
The woods, the raging seas were fallen to rest;
When that the stars had half their course declined,
The fields whist, beasts, and fowls of divers hue,
And whatso that in the broad lakes remained, 6
Or yet among the bushy thicks of brier,
Laid down to sleep by silence of the night
'Gan swage their cares, mindless of travails past.

THE LULLABY OF A LOVER

(From The Posies, 1575)

Sing lullaby, as women do,
Wherewith they bring their babes to rest,
And lullaby can I sing too,
As womanly as can the best.
With lullaby they still the child, 5
And if I be not much beguiled,
Full many wanton babes have I,
Which must be stilled with lullaby.

First lullaby my youthful years,
It is now time to go to bed, 10
For crooked age and hoary hairs,
Have won the haven within my head:
With lullaby then youth be still,
With lullaby content thy will,
Since courage quails and comes behind, 15
Go sleep, and so beguile thy mind.

Next lullaby my gazing eyes,
Which wonted were to gaze apace;
For every glass may now suffice,
To shew the furrows in my face: 20
With lullaby then wink awhile,
With lullaby your looks beguile:
Let no fair face, nor beauty bright,
Entice you eft<sup>1</sup> with vain delight.

And lullaby my wanton will, 25
Let Reason's rule now reign thy thought,
Since all too late I find by skill,
How dear I have thy fancies bought.
With lullaby now take thine ease,
With lullaby thy doubts appease: 30
For trust to this, if thou be still,
My body shall obey thy will. . . .

<sup>1</sup> Afterward.

Thus lullaby my youth, mine eyes,
My will, my ware, and all that was,
I can no more delays devise, 35
But welcome pain, let pleasure pass:
With lullaby now take your leave,
With lullaby your dreams deceive,
And when you rise with waking eye,
Remember then this lullaby. 40

DE PROFUNDIS

(From the same)

From depth of dole wherein my soul doth dwell,
From heavy heart which harbours in my breast,
From troubled spirit which seldom taketh rest,
From hope of heaven, from dread of darksome
hell,

O gracious God, to thee I cry and yell. 5
My God, my Lord, my lovely Lord alone,
To thee I call, to thee I make my moan.
And thou (good God) vouchsafe in gree<sup>1</sup> to take,

This woeful plaint
Wherein I faint. 10
Oh hear me then for thy great mercies' sake. . . .

If thou, good Lord, should'st take thy rod in hand,
If thou regard what sins are daily done,
If thou take hold where we our works begun,
If thou decree in judgement for to stand, 15
And be extreme to see our excuses scanned,
If thou take note of everything amiss,
And write in rolls how frail our nature is,
O glorious God, O King, O Prince of power,
What mortal wight 20
May then have light
To feel thy frown, if thou have list to lower?

But thou art good and hast of mercy store,
Thou not delight'st to see a sinner fall,
Thou hearknest first, before we come to call. 25
Thine ears are set wide open evermore,
Before we knock thou comest to the door.
Thou art more pressed to hear a sinner cry,
Than he is quick to climb to thee on high.
Thy mighty name be praised then alway, 30
Let faith and fear
True witness bear,
How fast they stand which on thy mercy
stay. . . .

Before the break or dawning of the day,
Before the light be seen in lofty skies, 35
Before the Sun appear in pleasant wise,
Before the watch (before the watch I say)
Before the ward that waits therefore alway:
My soul, my sense, my secret thought, my sprite,
My will, my wish, my joy, and my delight; 40
Unto the Lord that sits in Heaven on high,
With hasty wing
From me doth fling,
And striveth still unto the Lord to fly. . . .

<sup>1</sup> Good will.

He will redeem our deadly drooping state, 45
He will bring home the sheep that go astray,
He will help them that hope in him alway:
He will appease our discord and debate,
He will soon save though we repent us late.
He will be ours if we continue his, 50
He will bring bale to joy and perfect bliss,
He will redeem the flock of his elect,
From all that is,
Or was amiss,
Since Abraham's heirs did first his laws reject. 55

INDUCTION TO A MIRROUR FOR MAG- ISTRATES

(1559)

The wrathful winter, 'proching on apace
With blustering blasts had all ybared the treen,<sup>1</sup>
And old Saturnus, with his frosty face,
With chilling cold had pierced the tender
green;
The mantles rent, wherein enwrapped been 5
The gladsome groves that now lay overthrown,
The tapets<sup>2</sup> torn, and every bloom down blown.

The soil that erst so seemly was to seen,
Was all despoiled of her beauty's hue;
And sweet fresh flowers (where with the summer's queen 10
Had clad the earth) now Boreas' blasts down
blew,
And small fowles flocking, in their song did rue
The winter's wrath, where with each thing defaste<sup>3</sup>
In woeful wise bewailed the summer past.

Hawthorne had lost his motley livery, 15
The naked twigs were shivering all for cold,
And dropping down the tears abundantly;
Each thing (me thought) with weeping eye me told
The cruel season, bidding me withhold
Myselfe within, for I was gotten out 20
Into the fields, whereas<sup>4</sup> I walked about.

When, lo, the night with misty mantles spread,
Gan dark the day, and dim the azure skies,
And Venus in her message Hermes sped
To bloody Mars, to will him not to rise, 25
While she herself approached in speedy wise;
And Virgo hiding her disdainful breast,
With Thetis now had lain her down to rest.

Whiles Scorpio dreading Sagittarius' dart, Whose bow prest<sup>5</sup> bent in fight, the string had slipt, 30

<sup>5</sup> Ready.

Down slid into the ocean flood apart,
The Bear, that in the Irish seas had dipt
His grisly feet, with speed from thence he whipt;

For Thetis, hasting from the Virgin's bed
Pursued the Bear, that ere she came was fled. 35

And Phaeton now reaching to his race
With glistering beams, gold streaming where they bent,

Was prest to enter in his resting place.
Erythius that in the cart first went,
Had even now attained his journey's stent:<sup>6</sup> 40
And fast declining hid away his head,
While Titan couched him in his purple bed.

And pale Cynthéa with her borrowed light,
Beginning to supply her brother's place,
Was past the noonstead six degrees in sight, 45
When sparkling stars amid the heaven's face,
With twinkling light shone on the earth apace,
That while they brought about the night's chare,<sup>7</sup>
The dark had dimmed the day ere I was ware.

And sorrowing I to see the summer flowers, 50
The lively green, the lusty leas forlorne,
The sturdy trees so shattered with the showers,
The fields so fade that flourished so before;
It taught me well all earthly things be borne
To die the death, for nought long time may last;
The summer's beauty yields to winter's blast. 56

Then looking upward to the heaven's leames,<sup>8</sup>
With night's stars thick powdered everywhere,
Which erst so glistened with the golden streams
That cheerfull Phoebus spread down from his sphere, 60
Beholding dark oppressing day so near;
The sudden sight reduced<sup>9</sup> to my mind,
The sundry changes that in earth we find.

That musing on this worldly wealth in thought,
Which comes and goes more faster than we see,
The flickering flame that with the fire is
wrought, 66
My busy mind presented unto me
Such fall of peers as in this realm had be;
That oft I wisht some would their woes deserve,<sup>10</sup>

To warn the rest whom fortune left alive. 70

And straight forth stalking with redoubled pace
For that I saw the night drew on so fast,
In black all clad there fell before my face
A piteous wight, whom woe had all forwaste, 11
Forth from her eye the crystal tears outbrast,<sup>11</sup>
And sighing sore, her hands she wrong and fold, 76

Tare all her hair, that ruth was to behold.

Her body small forewithered and forespent,
As is the stalk that summer's drought oppress,
Her weaked<sup>12</sup> face with woeful tears besprent,

<sup>12</sup> Withered.

Her colour pale, and (as it seemed her best) 81
In woe and plaint reposed was her rest.
And as the stone that drops of water wears;
So dented were her cheeks with fall of tears.

Her eyes swollen with flowing streams afloat, 85
Wherewith her looks thrown up full piteously,
Her forceless hands together oft she smote,
With doleful shrieks, that echoed in the sky;
Whose plaint such sighs did straight accompany,
That in my doom<sup>13</sup> was never man did see 90
A wight but half so woebegone as she.

I stood aghast, beholding all her plight,
Tween dread and dolour so distraind in heart,
That while my hairs upstart with the sight,
The tears out-streamed for sorrow of her smart: 95

But when I saw no end that could apart
The deadly dole, which she so sore did make,
With doleful voice then thus to her I spake.

"Unwrap thy woes whatever wight thou be,
And stint<sup>14</sup> in time to spill thyself with plaint;
Tell what thou art, and whence, for well I
see 101
Thou canst not dure with sorrow thus attain."
And with that word of sorrow all forfait,
She looked up, and, prostrate as she lay,
With piteous sound, lo, thus she gan to say, 105

"Alas, I wretch whom thus thou seest dis-trained

With wasting woes, that never shall aslake,
Sorrow I am, in endless torments pained
Among the Furies in the infernal lake;
Where Pluto, god of hell, so grisly black 110
Doth hold his throne and Letheus deadly taste
Doth reave remembrance of each thing forepast.

"Whence come I am, the dreary destiny
And luckless lot for to bemoan of those,
Whom Fortune in this maze of misery, 115
Of wretched chance, most woeful mirrours chose
That when thou seest how lightly they did lose Their pope, their power, and that they thought most sure,
Thou mayest soon deem no earthly joy may dure."

Whose rueful voice no sooner had out brayed
Those woeful words, wherewith she sorrowed
so, 121
But out, alas, she shrieked and never stayed,
Fell down, and all to-dashed herself for woe.
The cold pale dread my limbs gan overgo,
And so I sorrowed at her sorrows eft,<sup>15</sup> 125
That, what with grief and fear, my wits were reft.

I stretched myself, and straight my heart revives,
That dread and dolour erst did so appale;<sup>16</sup>
Like him that with the fervent fever strives,
<sup>13</sup> Judgment.
<sup>15</sup> Stop.
<sup>16</sup> Appall.

When sickness seeks his castle's health to scale: 130

With gathered spirits so forced I fear to avail;
And, rearing<sup>17</sup> her with anguish all fordone,
My spirits return'd, and then I thus begonne.

"O Sorrow, alas, sith sorrow is thy name,
And that to thee this drear<sup>18</sup> doth well pertain,
In vain it were to seek to cease the same: 136
But as a man himself with sorrow slain,
So I, alas, do comfort thee in pain,
That here in sorrow art forsunke so deep,
That at thy sight I can but sigh and weep." 140

I had no sooner spoken of a stike,<sup>19</sup>
But that the storm so rumbled in her breast,
As Æolus could never roar the like,
And showers down rain'd from her eyen so
fast,

That all bedreynt<sup>20</sup> the place, till at the last 145
Well eas'd they the colour of her mind,
As rage of rain doth swage the stormy wind.

For forth she paced in her fearful tale:
"Come! come!" quoth she, "and see what I shall shewe,

Come hear the plaining and the bitter bale 150
Of worthy men, by fortune overthrowe.
Come thou and see them ruing all in rowe,
They were but shades that erst in mind thou rolde.<sup>21</sup>

Come, come, with me, thine eyes shall them behold."

What could these words but make me more
aghast: 155

To hear her tell whereon I mused while ere:<sup>22</sup>
Musing upon her words and what they were,
All suddenly well lessened was my fear:
For to my mind returned how she telde 160
Both what she was, and where her wun<sup>23</sup> she helde.

Whereby I knew that she a goddess was,
And, therewithall, resorted to my mind
My thought that late presented me the glass
Of brittle state, of cares that here we find, 165
Of thousand woes to silly men assigned:
And how she now bid me come and behold,
To see with eye that erst in thought I rolde.

Flat down I fell, and with all reverence
Ador'd her, perceiving now that she, 170
A goddess sent by godly providence
In earthly shape thus showed herself to me,
To wail and rue this world's uncertainty:
And while I honoured thus her godhead's might With plaining voice these words to me she shright:<sup>24</sup> 175

<sup>18</sup> Gloom.

<sup>19</sup> Some connect stike with stick (Gr. stikos) a verse, and suppose the speaker to mean that he has barely completed his speech (which fills a stike, or stanza) when "the storm" etc. Others connecting stike with the Scotch steigh, take it to mean a sigh, and think that the reference is to the word sigh in the preceding line.

"I shall thee guide first to the grisly lake,
And thence unto the blissful place of rest,
Where thou shalt see and hear the plaint they make,
That whilom here bare swinge<sup>25</sup> among the best.

This shalt thou see, but great is the unrest 180
That thou must bide, before thou canst attain Unto the dreadful place where these remain."

And with these words as I upraised stood,
And gan to follow her that straight forth paced,
Ere I was ware, into a desert wood 185
We now were come: where hand in hand embraced,

She led the way and through the thicke<sup>26</sup> so traced,

As but I had been guided by her might,
It was no way for any mortal wight.

But lo, while thus amid the desert dark, 190
We pass'd on with steps and pace unmeet:
A rumbling roar, confused with howl and bark
Of dogs, shook all the ground under our feet,
And struck the din within our ears so deep
As, half distraught, unto the ground I fell, 195
Besought return, and not to visit hell.

But she, forthwith, uplifting me apace,
Removed my dread, and with a steadfast mind
Bade me come on, for here was now the place,
The place where we our travail's end should find. 200

Wherewith I arose, and to the place assigned Astoynde<sup>27</sup> I stalk, when straight we approach'd near

The dreadful place, that you will dread to hear.

An hideous hole all vast, withouten shape,
Of endless depth, o'erwhelmed with ragged stone, 205

With ugly mouth, and grisly jaws doth gape,
And to our sight confounds itself in one.
Here entered we, and yeding<sup>28</sup> forth, anone
An horrible loathly lake we might discern
As black as pitch, that clep'd<sup>29</sup> is Averno. 210

A deadly gulf where nought but rubbish grows,
With foul black swelth in thickened lumpes<sup>30</sup> lies,

Which up in the air such stinking vapours throws,

That over there may fly no fowl but dies,
Choked with the pestilent savours that arise. 215
Hither we came, whence forth we still did pace,
In dreadful fear amid the dreadful place.

And first within the porch and jaws of hell,
Sat deep Remorse of Conscience, all besprent
With tears: and to her self oft would she tell 220
Her wretchedness, and cursing, never stent<sup>31</sup>
To sob and sigh: but ever thus lament,
With thoughtful care, as she that, all in vain,
Would wear and waste continually in pain.

Her eyes unsteadfast, rolling here and there, 225
Whirled on each place, as place that vengeance brought,

So was her mind continually in fear,
Tossed and tormented with the tedious thought
Of those detested crimes which she had wrought:

With dreadful cheer, and looks thrown to the sky, 230

Wishing for death, and yet she could not die.

Next saw we Dread, all trembling how he shook,
With foot uncertain proffered here and there:
Bumbed of speech, and with a ghastly look
Searched every place, all pale and dead for fear,
His cap borne up with starting of his heare,<sup>32</sup>
'Stoin'd<sup>33</sup> and amazed at his own shade for dread, 237

And fearing greater dangers than was need.

And next, within the entry of this lake,
Sat fell Revenge, gnashing her teeth for ire, 240
Devising means how she may vengeance take,
Never in rest till she have her desire:
But frets within so far forth<sup>34</sup> with the fire
Of wreaking flames, that now determines she
To die by death, or 'venged by death to be. 245

When fell Revenge, with bloody foul pretence
Had shewed herself, as next in order set,
With trembling limbs we softly parted thence,
Till in our eyes another sight we met:
When fro my heart a sigh forthwith I fet,<sup>35</sup> 250
Rueing, alas, upon the woful plight
Of Misery, that next appeared in sight.

His face was lean, and somedea<sup>36</sup> pined away,
And eke his hands consumed to the bone,
But what his body was I cannot say, 255
For on his carcass raiment had he none,
Save cloutes and patches pieced one by one.
With staff in hand, and scrip on shoulders cast,
His chief defence against the winter's blast.

His food, for most, was wild fruits of the tree,
Unless sometimes some crumbs fell to his share,
Which in his wallet long, God wot, kept he, 262
As on the which full daintly would he fare.
His drink the running stream: his cup the bare
Of his palm closed: his bed the hard cold
ground: 265

To this poor life was Misery ybound.

Whose wretched state when we had well beheld,
With tender ruth on him and on his fears,
In thoughtful cares forth then our pace we held;

And by and by another shape appears, 270
Of greedy Care, still brushing up the breres,<sup>37</sup>
His knuckles knob'd, his flesh deep dented in,
With tawed hands, and hard ytannéd skin.

<sup>37</sup> Cutting or trimming the briars. Care is always busy trimming the roughest, most thankless growths; his tawed (hardened) hands are the horny, battered hands of the laborer.

The morrow gray no sooner had begun
To spread his light, even peeping in our eyes, 275
When he is up and to his work yrun:
But let the night's black misty mantles rise,
And with the foul dark never so much disguise
The fair bright day, yet ceaseh he no while,
But hath his candles to prolong his toil. 280

By him lay heavy Sleep, the cousin of Death,
Flat on the ground, and still as any stone,
A very corpse, save yielding forth a breath.
Small keep took he whom Fortune frowned on,
Or whom she lifted up into the throne 285
Of high renown, but as a living death,
So dead alive, of life he drew the breath.

The body's rest, the quiet of the heart,
The travail's ease, the still night's fere<sup>38</sup> was he,
And of our life in earth the better part; 290
Reaver of sight, and yet in whom we see Things oft that tide,<sup>39</sup> and oft that never be.
Without respect, esteeming equally
King Cæsus' pomp, and Irus' poverty.

And, next in order, sad Old Age we found, 295
His beard all hoar, his eyes hollow and blind,
With drooping cheer still poring on the ground,
As on the place where nature him assigned
To rest, when that the Sisters had untwined
His vital thread, and ended with their knife 300
The fleeting course of fast declining life.

There heard we him with broken and hollow
plaint
Rue with himself his end approaching fast,
And all for naught his wretched mind torment
With sweet remembrance of his pleasures past,
And fresh delights of lusty youth forwaste; 306
Recounting which, how would he sob and shriek
And to be young again of Jove beseeke.

But, and the cruel fates so fixed be,
That time forpast can not return again, 310
This one request of Jove yet prayed he:
That in such withered plight and wretched pain
As eld (accompanied with his loathsome train)
Had brought on him, all were it woe and grief,
He might a while yet linger forth his lief, 315

And not so soon descend into the pit,
Where death, when he the mortal corpse hath slain,

With reckless hand in grave doth cover it;
Thereafter never to enjoy again
The gladsome light, but in the ground ylain, 320
In depth of darkness waste and wear to nought,
As he had never into the world been brought.

But who had seen him sobbing, how he stood
Unto himself, and how he would bemoan
His youth forpast, as though it wrought him good 325

To talk of youth, all were his youth foregone,
He would have mused and marvelled much whereon

This wretched Age should life desire so fain,
And knows full well life does but length his pain.

<sup>40</sup> Life.

Crook backt he was, toothshaken, and blear eyed, 330
Went on three feet, and sometimes crept on fower<sup>41</sup>

With old lame bones that rattled by his side,
His scalp all pilde,<sup>42</sup> and he with eld forlore:
His withered fist still knocking at Death's door, Fumbling and drivelling as he draws his breath, 335

For brief, the shape and messenger of Death.

And fast by him pale Malady was placed,
Sore sick in bed, her colour all forgone,
Bereft of stomach, savour, and of taste, 339
Ne could she brook no meat, but broth alone:
Her breath corrupt, her keepers every one
Abhorring her, her sickness past recure,<sup>43</sup>
Detesting physick, and all physick's cure.

But oh! the doleful sight that then we see;
We turned our look and on the other side 345
A grisly shape of Famine might we see,
With greedy looks, and gaping mouth, that cried

And roar'd for meat, as she should there have died;

Her body thin and bare as any bone,
Whereto was left nought but the case alone. 350

And, that, alas, was gnawen on every where,
All full of holes, that I ne might refrain
From tears, to see how she her arms could tear,
And with her teeth gnash on the bones in vain:

When all for nought she fain would all sustain
Her starven corpse, that rather seemed a shade, 356

Than any substance of a creature made.

Great was her force, whom stone wall could not stay,

Her tearing nails scratching at all she saw;
With gaping jaws that by no means ymay 360

Be satisfied from hunger of her maw,
But eats herself as she that hath no law:

Gnawing, alas, her carcass all in vain,
Where you may count each sinew, bone, and vein.

On her while we thus firmly fixed our eyes, 365
That bled for ruth of such a dreary sight,

Lo, suddenly, she shrieked in so huge wise
As made hell gates to shiver with the might.

Wherewith, a dart we saw, how it did light
Right on her breast, and therewithal pale Death

Enthrilling<sup>44</sup> it, to reave<sup>45</sup> her of her breath. 371

And, by and by, a dumb dead corpse we saw,
Heavy and cold, the shape of Death aright,

That daunts all earthly creatures to his law;
Against whose force in vain it is to fight: 375

Ne peers, ne princes, nor no mortal wight,
Ne towns, ne realms, cities, ne strongest tower,

But all perforce must yield unto his power.

His dart anon out of the corpse he took,
And in his hand (a dreadful sight to see) 380
With great triumph eftsoons<sup>46</sup> the same he shook,

That most of all my fears affrayed me:
His body dight with nought but bones, pardé,
The naked shape of man there saw I plain,
All save the flesh, the sinew, and the vein. 385

Lastly stood War in glittering arms yclad,
With visage grim, stern looks, and blackly hued;

In his right hand a naked sword he had,
That to the hilts was all with blood embrued;

And in his left (that kings and kingdoms rued)
Famine and fire he held, and therewithal 391

He razed towns, and threw down towers and all.

Cities he sacked, and realms (that whilom flowered

In honour, glory, and rule above the best) 394
He overwhelmed, and all their fame devoured,

Consumed, destroyed, wasted, and never ceased,
Till he their wealth, their name, and all oppressed:

His face forehewed<sup>47</sup> with wounds, and by his side

There hung his targe with gashes deep and wide.

In midst of which, depainted there, we found
Deadly Debate, all full of snaky hair, 401

That with a bloody fillet was ybound,
Out breathing nought but discord everywhere:

And round about were portrayed here and there
The hugie hosts, Darius and his power, 405

His kings, princes, his peers, and all his flower;

Whom great Macedo vanquished there in fight,
With deep slaughtér, dispoiling all his pride,

Pierc'd through his realms, and daunted all his might.

Duke Hannibal beheld I there beside, 410
In Canna's field, victor how he did ride,

And woeful Romans that in vain withstood,
And Consul Paulus covered all with blood.

Yet saw I more, the fight at Trasimene,
And Treby field, and eke when Hannibal 415

And worthy Scipio last in arms were seen
Before Carthago gate, to try for all

The world's empire, to whom it should befall.
There saw I Pompey and Caesar clad in arms

Their hosts allied, and all their civil harms:<sup>48</sup>

With conquerors' hands forbathed in their own blood, 421

And Caesar weeping over Pompey's head.
Yet saw I Scilla and Marius where they stood,

Their great cruelty, and the deep bloodshed
Of friends: Cyrus I saw and his host dead, 425

And how the queen with great despight hath flung
His head in blood of them she overcome.

Xerxes, the Persian king, yet saw I there,
 With his huge host that drank the rivers dry,
 Dismounted hills and made the vales uprear,<sup>430</sup>
 His host and all yet saw I slain, pardé.
 Thebès I saw all razed how it did lie
 In heaps of stones, and Tyrus put to spoil,
 With walls and towers flat evened with the soil.

But Troy, alas (me thought) above them all, <sup>435</sup>
 It made mine eyes in very tears consume,
 When I beheld the woeful wierd<sup>49</sup> befall,
 That by the wrathful will of gods was come:
 And Jove's unmoved sentence and foredome<sup>50</sup>
 On Priam king, and on his town so bent, <sup>440</sup>
 I could not lin,<sup>51</sup> but I must there lament.

And that the more, sith Destiny was so stern
 As, force perforce, there might no force avail
 But she must fall: and, by her fall, we learn That cities, towers, wealth, world, and all shall quail;<sup>52</sup> <sup>445</sup>
 No manhood, might, nor nothing might prevail,
 All were there prest,<sup>53</sup> full many a prince and peer;
 And many a knight that sold his death full dear.

Not worthy Hector, worthiest of them all,
 Her hope, her joy; his force is now for nought.
 O Troy, Troy, Troy, there is no boot but bale;
 The hугy horse within thy walls is brought: <sup>452</sup>
 Thy turrets fall, thy knights that whilom
 fought
 In arms amid the field, are slain in bed;
 Thy gods defiled, and all thy honour dead. <sup>455</sup>

The flames upspring, and cruelly they creep
 From wall to roof, till all to cinders waste:
 Some fire the houses where the wretches sleep,
 Some rush in here, some run in there as fast;
 In every where or sword or fire they taste. <sup>460</sup>
 The walls are torn, the towers whirled to the
 ground;
 There is no mischief but may there be found.

Cassandra saw I yet there how they haled
 From Pallas' house with spercle<sup>54</sup> tress undone.
 Her wrists forboun<sup>d</sup>, and with Greeks' rout
 empaled: <sup>465</sup>
 And Priam eke, in vain how he did run
 To arms, when Pyrrhus with despite hath done
 To cruel death, and bathed him in the baigne<sup>55</sup>
 Of his son's blood, before the altar slain.

But how can I describe the doleful sight, <sup>470</sup>
 That in the shield so lifelike fair did shine!
 Sith in this world, I think was never wight
 Could have set forth the half, nor half so fine.
 I can no more but tell how there is seen
 Fair Ilium fall in burning red gledes<sup>56</sup> down, <sup>475</sup>
 And, from the soil, great Troy, Neptunus'
 town.

Herefrom when scarce I could mine eyes withdraw,
 That filled with tears as doth the springing well,
 We passèd on so far forth till we saw
 Rude Acheron, a loathsome lake to tell, <sup>480</sup>
 That boils and bubs up swelth<sup>57</sup> as black as hell,
 Where grisly Charon at their fixèd tide
 Still ferries ghosts unto the farther side.

The aged god no sooner Sorrow spied,
 But hasting straight unto the bank apace, <sup>485</sup>
 With hollow call unto the rout he cried
 To swerve apart and give the goddess place.
 Straight it was done, when to the shore we pace,
 Where hand in hand as we then linkèd fast,
 Within the boat we are together plaste.<sup>58</sup> <sup>490</sup>

And forth we launch full freighted to the brink,
 When, with the unwonted weight, the rusty keel
 Began to crack as if the same should sink.
 We hoist up mast and sail, that in a while We fetchèd the shore, where scarcely we had while <sup>495</sup>
 For to arrive, but that we heard anone
 A three-sound bark confounded all in one.

We had not long forth past, but that we saw
 Black Cerberus, the hideous hound of hell,
 With bristles reared, and with a three-mouthed jaw, <sup>500</sup>
 Forein<sup>n</sup>ning the air with his horrible yell.
 Out of the deep dark cave where he did dwell,
 The goddess straight he knew, and by and by,
 He peaste<sup>59</sup> and couched while that we passèd
 by.

Thence came we to the horror and the hell, <sup>505</sup>
 The large great kingdoms and the dreadful reign
 Of Pluto in his throne where he did dwell,
 The wide waste places, and the hугy plain:
 The wailings, shrieks, and sundry sorts of pain,
 The sighs, the sobs, the deep and deadly groan.
 Earth, air, and all, resounding plaint and moan. <sup>511</sup>

Here pulèd the babes, and here the maids unwed
 With folded hands their sorry chance bewailed;
 Here wept the guiltless slain, and lovers dead,
 That slew themselves when nothing else
 availèd; <sup>515</sup>
 A thousand sorts of sorrows here that wailed
 With sighs and tears, sobs, shrieks, and all yfere,<sup>60</sup>
 That (oh, alas!) it was a hell to hear.

We stayèd us straight, and with a rueful fear
 Beheld this heavy sight, while from mine eyes
 The vapored tears downstilled<sup>61</sup> here and there, <sup>521</sup>

And Sorrow eke in far more woeful wise,
Took on with plaint, upheaving to the skies
Her wretched hands, that with her cry the rout
Can all in heaps to swarm us round about. 525

"Lo here," said Sorrow, "princes of renown,
That whilom sat on top of Fortune's wheel
Now laid full low; like wretches whirled down Even with one frown that stayed but with a smile: 529

And now behold the thing that thou erewhile
Saw only in thought, and what thou now shalt hear

Recount the same to Kesar, King, and Peer."

Then first came Henry, Duke of Buckingham,
His cloak of black all pilled<sup>62</sup> and quite forworn, Wringing his hands, and Fortune oft doth blame, 535

Which of a duke hath made him now her scorn,
With ghastly looks, as one in manner lorn,
Of spread his arms, stretched hands he joins as fast

With rueful cheer, and vapored eyes upcast.

His cloak he rent, his manly breast he beat, 540
His hair all torn about the place it lay,
My heart so molt<sup>63</sup> to see his grief so great
As feelingly, me thought, it dropped away:
His eyes they whirled about withouten stay,
With stormy sighs the place did so complain
As if his heart at each had burst in twain. 546

Thrice he began to tell his doleful tale.
And thrice the sighs did swallow up his voice,
At each of which he shrieked so withal,
As through the heavens rived with the noise;
Till at the last recovering his voice, 551
Supping the tears that all his breast berained,<sup>64</sup>
On cruel Fortune weeping thus he plained.

SELECTION

From The Chronicles of Sir John Froissart,
1360-c. 1390

(Berners's translation, 1524-5)

To the intent that the honourable and noble adventures of feats of arms, done and achieved by the wars of France and England, should notably be enregistered and put in perpetual memory, whereby the prewe<sup>2</sup> and hardy may have ensample to encourage them in their well doing, I, Sir John Froissart, will treat and record an history of great louage<sup>3</sup> and praise.

But, or<sup>4</sup> I begin, I require the Saviour of all the 5 world, who of nothing created all things, that he will give me such grace and understanding, that I may continue and persevere in such wise, that whoso this process readeth or heareth may take pastance,<sup>5</sup> pleasure and ensample. It is 10 said of truth that all buildings are masoned and wrought of divers stones, and all great rivers are gurged<sup>6</sup> and assembled of divers surges and springs of water; in likewise all sciences are extraught<sup>7</sup> and compiled of divers clerks; of 15 that one writeth, another peradventure is ignorant; but by the famous writing of ancient authors all things ben known in one place or other. Then to attain to the matter that I have enterprised, I will begin first by the grace of 20 God and of the blessed Virgin our Lady Saint Mary, from whom all comfort and consolation proceedeth, and will take my foundation out of the true chronicles sometime compiled by the right reverend, discret and sage master John 25 le Bel,<sup>8</sup> sometime canon in Saint Lambert's of Liege, who with good heart and due diligence did his true devoir<sup>9</sup> in writing this noble chronicle, and did continue it all his life's days, in following the truth as near as he might, to 30 his great charge and cost in seeking to have the perfect knowledge thereof. He was also in his life's days well beloved and of the secret council with the lord Sir John of Hainault, who is often remembered, as reason requireth, here-35 after in this book, for of many fair and noble adventures he was chief causer, and by whose means the said Sir John le Bel might well know and hear of many divers and noble deeds, the which hereafter shall be declared. Truth it is 40 that I, who have enterprised this book to ordain for pleasure and pastance, to the which always I have been inclined, and for that intent I have followed and frequented the company of divers noble and great lords, as well in France, Eng-45 land, and Scotland, as in divers other countries, and have had knowledge by them, and always to my power justly have enquired for the truth of the deeds of war and adventures that have fallen, and especially sith the great battle 50 of Poitiers,<sup>10</sup> whereas the noble king John of France was taken prisoner, as before that time
I was but of a young age or understanding.

He made his translation of Froissart (a notable work of Early Tudor prose) at the command of the King. Froissart was a contemporary of Chaucer, who enjoyed the patronage of Philippa, queen of Edward III. He wrote his Chronicles of the wars of his age in France, England, Scotland and Spain, between 1360 and 1390 in the French tongue.

Howbeit, I took on me, as soon as I came from school, to write and recite the said book, and bare the same compiled into England, and presented the volume thereof to my lady Philippa of Hainault,<sup>11</sup> noble Queen of England, who right amiably received it to my great profit and advancement. And it may be so that the same book is not as yet examined or corrected so justly as such a case requireth; for feats of arms dearly bought and achieved, the honour thereof ought to be given and truly divided to them that by prowess and hard travail have deserved it. Therefore to acquit me in that behalf, and in following the truth as near as I can, I, John Froissart, have entered this history on the foresaid ordinance and true foundation, at the instance and request of a true lord of mine, Robert of Namur, Knight, lord of Beaufort, to whom entirely I owe love and obeisance, and God grant me to do that thing that may be to his pleasure. Amen.

OF THE BATTLE OF CRESSY<sup>1</sup>

Between the king of England and the French king

The Englishmen, who were in three battles lying on the ground to rest them, as soon as they saw the Frenchmen approach, they rose upon their feet fair and easily without any haste and arranged their battles.<sup>2</sup> The first, which was the prince's battle, the archers there stood in the manner of a herse<sup>3</sup> and the men of arms in the bottom of the battle. The earl of Northampton and the earl of Arundel with the second battle were on a wing in good order, ready to comfort the prince's battle, if need were.

The lords and knights of France came not to the assembly together in good order, for some came before and some came after in such haste and evil order, that one of them did trouble another. When the French King saw the Englishmen, his blood changed, and said to his marshals: "Make the Genoways<sup>4</sup> go on before and begin the battle in the name of God and Saint Denis." There were of the Genoways cross-bows about a fifteen-thousand, but they were so weary of going afoot that day a six leagues armed with their cross-bows, that they said to their constables: "We be not well ordered to fight this day, for we be not in the case to do any great deed of arms: we have more need of rest." These words came to the earl of Alençon, who said: "A man is well at ease to be charged with such a sort of rascals, to be faint and fail now at most need." Also the same season there fell a great rain and aclipse<sup>5</sup> with a terrible thunder, and before the rain there came flying over both battles a great number of crows for fear of the tempest coming. Then anon the air began to wax clear, and the sun to shine fair and bright, the which was right in the Frenchmen's eyen, and on the Englishmen's backs. When the Genoways were assembled together and began to approach, they made a great leap and cry to abash the Englishmen, but they stood still and stirred not for all that; then the Genoways again the second time made another leap and a fell cry, and stept forward a little, and the Englishmen removed not one foot: thirdly, again they leapt and cried, and went forth till they came within shot; then they shot fiercely with their cross-bows. Then the English archers stept forth one pace and let fly their arrows so wholly [together] and so thick, that it seemed snow. When the Genoways felt the arrows piercing through heads, arms and breasts, many of them cast down their cross-bows and did cut their strings and returned discomfited. When the French king saw them fly away, he said: "Slay these rascals, for they shall let<sup>6</sup> and trouble us without reason." Then ye should have seen the men of arms dash in among them and killed a great number of them: and ever still the Englishmen shot whereas they saw thickest press; the sharp arrows ran into the men of arms and into their horses, and many fell, horse and men, among the Genoways, and when they were down, they could not relieve<sup>7</sup> again, the press was so thick that one overthrew another. And also among the Englishmen there were certain rascals that went afoot with great knives, and they went in among the men of arms, and slew and murdered many as they lay on the ground, both earls, barons, knights, and squires, whereof the king of England was after displeased, for he had rather they had been taken prisoners.

The valiant king of Bohemia called Charles of Luxembourg, for all that he was nigh blind, when he understood the order of the battle, he said to them about him: "Where is the lord Charles my son?" His men said: "Sir, we cannot tell; we think he be fighting." Then he said: "Sirs, ye are my men, my companions and friends in this journey: I require you bring me so far forward, that I may strike one stroke with my sword." They said they would do his commandment, and to the intent that they should not lose him in the press, they tied all their reins of their bridles each to other and set the king before to accomplish his desire, and so they went on their enemies. The lord Charles of Bohemia his son, who wrote himself king of Almaine and bare the arms, he came in good order to the battle; but when he saw that the matter went awry on their party, he departed, I cannot tell you which way. The king his father was so far forward that he strake a stroke with his sword, yea and more than four, and fought valiantly and so did his company; and they adventured themselves so forward, that they were there all slain, and the next day they were found in the place about the king, and all their horses tied each to 20 other.

The earl of Alençon came to the battle right ordinately and fought with the Englishmen, and the earl of Flanders also on his part. These two lords with their companies coasted<sup>8</sup> the English archers and came to the prince's battle, and there fought valiantly long. The French king would fain have come thither, when he saw their banners, but there was a great hedge of archers before him. The same 30 day the French king had given a great black courser to Sir John of Hainault, and he made the lord Thierry of Senzeille to ride on him and to bear his banner. The same horse took the bridle in his teeth and brought him through all the curroures<sup>9</sup> of the Englishmen, and as he would have returned again, he fell in a great dike and was sore hurt, and had been there dead, an his page had not been, who followed him through all the battles and saw where his 40 master lay in the dike, and had none other let but for his horse, for the Englishmen would not issue of their battle for taking of any prisoner. Then the page alighted and relieved his master: then he went not back again the 45 same way that they came, there was too many in his way.

This battle between Broye and Cressy this Saturday was right cruel and fell, and many a feat of arms done that came not to my knowledge. In the night divers knights and squires lost their masters, and sometime came on the Englishmen, who received them in such wise that they were ever nigh slain; for there was none taken to mercy nor to ransom, for so the 55 Englishmen were determined.

In the morning the day of the battle certain Frenchmen and Almaines perforce opened the archers of the prince's battle and came and fought with the men of arms hand to hand. Then the second battle of the Englishmen came to succor the prince's battle, the which was 5 time, for they had as then much ado; and they with the prince sent a messenger to the king, who was on a little windmill hill. Then the knight said to the king: "Sir, the earl of Warwick and the earl of Oxford, Sir Raynold Cobham and other, such as be about the prince your son, are fiercely fought withal and are sore handled; wherefore they desire you that you and your battle will come and aid them; for if the Frenchmen increase, as they 15 doubt they will, your son and they shall have much ado." Then the king said: "Is my son dead or hurt or on the earth felled?" "No sir," quoth the knight, "but he is hardly matched; wherefore he hath need of your aid." "Well," 20 said the king, "return to him and to them that sent you hither, and say to them that they send no more to me for any adventure that falleth, as long as my son is alive: and also say to them that they suffer him this day to win his spurs; for if God be pleased, I will this journey<sup>10</sup> be his and the honour thereof, and to them that be about him." Then the knight returned again to them and shewed the king's words, the which greatly encouraged them, and repointed<sup>11</sup> in that they had sent to the king as they did.

Sir Godfrey of Harcourt would gladly that the earl of Harcourt his brother might have been saved; for he heard say by them that saw his banner how that he was there in the field 35 on the French party; but Sir Godfrey could not come to him betimes, for he was slain or he could come at him, and so was also the earl of Aumale his nephew. In another place the earl of Alençon and the earl of Flanders fought valiantly, every lord under his own banner; but finally they could not resist against the puissance of the Englishmen, and so there they were also slain, and divers other knights and squires. Also the earl Louis of Blois, nephew to the French king, and the duke of Lorraine fought under their banners, but at last they were closed in among a company of Englishmen and Welshmen, and there were slain for all their prowess. Also there was slain the earl of 50 Auxerre, the earl of Saint-Pol and many other.

In the evening the French king, who had left about him no more than a three-score persons, one and other, whereof Sir John of Hainault was one, who had remounted once the king, for his horse was slain with an arrow, then he said to the king: "Sir, depart hence, for it is time; lose not yourself wilfully: if ye have loss at this time, ye shall recover it again another season." And so he took the king's horse by the bridle and led him away in a manner perforce. Then the king rode till he came to the castle of Broye. The gate was closed, because it was by that time dark: then the king called the captain, who came to the walls and said: "Who is that calleth there this time of night?" Then the king said: "Open your gate quickly, for this is the fortune of France." The captain knew then it was the king, and opened the gate and let down the bridge. Then the king entered, and he had with him but five barons, Sir John of Hainault, Sir Charles of Montmorency, the lord of Beaujeu, the lord d'Aubigny and the lord of Montsault. The king would not tarry there, but drank and departed thence about midnight, and so rode by such guides as knew the country till he came in the morning to Amiens, and there he rested.

This Saturday the Englishmen never departed from their battles for chasing of any man, but kept still their field, and ever defended themselves against all such as came to assail them. This battle ended about evensong time.

THE SPEECH OF JOHN BALL<sup>1</sup>

In the mean season while this treaty was, there fell in England great mischief and rebellion of moving of the common people, by which deed England was at a point to have been lost without recovery. There was never realm nor country in so great adventure as it was in that time, and all because of the ease and riches that the common people were of, which moved them to this rebellion, as sometime they did in France, the which did much hurt, for by such incidents the realm of France hath been greatly grieved.

It was a marvellous thing and of poor foundation that this mischief began in England, and to give ensample to all manner of people I will speak thereof as it was done, as I was informed, and of the incidents thereof. There was an usage in England, and yet is in divers countries, that the noblemen hath great franchise over the commons and keepeth them in servage, that is to say, their tenants ought by custom to labour the lord's lands, to gather and bring home their corns, and some to thresh and to fan, and by servage to make their hay and to hew their wood and bring it home. All these things they ought to do by servage, and there be more of these people in England than in any other realm. Thus the noblemen and prelates are served by them, and specially in the county of Kent, Essex, Sussex and Bedford. These unhappy people of these said countries began to stir, because they said they were kept in great servage, and in the beginning of the world, they said, there were no bondmen, wherefore they maintained that none ought to be bond, without he did treason to his lord, as Lucifer did to God; but they said they could have no such battle, for they were neither angels nor spirits, but men formed to the similitude of their lords, saying why should they then be kept so under like beasts; the which they said they would no longer suffer, for they would be all one, and if they laboured or did anything for their lords, they would have wages therefor as well as other. And of this imagination was a foolish priest in the country of Kent called John Ball, for the which foolish words he had been three times in the Bishop of Canterbury's prison: for this priest used oftentimes on the Sundays after mass, when the people were going out of the minster, to go into the cloister and preach, and made the people to assemble about him, and would say thus: "Ah, ye good people, the matters goeth not well to pass in England, nor shall not do until everything be common, and that there be no villains nor gentlemen, but that we may be all unied<sup>2</sup> together, and that the lords be no greater masters than we be. What have we deserved, or why should we be kept thus in servage? We be all come from one father and one mother, Adam and Eve: whereby can they say or shew that they be greater lords than we be, saving by that they cause us to win and labour for that they dispend. They are clothed in velvet and camlet<sup>3</sup> furred with grise, and we be vested with poor cloth: they have their wines, spices and good bread, and we have the drawing out of the chaff and drink water: they dwell in fair houses, and we have the pain and travail, rain and wind in the fields; and by that that cometh of our labours they keep and maintain their estates: we be called their bondmen, and without we do readily them service, we be beaten; and we have no sovereign to whom we may complain, nor that will hear us nor do us right. Let us go to the king, he is young, and shew him what servage we be in, and shew him how we will have it otherwise, or else we will provide us of some remedy; and if we go together, all manner of people that be now in any bondage will follow us to the intent to be made free; and when the king seeth us, we shall have some remedy, either by fairness, or otherwise." Thus John Ball said on Sundays, when the people issued out of the churches in the villages; wherefore many of the mean people loved him, and such as intended to no goodness said how he said truth; and so they would murmur one with another in the fields and in the ways as they went together, affirming how John Ball said truth.

THE BURIAL OF RICHARD II

It was not long after that true tidings ran through London, how Richard of Bordeaux<sup>1</sup> was dead; but how he died and by what means, I could not tell when I wrote this chronicle. But this King Richard dead was laid in a litter and set in a chare<sup>2</sup> covered with black baudkin,<sup>3</sup> and four horses all black in the chare, and two men in black leading the chare, and four knights all in black following. Thus the chare departed from the Tower of London and was brought along through London fair and softly, till they came into Cheapside, and whereas the chief assembly of London was, and there the chare rested the space of two hours. Thither came in and out more than twenty thousand persons men and women, to see him whereas he lay, his head on a black cushion, and his visage<sup>4</sup> open. Some had on him pity and some none, but said he had long deserved death. Now consider well, ye great lords, kings, dukes, earls, barons and prelates, and all men of great lineage and puissance; see and behold how the fortunes of this world are marvellous and turn diversely. This king Richard reigned king of England twenty two year in great prosperity, holding great estate and signory. There was never before any king of England that spent so much in his house as he did, by a hundred thousand florins every year; for I, Sir John Froissart, canon and treasurer of Chimay, knew it well, for I was in his court more than a quarter of a year together, and he made me good cheer, because that in my youth I was clerk and servant to the noble king Edward III, his grandfather, and with my lady Philippa of Hainault, queen of England his grandam; and when I departed from him, it was at Windsor, and at my departing the king sent me by a knight of his called Sir John Golofre a goblet of silver and gilt weighing two mark of silver, and within it a hundred nobles, by the which I am as yet the better, and shall be as long as I live; wherefore I am bound to pray to God for his soul, and with much sorrow I write of his death; but because I have continued this history, therefore I write thereof to follow it.

In my time I have seen two things: though they differ, yet they be true. I was in the city of Bordeaux and sitting at the table when king Richard was born, the which was on a Tuesday about ten of the clock. The same time there came thence I was, Sir Richard Pontchardon, marshal as then of Aquitaine, and he said to me: "Froissart, write and put in memory that as now my lady princess is brought abed with a fair son on this Twelfth day, that is the day of the three kings, and he is son to a king's son and shall be a king." This gentle knight said truth, for he was king of England twenty-two year; but when this knight said these words, he knew full little what should be his conclusion. And the same time that king Richard was born, his father the prince was in Galice,<sup>5</sup> the which king Don Peter had given him, and he was there to conquer the realm. Upon these things I have greatly imagined sith,<sup>6</sup> for the first year that I came into England into the service of queen Philippa, king Edward and the queen and all their children were as then at Berkhamstead, a manor of the prince of Wales beyond London. The king and the queen were come thither to take leave of their son the prince and princess, who were going into Aquitaine, and there I heard an ancient knight devise<sup>7</sup> among the ladies and said: "There is a book which is called le Brut, and it deviseth that the prince of Wales, eldest son to the king, nor the duke of Gloucester, should never be king of England, but the realm and crown should return to the house of Lancaster." There I, John Froissart, author of this chronicle, considering all these things, I say these two knights, Sir Richard Pontchardon and Sir Bartholomew of Burghersh, said both truth; for I saw, and so did all the world, Richard of Bordeaux twenty two year king of England, and after the crown returned to the house of Lancaster, and that was when King Henry was king, the which he had never been if Richard of Bordeaux had dealt amiably with him; for the Londoners made him king because they had pity on him and on his children.

THE PEOPLE ARE URGED TO CHOOSE RICHARD FOR THEIR KING

(From History of Richard III, written c. 1513)

When the Duke had said, and looked that the people whom he hoped that the Mayor had framed<sup>1</sup> before, should after this flattering proposition made, have cried King Richard,

King Richard, all was still and mute, and not one word answered thereunto. Wherewith the Duke was marvellously abashed, and taking the Mayor nearer to him, with other that were about him privy to that matter, said unto them softly; "What meaneth this, that the people be so still?" "Sir," quoth the Mayor, "parcase<sup>2</sup> they perceive you not well." "That shall we amend," quoth he, "if that will help." And by and by somewhat louder, he rehearsed them the same matter again in other order and other words, so well and ornately, and natheles so evidently and plain, with voice, gesture, and countenance so comely and convenient, that every man much marvelled that heard him, and thought that they never had in their lives heard so evil a tale so well told. But were it for wonder or fear, (or) that each looked that other should speak first; not one word more was there answered of all the people that stood before, but all were as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning<sup>3</sup> among them, by which they might seem to commune what was best to do. When the Mayor saw this, he with other partners of the Council, drew about the Duke, and said that the people had not been accustomed thus to be spoken unto but by the Recorder, which is the mouth of the city, and haply to him they will answer. With that the Recorder, called Thomas Fitz William, a sad<sup>4</sup> man and an honest, which was so new come into that office that he never had spoken to the people before, and loath he was with that matter to begin, notwithstanding being thereunto commanded by the Mayor, made a rehearsal to the commons of that the Duke had twice rehearsed them himself. But the Recorder so tempered his tale, that he showed everything as the Duke's words were, and no part his own. But all this made no change in the people, which, alway after one,<sup>5</sup> stood as they had been men amazed. Whereupon the Duke rowned<sup>6</sup> unto the Mayor and said: "This is a marvellous obstinate silence." And therewith he turned unto the people again with these words: "Dear friends, we come to move you to that thing which, peradventure we greatly needed not, but that the lords of this realm and the commons of other parties, might have sufficed, saving such love we bear you, and so much set by you, that we would not gladly do without you, that thing in which to be partners is your weal and honour, which, as to us seemeth, you see not or weigh not. Wherefore, we require you to give us an answer one way or other, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the realm be, to have this noble Prince, now Protector, to be your King." At these words the people began to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voice was neither loud nor distinct, but as it were the sound of a swarm of bees, till at the last at the nether end of the hall, a bushment<sup>7</sup> of the Duke's servants and one Nashfield, and others longing<sup>8</sup> to the Protector, with some prentices and lads that thrust into the hall among the press, began suddenly at men's backs to cry out as loud as their throats would give: King Richard, King Richard, and threw up their caps in token of joy. And they that stood before, cast back their heads marrelling thereat, but nothing they said. And when the Duke and the mayor saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose. And said it was a goodly cry and a joyful, to hear every man with one voice, and no man saying nay. "Wherefore friends," quoth the Duke, "since we perceive that it is your whole minds to have this nobleman for your King, whereof we shall make his Grace so effectual report, that we doubt not but it shall redound unto your great weal and commonality.<sup>9</sup> We therefore require you that tomorrow ye go with us, and we with you, unto his noble Grace, to make your humble request unto him in manner before remembered." And therefore with,<sup>10</sup> the lords came down, and the company dissolved and departed, the most part all sad, some with glad semblance that were not very merry, and some of those that came hither with the Duke, not able to dissemble their sorrow, were fain, at his back, to turn their face to the wall, while the dolour of their hearts burst out of their eyes.

UTOPIA AND EUROPE CONTRASTED

(From Utopia, 1516, Ralph Robinson's translation, second and revised ed. 1556)

Now<sup>1</sup> I have declared and described unto you, as truly as I could, the form and order of that Commonwealth, which verily in my judgment is not only the best, but also that which alone of good right may claim and take upon it the name of a common wealth, or public weal.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The speaker is a fictitious character, one Raphael Hythloday, whom More introduces in the early part of the narrative as a Portuguese scholar and explorer. Hythloday is supposed to have visited Utopia in the course of his travels, and he is represented as relating his impressions of the strange land to More. The greater part of More's book consists of Hythloday's narrative, and his reflections on the Utopian Commonwealth.

For in other places they speak still of the Commonwealth, but every man procureth his own private gain. Here, where nothing is private, the common affairs be earnestly looked upon. And truly on both parts they have good cause so to do as they do. For in other countries who knoweth not that he shall starve for hunger, unless he make some several<sup>3</sup> provision for himself, though the Commonwealth flourish never so much in riches? And therefore he is compelled, even of very necessity, to have regard to himself, rather than to the people, that is to say, to others. Contrarywise there, where all things be common to every man, it is not to be doubted that any man shall lack anything necessary for his private uses; so that the common store-houses and barns be sufficiently stored. For there nothing is distributed after a niggish sort,<sup>4</sup> neither is there any poor man or beggar. An though no man have anything, yet every man is rich. For what can be more rich than to live joyfully and merrily, without all grief and pensiveness: not caring for his own living, nor vexed or troubled with his wife's importunate complaints, nor dreading poverty to his son, nor sorrowing for his daughter's dowry? Yea, they take no care at all for the living and wealth of themselves and all theirs, of their wives, their children, their nephews, their children's children, and all the succession that ever shall follow in their posterity. And yet, besides this, there is no less provision for them that were once labourers, and be now weak and impotent, than for them that do now labour and take pain. Here now would I see if any man dare be so bold as to compare with this equity, the justice of other nations; among whom, I forsake God, if I can find any sign or token of equity and justice. For what justice is this, that a rich goldsmith, or an usurer, or, to be short, any of them which either do nothing at all, or else that which they do is such that it is not very necessary to the commonwealth, should have a pleasant and a wealthy living, either by idleness, or by unnecessary business; when the meantime poor labourers, carters, iron-smiths, carpenters, and plowmen, by so great and continual toil, as drawing and bearing beasts be scant able to sustain, and again so necessary toil, that without it no commonwealth were able to continue and endure one year, should yet get so hard and poor a living, and live so wretched and miserable a life, that the state and condition of the labouring beasts may seem much better and wealthier? For they be not put to so continual labour, nor their living is not much worse, yea to them much pleasanter, taking no thought in the mean season for the time to come. But these seely<sup>5</sup> poor wretches be presently tormented with barren and unfruitful labour. And the remembrance of their poor, indigent, and beggarly old age, killeth them up. For their daily wages is so little, that it will not suffice for the same day, much less it yieldeth any overplus, that may daily be laid up for the relief of old age. Is not this an unjust and unkind public weal, which giveth great fees and rewards to gentlemen, as they call them, and to goldsmiths, and to such other, which be either idle persons, or else only flatterers, and devisers of vain pleasures; and of the contrary part, maketh no gentle provision for poor plowmen, colliers, labourers, carters, iron-smiths, and carpenters; without whom no Commonwealth can continue? But after it hath abused the labourers of their lusty and flowering age, at the last, when they be oppressed with old age and sickness,—being needy, poor, and indigent of all things,—then forgetting their so many painful watchings, not remembering their so many and so great benefits, recompenseth and acquitteth<sup>7</sup> them most unkindly with miserable death. And yet, besides this, the rich men, not only by private fraud, but also by common laws, do every day pluck and snatch away from the poor some part of their daily living. So, whereas it seemed before unjust to recompense with unkindness their pains that have been beneficial to the public weal, now they have to this their wrong and unjust dealing (which is yet a much worse point) given the name of justice, yea, and that by force of a law. Therefore, when I consider and weigh in my mind all these Commonwealths, which nowadays anywhere do flourish, so God help me, I can perceive nothing but a certain conspiracy of rich men procuring their own commodities under the name and title of the Commonwealth. They invent and devise all means and crafts, first how to keep safely, without fear of losing, that they have unjustly gathered together, and next how to hire and abuse the work and labour of the poor for as little money as may be. These devices, when the rich men have decreed (them) to be kept and observed under colour of the commonalty,<sup>8</sup> that is to say, also of the poor people, then they be made laws. But these most wicked and vicious men, when they have by their unsatiable covetousness divided among themselves all those things, which would have sufficed all men, yet how far be they from the wealth and felicity of the Utopian Commonwealth? Out of the which, in that all the desire of money with the use thereof is utterly secluded and banished, how great a heap of cares is cut away! How great an occasion of wickedness and mischief is plucked up by the roots! For who knoweth not, that fraud, theft, rapine, brawling, quarrelling, brabbling,<sup>9</sup> strife, chiding, contention, murder, treason, poisoning, which by daily punishments are rather revenged than refrained, do die when money dieth? And also that fear, grief, care, labours, and watchings do perish even the very same moment that money perisheth? Yea, poverty itself, which only seemed to lack money, if money were gone, it also would decrease and vanish away. And that you may perceive this more plainly, consider with yourselves some barren and unfruitful year, wherein many thousands of people have starved for hunger: I dare be bold to say, that in the end of that penury so much corn or grain might have been found in the rich men's barns, if they had been searched, as being divided among them whom famine and pestilence then consumed, no man at all should have felt that plague and penury. So easily might men get their living, if that same worthy Princess, Lady Money, did not alone stop up the way between us and our living, which, a God's name,<sup>10</sup> was very excellently devised and invented, that by her the way thereto should be opened. I am sure the rich men perceive this, nor they be not too ignorant how much better it were to lack no necessary thing, than to abound with overmuch superfluity; to be rid out<sup>11</sup> of innumerable cares and troubles, than to be besieged and encumbered with great riches. And I doubt not that either the respect of every man's private commodity, or else the authority of our Saviour Christ (which for his great wisdom could not but know what were best, and for his inestimable goodness could not but counsel to that which he knew to be best) would have brought all the world long ago into the laws of this weal public, if it were not that one only beast, the princess and mother of all mischief, Pride, doth withstand and let<sup>12</sup> it. She measureth not wealth and prosperity by her own commodities, but by the miseries and incommodities of others; she would not by her good will be made a goddess, if there were no wretches left, over whom she might like a scornful lady rule and triumph; over whose miseries her felicities might shine; whose poverty she might vex, torment, and increase, by gorgeously setting forth her riches. This hell hound creepeth into men's hearts; and plucketh them back from entering the right path of life, and is so deeply rooted in men's breasts, that she cannot be plucked out.

This form and fashion of a weal public, which I would gladly wish unto all nations, I am glad yet that it hath chanced to the Utopians, which have followed those institutions of life, whereby they have laid such foundations of their Commonwealth, as shall continue and last not only wealthily, but also as far as man's wit may judge and conjecture, shall endure forever. For, seeing the chief causes of ambition and sedition with other vices be plucked up by the roots and abandoned at home, there can be no jeopardy of domestical dissension, which alone hath cast under foot and brought to nought the well-fortified and strongly defended wealth and riches of many cities. But forasmuch as perfect concord remaineth, and wholesome laws be executed at home, the envy of all foreign princes be not able to shake or move the Empire, though they have many times long ago gone about to do it, being evermore driven back.

Thus when Raphael<sup>13</sup> had made an end of his tale, though many things came to my mind, which in the manners and laws of that people seemed to be instituted and founded of no good reason, not only in the fashion of their chivalry, and in their sacrifices and religions, and in other of their laws, but also, yea, and chiefly, in that which is the principal foundation of all their ordinances, that is to say, in the community of their life and living, without any occupying<sup>14</sup> of money, by the which things only are nobility, magnificence, worship, honour, and majesty, the true ornaments and honours, as the common opinion is, of a Commonwealth, utterly be overthrown and destroyed: yet because I knew he was weary of talking, and was not sure whether he could abide that anything should be said against his mind, especially remembering that he had reprehended this fault in others, which be afraid lest they should seem not to be wise enough unless they could find some fault in other men's inventions; therefore I, praising both their institutions and his communication, took him by the hand, and led him in to supper; saying that we would choose another time to weigh and examine the same matters, and to talk with him more at large therein. Which would God it might once come to pass. In the mean time, as I cannot agree and consent to all things that he said,—being else without doubt a man singularly well learned, and also in all worldly matters exactly and profoundly experienced,—so must I needs confess and grant that many things be in the Utopian weal public, which in our cities I may rather wish for than hope after.

Thus endeth the afternoon's talk of Raphael Hythloday concerning the laws and institutions of the Island of Utopia.

THE EXECUTION OF SIR THOMAS MORE

(From Life of Sir Thomas More, first printed, 1626)

When Sir Thomas More came from Westminster to the Tower-ward<sup>1</sup> again, his daughter, my wife, desirous to see her father, whom she thought she would never see in this world after, and also to have his final blessing, gave attendance about the Tower Wharf, where she knew he should pass by, before he could enter into the Tower. Where tarrying his coming as soon as she saw him, after his blessing upon her knees reverently received, she, hasting towards him, without consideration or care of herself, pressing in amongst the midst of the throng and company of the guard, that with halberds and bills were round about him, hastily ran to him, and there openly in sight of them all embraced him and took him about the neck and kissed him. Who well liking her most natural and dear daughterly affection towards him, gave her his fatherly blessing, and many godly words of comfort besides. From whom after she was departed, she not satisfied with the former sight of her dear father, and like one that had forgotten herself, being all ravished with the entire love of her dear father, having respect neither to herself, nor to the press of people and multitude that were about him, suddenly turned back again, and ran to him as before, took him about the neck, and divers times kissed him most lovingly; and at last with a full heavy heart, was fain to depart from him; the beholding whereof was to many of them that were present thereat so lamentable that it made them for very sorrow thereof to weep and mourn.

So remained Sir Thomas More in the Tower, more than a seven-night after his judgment. From whence the day before he suffered, he sent his shirt of hair, not willing to have it

seen, to my wife, his dearly beloved daughter, and a letter written with a coal, contained in the aforesaid book of his works, plainly expressing the fervent desire he had to suffer on the morrow, in these words: "I cumber you, good Margaret, much, but would be sorry if it should be longer than tomorrow. For tomorrow is St. Thomas' even, and the Utas<sup>2</sup> of St. Peter, and therefore tomorrow I long to go to God, it were a day very meet and convenient for me. Dear Megg, I never liked your manner better towards me than when you kissed me last. For I like when daughterly love and dear charity hath no leisure to look to worldly courtesy." And so upon the next morrow, being Tuesday, St. Thomas his even, and the Utas of St. Peter, in the year of our Lord 1535, according as he in his letter the day before had wished, early in the morning came to him Sir Thomas Pope, his singular good friend, on message from the King and his Council, that he should before nine of the clock of the same morning suffer death; and that therefore he should forthwith prepare himself thereto. "Master Pope," saith he, "for your good tidings I heartily thank you. I have been always much bounden to the King's Highness for the benefits and honours that he hath still from time to time most bountifull heaped upon me, and yet more bounden am I to His Grace for putting me into this place, where I have had convenient time and space to have remembrance of my end. And so help me God, most of all, Master Pope, am I bounden to his Highness, that it pleaseth him so shortly to rid me out of the miseries of this wretched world, and therefore will I not fail earnestly to pray for his Grace, both here, and also in the world to come." "The King's pleasure is further," quoth Master Pope, "that at your execution you shall not use many words." "Master Pope" quoth he, "you do well to give me warning of his Grace's pleasure, for otherwise, at that time had I purposed somewhat to have spoken; but of no matter wherewith his Grace or any other should have had cause to be offended. Nevertheless, whatsoever I had intended I am ready obediently to conform myself to his Grace's commandment; and I beseech you, good Master Pope, to be a mean to his Highness, that my daughter Margaret may be at my burial." "The King is content already," quoth Master Pope, "that your wife, children, and other friends shall have liberty to be present thereat." "O how much beholden then," said Sir Thomas More, "am I unto his Grace, that unto my poor burial vouchsafeth

to have so gracious consideration!" Wherewithal Master Pope taking his leave of him, could not refrain from weeping. Which Sir Thomas More perceiving, comforted him in this wise, "Quiet yourself, good Master Pope, and be not discomforted, for I trust that we shall once in heaven see each other full merrily, where we shall be sure to live and love together, in joyful bliss eternally." Upon whose departure Sir Thomas More, as one that has been 10 invited to some solemn feast, changed himself into his best apparel. Which Master Lieutenant espying, advised him to put it off, saying, that he who should have it was but a javill.<sup>3</sup>
"What, Master Lieutenant?" quoth he, "shall 15
I account him a javill, that shall do me this day so singular a benefit? Nay, I assure you, were it cloth of gold, I should think it well bestowed on him, as St. Cyprian did, who gave his executioner thirty pieces of gold." And 20 albeit at length, through Master Lieutenant's importunate persuasion, he altered his apparel, yet, after the example of the holy martyr St.
Cyprian, did he, of that little money that was left him, send an angel<sup>4</sup> of gold to his execu- 25 tioner. And so was he brought by Master Lieutenant out of the Tower, and from thence led towards the place of execution. Where, going up the scaffold, which was so weak that it was ready to fall, he said merrily to the 30 Lieutenant, "I pray you, Master Lieutenant, see me safe up, and for my coming down let me shift for myself." And then desired he all the people thereabout to pray for him, and to bear witness with him, that he should now 35 there suffer death in and for the faith of the holy Catholic Church. Which done, he kneeled down, and, after his prayers said, turned to the executioner with a cheerful countenance, and said unto him, "Pluck up thy spirits, man, and 40 be not afraid to do thine office: my neck is very short, take heed, therefore, thou strike not awry for saving of thine honesty." So passed Sir Thomas More out of this world to God, upon the very same day which he most desired. 45
Soon after his death came intelligence thereof to the Emperor Charles.<sup>5</sup> Whereupon he sent for Sir Thomas Eliott, our English ambassador, and said to him, "My Lord ambassador, we understand that the King, your 50 master, hath put his faithful servant and grave wise counsellor, Sir Thomas More, to death."
Whereupon Sir Thomas Eliott answered that he understood nothing thereof. "Well," said the Emperor, "it is too true: and this will we 55 say, that had we been master of such a servant, of whose doings ourselves have had these many years no small experience, we would rather have lost the best city of our dominions, than have lost such a worthy Counsellor." Which matter was by the same Sir Thomas Eliott to myself, to my wife, to Mr. Clement and his wife, to Mr. John Heywood and his wife, and unto divers others his friends accordingly reported.

THE PLOWERS

(From a Sermon preached at St. Paul's, 18th January, 1548)

I told you in my first sermon, honourable audience, that I purposed to declare unto you two things. 'The one, what seed should be sown in God's field, in God's plough land.
And the other, who should be the sowers.
That is to say, what doctrine is to be taught in Christ's church and congregation, and what men should be the teachers and preachers of it. The first part I have told you in the three sermons past, in which I have assayed to set forth my plough, to prove what I could do.
And now I shall tell you who be the ploughers:
for God's word is a seed to be sown in God's field, that is, the faithful congregation, and the preacher is the sower. And it is in the gospel:
Exivit qui seminat seminare semen suum: "He that soweth, the husbandman, the ploughman, went forth to sow his seed." So that a preacher is resembled to a ploughman, as it is in another place: Nemo admota arato manu, et a tergo respiiciens, aptus est regno Dei. "No man that putteth his hand to the plough, and looketh back, is apt for the kingdom of God." That is to say, let no preacher be negligent in doing his office. . . . For preaching of the gospel is one of God's ploughworks, and the preacher is one of God's ploughmen. Ye may not be offended with my similitude, in that I compare preaching to the labour and work of ploughing, and the preacher to a ploughman. Ye may not be offended with this my similitude; for I have been slandered of some persons for such things. . . . A prelate is that man whatsoever he be, that hath a flock to be taught of him;
whosoever hath any spiritual charge in the faithful congregation, and whosoever he be that hath cure of souls. . . . And how few of them there be throughout this realm that give meat to their flock as they should do, the visitors can best tell. Too few, too few; the more is the pity, and never so few as now.

<sup>3</sup> A low worthless fellow, a scoundrel.

By this, then, it appeareth that a prelate, or any that hath cure of souls, must diligently and substantially work and labour. Therefore saith Paul to Timothy, Qui episcopatum desiderat, hic bonum opus desiderat: "He that desireth to have the office of a bishop, or a prelate, that man desireth a good work." Then if it be a good work, it is work: ye can make but a work of it. It is God's work, God's plough, and that plough God would have still going. Such then as loiter and live idly, are not good prelates, or ministers. . . . How many such prelates, how many such bishops, Lord, for thy mercy, are there now in England? And what shall we in this case do? shall we company with them? O Lord, for thy mercy! shall we not company with them? O Lord, whither shall we flee from them? But "cursed be he that doth the work of God negligently or guilefully." A sore word for them that are negligent in discharging their office, or have done it fraudulently; for that is the thing that maketh the people ill.

But true it must be that Christ saith, Multi sunt vocati, pauci vero electi: "Many are called, but few are chosen." . . . Now what shall we say of these rich citizens of London? What shall I say of them? Shall I call them proud men of London, malicious men of London, merciless men of London? No, no, I may not say so; they will be offended with me then. Yet must I speak. For is there not reigning in London as much pride, as much covetousness, as much cruelty, as much oppression, as much superstition, as was in Nebo?<sup>1</sup> Yes, I think, and much more too. Therefore I say, repent, O London; repent, repent. Thou hearest thy faults told thee, amend them, amend them. I think if Nebo had had the preaching that thou hast, they would have converted. And, you rulers and officers, be wise and circumspect, look to your charge, and see you do your duties; and rather be glad to amend your ill living than to be angry when you are warned or told of your fault. What ado was there made in London at a certain man, because he said (and indeed at that time on a just cause), "Burgesses!" quoth he, "nay, Butterflies." Lord, what ado there was for that word! And yet would God they were no worse than butterflies! Butterflies do but their nature: the butterfly is not covetous, is not greedy of other men's goods; is not full of envy and hatred, is not malicious, is not cruel, is not merciless. The butterfly glorieth not in her own deeds, nor preferreth the traditions of men before God's word; it committeth not idolatry, nor worshippeth false gods. But London cannot abide to be rebuked; such is the nature of man. If they be pricked, they will kick; if they be rubbed on the gall, they will wince; but yet they will not amend their faults, they will not be ill spoken of. But how shall I speak well of them? If you could be content to receive and follow the word of God, and favour good preachers, if you could bear to be told of your faults, if you could amend when you hear of them, if you would be glad to reform that is amiss; if I might see any such inclination in you, that leave to be merciless, and begin to be charitable, I would then hope well of you. But London was never so ill as it is now. In times past men were full of pity and compassion, but now there is no pity; for in London their brother shall die in the streets for cold, he shall lie sick at the door between stock and stock,<sup>2</sup> I cannot tell what to call it, and perish there for hunger; was there any more unmercifulness in Nebo? I think not. In times past, when any rich man died in London, they were wont to help the poor scholars of the university with exhibition. When any man died, they would bequeath great sums of money toward the relief of the poor. When I was a scholar in Cambridge myself, I heard very good report of London, and knew many that had relief of the rich men of London, but now I can hear no such good report, and yet I enquire of it, and hearken for it; but now charity is waxen cold, none helpeth the scholar, nor yet the poor. And in those days, what did they when they helped the scholars? Marry, they maintained and gave them livings that were very papists, and professed the pope's doctrine; and now that the knowledge of God's word is brought to light, and many earnestly study and labour to set it forth, now almost no man helpeth to maintain them.

Oh London, London! repent, repent; for I think God is more displeased with London than ever He was with the city of Nebo. Repent therefore, repent, London, and remember that the same God liveth now that punished Nebo, even the same God, and none other; and He will punish sin as well now as He did then: and He will punish the iniquity of London, as well as He did then of Nebo. Amend therefore. And ye that be prelates, look well to your office: for right prelating, is busy labouring, and not lording. Therefore preach and teach, and let your plough be doing. Ye lords, I say, that live like loiterers, look well to your office:

<sup>1</sup> A city on the east side of the Jordan, which was taken from the Israelites by the Moabites. Latimer says in a foregoing passage: "Among (the cities of Moab) there was one called Nebo, which was much reprov'd for idolatry, superstition, pride, avarice, cruelty, tyranny, and for hardness of heart; and for these sins was plagued of God and destroyed."

the plough is your office and charge. If you live idle and loiter, you do not your duty, you follow not your vocation: let your plough therefore be going, and not cease, that the ground may bring forth fruit.

But now methinketh I hear one say unto me: Wot ye what you say? Is it a work? Is it a labour? How then hath it happened that we have had so many hundred years so many unpreaching prelates, lording loiterers, and idle ministers? Ye would have me here to make answer, and to shew the cause thereof. Nay, this land is not for me to plough; it is too stony, too thorny, too hard for me to plough. They have so many things that make for them, many things to lay for themselves, that it is not for my weak team to plough them. They have to lay for themselves long customs, ceremonies and authority, placing in parliament, and many things more. And I fear me this land is not yet ripe to be ploughed: for, as the saying is, it lacketh weathering;<sup>3</sup> this gear lacketh weathering; at least way it is not for me to plough. For what shall I look for among thorns, but pricking and scratching? What among stones, but stumbling? What (I had almost said) among serpents, but stinging? But this much I dare say, that since lording and loitering hath come up, preaching hath come down, contrary to the apostles' times: for they preached and lorded not, and now they lord and preach not. For they that be lords will ill go to plough: it is no meet office for them; it is not seeming for their state. Thus came up lording loiterers: thus crept in unpreaching prelates; and so have they long continued. For how many unlearned prelates have we now at this day? And no marvel: for if the ploughmen that now be were made lords, they would clean give over ploughing; they would leave off their labour, and fall to lording outright, and let the plough stand: and then both ploughs not walking, nothing should be in the commonweal but hunger. For ever since the prelates were made lords and nobles, the plough standeth, there is no work done, the people starve. They hawk, they hunt, they card, they dice; they pastime in their prelaties with gallant gentlemen, with their dancing minions, and with their fresh companions, that ploughing is set aside: and by the lording and loitering, preaching and ploughing is clean gone. And thus if the ploughmen of the country were as negligent in their office as prelates be, we should not long live, for lack of sustenance. And as it is necessary for to have this ploughing for the sustentation of the body, so must we also have the other for the satisfaction of the soul, or else we cannot live long ghostly.<sup>4</sup> For as the body wasteth and consumeth away for lack of bodily meat, so doth the soul pine away for default of ghostly meat. But there be two kinds of inclosing, to let or hinder both these kinds of ploughing; the one is an inclosing to let or hinder the bodily ploughing, and the other to let or hinder the holiday-ploughing, the church ploughing. . . . And as diligently as the husbandman plougheth for the sustentation of the body, so diligently must the prelates and ministers labour for the feeding of the soul: both the ploughs must still be going, as most necessary for man. And wherefore are magistrates ordained, but that the tranquility of the commonweal may be confirmed, limiting both ploughs.

But now for the default of unpreaching prelates, methinks I could guess what might be said for excusing of them. They are so troubled with lordly living, they be so placed in palaces, couched in courts, ruffing in their rents,<sup>5</sup> dancing in their dominions, burdened with embassages, pampering of their paunches, like a monk that maketh his jubilee; munching in their mangers, and moiling in their gay manors and mansions, and so troubled with loitering in their lordships, that they cannot attend it. They are otherwise occupied, some in the king's matters, some are ambassadors, some of the privy council, some to furnish the court, some are Lords of the Parliament, some are presidents, and some comptrollers of mints. . . .

And now I would ask a strange question: who is the most diligent bishop and prelate in all England, that passeth all the rest in doing his office? I can tell, for I know him, who it is: I know him well. But now I think I see you listening and hearkening that I should name him. There is one that passeth all the other, and is the most diligent prelate and preacher in all England. And will ye know who it is? I will tell you: it is the Devil. He is the most diligent preacher of all other; he is never out of his diocese; he is never from his cure; ye shall never find him unoccupied; he is ever in his parish; he keepeth residence at all times; ye shall never find him out of the way, call for him when you will he is ever at home; the diligentest preacher in all the realm; he is ever at his plough: no lording nor loitering can hinder him; he is ever applying his business, ye shall never find him idle, I warrant you. . . .

Oh that our prelates would be as diligent to sow the corn of good doctrine, as Satan is to sow cockle and darnel! . . .

But in the meantime the prelates take their pleasures. They are lords, and no labourers, but the devil is diligent at his plough. He is no unpreaching prelate: he is no lordly loiterer from his cure,<sup>6</sup> but a busy ploughman; so that among all the prelates, and among all the pack of them that have cure, the devil shall go for my money,<sup>7</sup> for he still applieth his business. Therefore ye unpreaching prelates, learn of the devil: to be diligent in doing of your office, learn of the devil: and if you will not learn of God nor of good men for shame learn of the devil. Howbeit there is now very good hope that the king's majesty, being by the help of good governance of his most honourable counsellors, he is trained and brought up in learning, and knowledge of God's word, will shortly provide a remedy, and set an order herein; which thing that it may so be, let us pray for him. Pray for him, good people: pray for him. Ye have great cause and need to pray for him.

DESCRIPTION OF HIS FATHER

(From First Sermon preached before King Edward VIth, March 8th, 1549)

My Father was a yeoman, and had no lands of his own, only he had a farm of three or four pounds by year at the uttermost, and hereupon he tilled so much as kept half a dozen men. He had walk<sup>1</sup> for a hundred sheep; and my mother milked thirty kine. He was able and did find the king a harness, with himself and his horse, while he came to the place that he should receive the king's wages. I can remember that I buckled his harness when he went unto Blackheath field. He kept me to school, or else I had not been able to have preached before the king's majesty now. He married my sisters with five pounds, or twenty nobles apiece; so that he brought them up in godliness and fear of God. He kept hospitality for his poor neighbors, and some alms he gave to the poor. And all this did he of the said farm, where he that now hath it payeth sixteen pounds by year, or more, and is not able to do anything for his prince, for himself, nor for his children, or give a cup of drink to the poor.

ASCHAM EXPLAINS THE PURPOSE OF HIS BOOK

(From the Preface to The Schoolmaster, pub. 1570)

Yet some men, friendly enough of nature, but of small judgment in learning, do think I take too much pains and spend too much time in setting forth these children's affairs. But those good men were never brought up in Socrates' school, who saith plainly, that no man goeth about a more goodly purpose, than he that is mindful of the good bringing up both of his own and other men's children.

Therefore, I trust, good and wise men will think well of this my doing. And of other, that think otherwise, I will think myself, they are but men to be pardoned for their folly and pitied for their ignorance.

In writing this book, I have had earnest respect to three special points, truth of religion, honesty in living, right order in learning. In which three ways, I pray God, my poor children may diligently walk; for whose sake, as nature would and reason required and necessity also somewhat compelled, I was the willing to take these pains.

For, seeing at my death I am not like to leave them any great store of living, therefore in my lifetime I thought good to bequeath unto them in this little book, as in my Will and Testament, the right way to good learning: which if they follow with the fear of God, they shall very well come to sufficiency of living.

I wish also, with all my heart, that young Mr. Rob. Sackville<sup>1</sup> may take that fruit of this labour, that his worthy grandfather purposed he should have done; and if any other do take either profit or pleasure hereby, they have cause to thank Mr. Robert Sackville, for whom specially this my Schoolmaster was provided.

THE TRAINING OF CHILDREN

(From the same)

Yet, some will say, that children of nature<sup>1</sup> love pastime, and mislike learning: because, in their kind, the one is easy and pleasant, the other hard and wearisome, which is an opinion not so true as some men ween: for, the matter lieth not so much in the disposition of them that be young, as in the order and manner of bringing up, by them that be old, nor yet in the difference of learning and pastime. For, beat a child, if he dance not well, and cherish him though he learn not well, ye shall have him unwilling to go to dance, and glad to go to his book. Knock him always, when he draweth his shaft<sup>2</sup> ill, and favour him again, though he fault at his book, ye shall have him very loth to be in the field, and very willing to be in the school. Yea, I say more, and not of myself, but by the judgment of those, from whom few wise men will gladly dissent, that if ever the nature of man be given at any time, more than other, to receive goodness, it is in innocency of young years, before that experience of evil have taken root in him. For, the pure clean wit of a sweet young babe is like the newest wax, most able to receive the best and fairest printing: and like a new bright silver dish never occupied, to receive and keep clean any good thing that is put into it.

And thus, will in children, wisely wrought withal, may easily be won to be very well willing to learn. And wit in children, by nature, namely memory, the only key and keeper of all learning, is readiest to receive, and surest to keep any manner of thing, that is learned in youth: this, lewd<sup>3</sup> and learned, by common experience, know to be most true. For we remember nothing so well when we be old, as those things which we learned when we were young: and this is not strange, but common in all nature's works. Every man sees (as I said before) new wax is best for printing: new clay, fittest for working: new shorn wool, aptest for soon and surest dying: new fresh flesh, for good and durable salting. And this similitude is not rude, nor borrowed of the larder house, but out of his schoolhouse, of whom the wisest of England need not be ashamed to learn. Young grafts grow not only soonest, but also fairest, and bring always forth the best and sweetest fruit: young whelps learn easily to carry: young poppinjays learn quickly to speak: and so, to be short, if in all other things, though they lack reason, sense, and life, the similitude of youth is fittest to all goodness, surely nature, in mankind, is most beneficial and effectual in this behalf.

Therefore, if to the goodness of nature be joined the wisdom of the teacher, in leading young wits into a right and plain way of learning, surely, children, kept up in God's fear, and governed by His grace, may most easily be brought well to serve God and country both by virtue and wisdom.

But if will and wit, by farther age, be once

allured from innocency, delighted in vain sights, filled with foul talk, crooked with wilfulness, hardened with stubbornness, and let loose to disobedience, surely it is hard with gentleness, but impossible with severe cruelty, to call them back to good frame again. For, where the one perchance may bend it, the other, shall surely break it; and so instead of some hope, leave an assured desperation, and shameless contempt of all goodness, the farthest point in all mischief, as Xenophon doth most truly and most wittily mark.

Therefore, to love or to hate, to like or condemn, to ply this way or that way to good or to bad, ye shall have as ye use a child in his youth.

And one example, whether love or fear doth work more in a child, for virtue and learning, I will gladly report: which may be heard with some pleasure, and followed with more profit. Before I went into Germany, I came to Brodegate in Leicestershire, to take my leave of that noble Lady Jane Grey,<sup>4</sup> to whom I was exceedingly much beholden. Her parents, the Duke and Duchess, with all the household, Gentlemen and Gentlewomen, were hunting in the Park: I found her, in her chamber, reading Phædon Platonis<sup>5</sup> in Greek, and that with as much delight, as some gentlemen would read a merry tale in Boccace.<sup>6</sup> After salutation, and duty done, with some other talk, I asked her why she would lose such pastime in the Park? Smiling she answered me: I wisse,<sup>7</sup> all their sport in the Park is but a shadow to that pleasure, that I find in Plato: Alas good folk, they never felt what true pleasure meant. And how came you Madame, quoth I, to this deep knowledge of pleasure, and what did chiefly allure you unto it: seeing, not many women, but very few men have attained thereunto? I will tell you, quoth she, and tell you a truth, which perchance ye will marvel at. One of the greatest benefits, that ever God gave me, is that he sent me so sharp and severe parents, and so gentle a schoolmaster. For when I am in presence either of father or mother, whether I speak, keep silence, sit, stand, or go, eat, drink, be merry, or sad, be sewing, playing, dancing, or doing anything else, I must do it, as it were, in such weight, measure, and number, even so perfectly as God made the world, or else I am so sharply taunted, so cruelly threatened, yea presently sometimes with pinches, nips, and bobs, and other ways, which I will not name, for the honour I bear them, so without measure misordered, that I think myself in hell, till time come, that I must go to M. Elmer,<sup>8</sup> who teacheth me so gently, so pleasantly, with such fair allurements to learning, that I think all the time nothing, whiles I am with him. And when I am called from him, I fall on weeping, because, whatsoever I do else but learning, is full of grief, trouble, fear, and whole misliking unto me: and thus my book hath been so much my pleasure, and bringeth daily to me more pleasure and more, that in respect of it, all other pleasures, in very deed, be but trifles and troubles unto me. I remember this talk gladly, both because it is so worthy of memory, and because also, it was the last talk that ever I had, and the last time that ever I saw that noble and worthy Lady.

THE EVIL ENCHANTMENT OF ITALY

(From the same)

Sir Richard Sackville,<sup>1</sup> that worthy gentleman of worthy memory, as I said in the beginning, in the Queen's privy Chamber at Windsor, after he had talked with me for the right choice of a good wit in a child for learning, and of the true difference betwixt quick and hard wits, of alluring young children by gentleness to love learning, and of the special care that was to be had to keep young men from licentious living, he was most earnest with me to have me say my mind also, what I thought concerning the fancy that many young gentlemen of England have to travel abroad, and namely to lead a long life in Italy. His request, both for his authority and good will toward me, was a sufficient commandment unto me to satisfy his pleasure with uttering plainly my opinion in that matter. Sir, quoth I, I take going thither and living there, for a young gentleman, that doth not go under the keep and guard of such a man as both by wisdom can and authority dare rule him, to be marvelous dangerous. And why I said so then, I will declare at large now, which I said then privately and write now openly, not because I do condemn, either the knowledge of strange and diverse tongues, and namely the Italian tongue, which next the Greek and Latin tongue I like and love above all other: or else because I do despise the learning that is gotten, or the experience that is gathered in strange countries: or for any private malice that I bear to Italy: which country and in it namely Rome, I have always specially honoured: because time was, when Italy and Rome have been, to the great good of us that now live, the best breeders and bringers up of the worthiest men, not only for wise speaking but also for well doing, in all Civil affairs, that ever was in the world. But now, that the time is gone, and though the place remain, yet the old and present manners do differ as far, as black and white, as virtue and vice. Virtue once made that country mistress over all the world. Vice now maketh that country slave to them that before were glad to serve it. All men seeth it: they themselves confess it, namely such as be best and wisest amongst them. For sin, by lust and vanity, hath and doth breed up everywhere common contempt of God's word, private contention in many families, open factions in every city: and so, making themselves bond to vanity and vice at home, they are content to bear the yoke of serving strangers abroad. Italy now, is not that Italy that it was wont to be and therefore now not so fit a place, as some do count it, for young men to fetch either wisdom or honesty from thence. For surely they will make other but bad scholars, that be so ill masters to themselves. Yet, if a gentleman will needs travel into Italy, he shall do well to look on the life of the wisest traveller that ever travelled thither, set out by the wisest writer that ever spake with tongue, God's doctrine only excepted: and that is Ulysses in Homer. Ulysses and his travel I wish our travelers to look upon, not so much to fear them with the great dangers that he many times suffered, as to instruct them with his excellent wisdom which he always and everywhere used. Yea even those that be learned and witty travellers, when they be disposed to praise travelling, as a great commendation and the best Scripture they have for it, they gladly recite the third verse of Homer in his first book of Odyssey, containing a great praise of Ulysses for the wit he gathered and wisdom he used in travelling.

THE EXECUTION OF LADY JANE GREY<sup>1</sup>

(From Book of Martyrs, 1563)

When she first mounted the scaffold, she spake to the spectators in this manner: Good people, I am come hither to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. The fact against the queen's highness was unlawful, and the consenting thereunto by me: but, touching the procurement and desire thereof by me, or on my behalf, I do wash my hands thereof in innocency before God, and the face of you, good christian people, this day: and therewith she wrung her hands, wherein she had her book. Then she said, I pray you all, good christian people, to bear me witness that I die a good christian woman, and that I do look to be saved by no other means, but only by the mercy of God in the blood of his only Son Jesus Christ: and I confess, that when I did know the word of God, I neglected the same, loved myself and the world, and therefore this plague and punishment is happily and worthily<sup>15</sup> happened unto me for my sins: and yet I thank God, that of his goodness he hath thus given me a time and a respite to repent: and now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you assist me with your prayers. And then,<sup>20</sup> kneeling down, she turned to Feckenham,<sup>2</sup> saying, Shall I say this psalm? and he said, Yea. Then she said the Psalm of Miserere mei Deus,<sup>3</sup> in English, in a most devout manner throughout to the end; and then she stood up,<sup>25</sup> and gave to her maid, Mrs. Ellen, her gloves and handkerchief, and her book to Mr. Bruges; and then she untied her gown, and the executioner pressed upon her to help her off with it: but she, desiring him to let her alone, turned<sup>30</sup> toward her two gentlewomen, who helped her off therewith, and also with her frowes,<sup>4</sup> paste,<sup>5</sup> and neckerchief, giving to her a fair handkerchief to put about her eyes.

Then the executioner kneeled down, and<sup>35</sup> asked her forgiveness, whom she forgave most willingly. Then he desired her to stand upon the straw; which doing, she saw the block. Then she said, I pray you despatch me quickly. Then she kneeled down, saying, Will you take it<sup>40</sup> off before I lay me down? And the executioner said, No, madam. Then she tied the handkerchief about her eyes, and feeling for the block, she said, What shall I do? Where is it? Where is it? One of the standers-by guiding her<sup>45</sup> thereunto, she laid her head down upon the block, and then stretched forth her body, and said, Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit: and so finished her life, in the year of our Lord 1554, the 12th day of February, about<sup>50</sup> the seventeenth year of her age.

Thus died the Lady Jane: and on the same day the Lord Guildford,<sup>6</sup> her husband, one of the Duke of Northumberland's sons, was likewise beheaded, two innocents in comparison of them that sat upon them. For they were<sup>5</sup> both very young, and ignorantly accepted that which others had contrived, and by open proclamation consented to take from others, and give to them.

Touching the condemnation of this pious<sup>10</sup> lady, it is to be noted, that Judge Morgan<sup>7</sup> who gave sentence against her, soon after he had condemned her, fell mad, and in his raving cried out continually, to have the lady Jane taken away from him, and so he ended his life.

So pure and innocent, as that same lambe,
She was in life and every vertuous lore;
And by descent from royall lynage came 75
Of ancient kinges and queenes, that had of yore
Their scepters stretcht from east to western shore,
And all the world in their subiection held;
Till that infernall feend with foule uprore
Forwasted all their land, and them expeld;
Whom to avenge shee had this Knight from far compeld. 81

VI

Behind her farre away a Dwarf<sup>15</sup> did lag,
That lasie seemd, in being ever last,
Or wearied with bearing of her bag
Of needments at his backe. Thus as they past, 85
The day with cloudes was suddeine overcast,
And angry Iove an hideous storme of raine
Did poure into his lemans lap so fast,
That everie wight to shrowd it did constrain;
And this faire couple eke to shroud themselves were fain. 90

Romish church, which the Red Cross Knight, or Reformed England, must combat.

<sup>14</sup> Una, or Truth, which is one, in contrast to Duessa, Falsehood, or Doubtlesness. Una is also, in a more definite sense, Truth as embodied in the true Church.

<sup>15</sup> Supposed by some to represent Common sense, or Prudence.

VII

Enforst to seeke some covert nigh at hand,
A shadie grove<sup>16</sup> not farr away they spide,
That promist ayde the tempest to withstand;
Whose loftie trees, yelad with sommers pride,
Did spred so broad, that heavens light did hide. 95

Not perceable with power of any starr:
And all within were pathes and alleies wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farr:
Faire harbour that them seemes; so in they entred ar.

VIII

And fourth they passe, with pleasure forward led, 100
Ioying to heare the birdes sweete harmony,
Which, therein shrouded from the tempest
dred,
Seemed in their song to scorne the cruell sky.
Much can they praise the trees so straight and hy, 104
The sayling pine; the cedar proud and tall;
The vine-prop elme; the poplar never dry:
The builder oake, sole king of forrests all;
The aspine good for staves; the cypresse
funerall;

IX

The laurell, meed of mightie conquerours
And poets sage; the firre that weepeth still;
The willow, worne for forlorne paramours; 111
The eugh, obedient to the benders will;
The birch for shaftes; the sallow for the mill;<sup>17</sup>
The mirrhe sweete-bleeding in the bitter wound;
The warlike beech; the ash for nothing ill; 115
The fruitfull olive; and the platane round;
The carver holme;<sup>18</sup> the maple seeldom inward sound.

X

Led with delight, they thus beguile the way,
Untill the blustering storme is overblowne;
When, weening to returne whence they did stray, 120
They cannot finde that path, which first was showne
But wander too and fro in waies unknowne, Furthest from end then, when they nearest
weene,
That makes them doubt their wits be not their owne;
So many pathes, so many turnings scene, 125
That which of them to take, in diverse doubt they been.

XI

At last resolving forward still to fare,
Till that some end they finde, or in or out,
That path they take, that beaten seemd most
bare,
And like to lead the labyrinth about; 130

<sup>16</sup> The thick wood of Error, into which the heavenly light of the stars cannot penetrate.

<sup>17</sup> The wood of the sallow, or willow, made the best charcoal for the manufacture of Gunpowder; the bark of the willow is also used for tanning.

<sup>18</sup> Holly, which is especially fit for carving.

Which when by tract they hunted had throughout,
At length it brought them to a hollowe cave,
Amid the thickest woods. The Champion stout
Eftsoones dismounted from his courser brave,
And to the Dwarfes a while his needlesse spere
he gave. 135

XII

"Be well aware," quoth then that Ladie
milde,
"Least suddaine mischiefe ye too rash provoke:
The danger hid, the place unknowne and wilde,
Breedes dreadfull doubts: oft fire is without smoke,
And perill without show: therefore your stroke, 140
Sir Knight, withhold, till further tryall made."
"Ah, Ladie," sayd he, "shame were to revoke
The forward footing for an hidden shade:
Vertue gives her selfe light through darknesse for to wade."

XIII

"Yea, but," quoth she, "the perill of this place 145
I better wot then you: though nowe too late
To wish you backe returne with foule disgrace,
Yet wisdomes warnes, whilst foot is in the
gate,
To stay the steppe, ere forced to retrate.
This is the wandring wood, this Errours den,
A monster vile, whom God and man does hate: 151
Therefore I read<sup>19</sup> beware." "Fly, fly," quoth then
The fearful Dwarf; "This is no place for living men."

XIV

But, full of fire and greedy hardiment,
The youthfull Knight could not for ought be staide; 155
But forth unto the darksom hole he went,
And looked in: his glistring armor made
A litle glooming light, much like a shade;
By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,
Halfe like a serpent horribly displaide, 160
But th'other halfe did womans shape re-
taine,
Most lothsom, filthie, foule, and full of vile disdaine.

[The Red Cross Knight, assisted by Una, does battle with the dragon, Error. As the combat progresses, the hideous serpent-brood of Error, "deformed monsters, foul and black as ink," swarming about the Knight sorely encumber him. The poet thus compares them to a cloud of gnats.]

As gentle shepheard in sweete eventide, 244
 When ruddy Phebus gins to welke<sup>20</sup> in west,
 High on an hill, his flocke to vewen wide,
 Markes which doe byte their hasty supper

 A cloud of cumbrous gnattes doe him molest,
 All striving to infixe their feeble stinges,
 That from their noyance he no where can

 But with his clownish hands their tender

 He brusheth oft, and oft doth mar their mur-

Thus ill bestedd, and fearefull more of shame
 Then of the certeine perill he stood in,
 Halfe furious unto his foe he came, 255
 Resolved in minde all suddenly to win,
 Or soone to lose, before he once would lin;<sup>21</sup>
 And stroke at her with more then manly

His Lady seeing all that chaunst, from farre,
 Approcht in hast to greet his victorie; 290
 And saide, "Faire Knight, borne under happie starre,
 Who see your vanquisht foes before you lye;
 Well worthie be you of that armory,
 Wherein ye have great glory wonne this
 day,
 And proof'd your strength on a strong enimie;
 Your first adventure: Many such I pray, 296
 And henceforth ever wish that like succeed it

[Having re-mounted his steed, the Red-Cross Knight and Una at length meet in the forest an "aged sire" clad in black, having a gray beard and a sober aspect. The Knight, having saluted him, is conducted to a hermitage on the skirts of the forest, where the old man tells him in pleasing words about Saints and popes: so they pass the evening in discourse.]

 And cursed heven; and spake reprochful

 Of highest God, the Lord of life and light.

And forth he cald out of deepe darknes dredd
 Legions of sprights, the which, like litle flies,
 Fluttring about his ever-damned hedd,
 Awaite whereto their service he applies, 400
 To aide his friendes, or fray his enimies:
 Of those he chose out two, the falsest two,
 And fittest for to forge true-seeming lyes;
 The one of them he gave a message too,
 The other by him selfe staide other worke to

He, making speedy way through spersed ayre
 And through the world of waters wide and deepe,
 To Morpheus house doth hastily reparaire.
 Amid the bowels of the earth full steepe,
 And low, where dawning day doth never peepe, 410
 His dwelling is; there Tethys his wet bed
 Doth ever wash, and Cynthia still doth steepe
 In silver deaw his ever-drouping hed,
 Whiles sad Night over him her mantle black

 The other all with silver overcast;
 And wakeful dogges before them farre doe

 Watching to banish Care their enemy,
 Who oft is wont to trouble gentle Sleepe. 420
 By them the Sprite doth passe in quietly,
 And unto Morpheus comes, whom drowned

<sup>22</sup> Proserpina had both a creative and a destroying power. As the daughter of Demeter we think of her in the first, and as the wife of Pluto and queen of Erebus, in the second capacity. She is here called griesly, or terrible, because the poet has the dark and death-dealing side of her function in mind.

XLI

And, more to lulle him in his slumber soft,
 A trickling streame from high rock tumbling
 downe, 425
 And ever-drizling raine upon the loft,
 Mixt with a murmuring winde, much like the sowne
 Of swarming bees, did caste him in a sowne.
 No other noyse, nor peoples troublous cryes,
 As still are wont t' annoy the walled towne,
 Might there be heard; but carelesse Quiet
 lyes, 431
 Wrapt in eternall silence farre from enimes.

XLII

The messenger approaching to him spake;
 But his waste words retourn'd to him in vaine.
 So sound he slept, that nought mought him
 awake. 435
 Then rudely he him thrust, and pusht with
 paine,
 Whereat he gan to stretch: but he againe Shooke him so hard, that forced him to speake.
 As one then in a dreame, whose dryer braine
 Is tost with troubled sights and fancies
 weake, 440
 He mumbled soft, but would not all his silence breake.

XLIII

The Sprite then gan more boldly him to wake
 And threatend unto him the dreaded name
 Of Hecate;<sup>25</sup> whereat he gan to quake,
 And, lifting up his lompish head, with
 blame 445
 Halfe angrie asked him, for what he came.
 "Hether," quoth he, "me Archimago<sup>26</sup> sent,
 He that the stubborn sprites can wisely
 tame;
 He bids thee to him send for his intent
 A fit false dreame, that can delude the sleepers sent." 450

XLIV

The god obeyde; and, calling forth straight
 way
 A diverse dreame out of his prison darke,
 Delivered it to him, and downe did lay
 His heavie head, devoide of careful carke; Whose sences all were straight benumbd and starke. 455
 He, backe returning by the yvorie dore,
 Remounted up as light as chearefull larke;
 And on his litle winges the dreame he bore
 In hast unto his lord, where he him left afore.

XLV

Who all this while, with charmes and hidden artes, 460
 Had made a lady of that other spright,

<sup>25</sup> A powerful female divinity, supposed to have been introduced into the Greek from an earlier mythology. Like Demogorgon, she is associated with darkness and the nether world.

<sup>26</sup> Personifies Hypocrisy. His name indicates that he is the chief of those who assume various lying, or unusual shapes, in order to deceive.

And fram'd of liquid ayre her tender partes,
 So lively, and so like in all mens sight,
 That weaker sence it could have ravisht
 quight:

The maker selfe, for all his wondrous witt, 465
 Was nigh beguiled with so goodly sight.
 Her all in white he clad, and over it
 Cast a black stole, most like to seeme for Una fit.

XLVI

Now when that ydle Dreame was to him
 brought,
 Unto that Elfin Knight he bad him fly, 470
 Where he slept soundly, void of evil thought,
 And with false shewes abuse his fantasy,
 In sort as he him schooled privily.
 And that new creature, borne without her dew, <sup>27</sup>
 Full of the makers guyle, with usage sly, 475
 He taught to imitate that Lady trew,
 Whose semblance she did carrie under feigned hew.

[This phantom, in the outward semblance of Una, conducts herself with such lightness that the Knight is perplexed with doubts of her goodness and truthfulness. At last, restless and tormented by evil delusions conjured up by Archimago, the Knight mounts his steed and flies with the dwarf. Thus parted from Una, or Truth, by the wiles of the Enchanter, the deluded Knight falls into peril in a meeting with Duessa, or Falsehood.

Meanwhile the heavenly Una, his true bride, missing her Knight, sets out in search of him, alone and sorrowful. The poet then tells how the lion comes to guard her in her need.]

Nought is there under heav'ns wide hollow-
 nesse,
 That moves more cleare compassion of mind,
 Then<sup>28</sup> beautie brought t' unworthie wretch-ednesse
 Through envies snares, or fortunes freakes

 I, whether lately through her brightnes
 blynd, 5
 Or through alleageance and fast fealty,
 Which I do owe unto all woman kynd,
 Feele my hart perst with so great agony,
 When such I see, that all for pittie I could dy.

II

And now it is empassioned so deepe, 10
 For fairest Unaes sake, of whom I sing,
 That my fraile eyes these lines with teares do
 steepe,
 To thinke how she through guileful handeling,
<sup>27</sup> Made in an unnatural manner. <sup>28</sup> Than.

Though true as touch,<sup>29</sup> though daughter of a
king,
Though faire as ever living wight was fayre,
Though nor in word nor deede ill meriting, 16
Is from her Knight devorced in despayre,
And her dew loves deryv'd to that vile witches shayne.

III

Yet she, most faithfull ladie, all this while Forsaken, wofull, solitarie mayd, 20
Far from all peoples preace,<sup>30</sup> as in exile,
In wilderness and wastfull deserts strayd,
To seeke her Knight; who subtilly betrayd
Through that late vision, which th' enchanter wrought, 24
Had her abandoned. She of naught affrayd, Through woods and wastness wide him daily sought;
Yet wished tydings none of him unto her brought.

IV

One day, nigh wearie of the yrksome way,
From her unhastie beast she did alight; 29
And on the grasse her dainty limbs did lay
In secrete shadow, far from all mens sight;
From her fayre head her fillet she undight;
And layd her stole aside. Her angels face,
As the great eye of heaven, shyned bright,
And made a sunshine in the shady place; 35
Did never mortall eye behold such heavenly grace.

V

It fortun'd, out of the thickest wood
A ramping lyon rushed suddenly,
Hunting full greedy after salvage blood;
Soone as the royall Virgin he did spy, 40
With gaping mouth at her ran greedily,
To have attonce devoured her tender corse.
But to the pray when as he drew more ny,
His bloody rage aswaged with remorse,
And, with the sight amazd, forgat his furious
force. 45

VI

Instead thereof he kist her wearie feet,
And lickt her lilly hands with fawning tong;
As he her wronged innocence did weet.
O how can beautie maister the most strong,
And simple truth subdue avenging wrong! 50
Whose yielded pryde and proud submission,
Still dreading death, when she had marked
long,
Her hart gan melt in great compassion;
And drizling teares did shed for pure affection.

VII

"The lyon, lord of everie beast in field," 55
Quoth she, "his princely puissance doth abate,
And mightie proud to humble weake does
yield,
Forgetfull of the hungry rage, which late

Him prickt, in pittie of my sad estate:—
But he, my lyon, and my noble lord, 60
How does he find in cruell hart to hate
Her that him lov'd, and ever most adord,
As the God of my life? why hath he me abhord?"

VIII

Redounding teares did choke th' end of her
plaint,
Which softly ecchoed from the neighbour
wood; 65
And, sad to see her sorrowful constraint,
The kingly beast upon her gazing stood;
With pittie calmd, downe fell his angry mood.
At last, in close hart shutting up her payne,
Arose the Virgin borne of heavenly brood, 70
And to her snowy palfrey got agayne
To seeke her strayed champion, if she might attayne.

IX

The lyon would not leave her desolate,
But with her went along, as a strong gard
Of her chast person, and a faythfull mate 75
Of her sad troubles and misfortunes hard:
Still, when she slept, he kept both watch and
ward;
And, when she wakt, he wayted diligent,
With humble service to her will prepar'd:
From her fayre eyes he took commandē-
ment, 80
And ever by her lookes conceived her intent.

[Archimago, learning of the whereabouts of Una, assumes the arms and appearance of the Red Cross Knight, and,—being too fearful of the lion to join her,—approaches near enough to her to be seen. Una seeing, as she supposes, him whom she has sought through wide deserts, and with great toil and peril, goes up to him in joy and humbleness, while Archimago, feigning to be her Knight, greets her with words of welcome and vows of faithful service.]

XXX

His lovely words her seemd due recompence
Of all her passed paines; one loving howre
For many yeares of sorrow can dispenge;
A dram of sweete is worth a pound of sowre.
Shee has forgott how many woful stowre 275
For him she late endurd; she speaks no more
Of past; true is, that true love hath no powre
To looken backe; his eies be fixt before.
Before her stands her Knight, for whom she toyl'd so sore.

XXXI

Much like, as when the beaten marinere, 280
That long hath wandred in the ocean wide,
Ofte soust in swelling Tethys saltish teare;
And long time having tand his tawney hide
With blustering breath of heaven, that none can bide,
And scorching flames of fierce Orions hound;
Soone as the port from far he has espide, 286
His chearfull whistle merily doth sound,
And Nereus crownes with cups; his mates him pledge around.

XXXII

Such ioy made Una, when her Knight she
 found;
 And eke th' Enchanter ioyous seemde no
 lesse 290
 Then the glad marchant, that does vew from
 ground
 His ship far come from watric wilderness;
 He hurles out vowes, and Neptune oft doth blesse.
 So forth they past; and all the way they spent 294
 Discoursing of her dreadful late distresse,
 In which he askt her, what the lyon ment;
 Who told her all that fell, in iourney as she went.

XXXIII

They had not ridden far, when they might see
 One pricking towards them with hastie
 heat,
 Full strongly armd, and on a courser free 300
 That through his fiersenesse fomed all with sweat,
 And the sharpe yron did for anger eat,
 When his hot ryder spurd his chauffed side;
 His looke was sterne, and seemed still to threat 304
 Cruell revenge, which he in hart did hyde;
 And on his shield Sans loy in bloody lines was dyde.

[Archimago, in the guise of the Red Cross
 Knight, thus journeying with Una meets a Paynim, or Saracen, named Sansloy. Sansloy attacks Archimago, who is overthrown. When he is unhelmed, Una sees to her surprise the face of Archimago instead of that of the Red Cross Knight. The Paynim, leaving Arch-imago dying, rudely approaches Una and drags her from her palfrey. The poet then describes the combat of the Paynim with the lion.]

XLI

But her fiers servant, full of kingly aw
 And high disdaine, whenas his soveraine
 Dame 380
 So rudely handled by her foe he saw,
 With gaping iawes full greedy at him came,
 And, ramping in his shield, did weene the same
 Have reft away with his sharp rending
 clawes: 384
 But he was stout, and lust did now inflame
 His corage more, that from his griping pawes
 He hath his shield redeemd; and forth his sword he drawes.

XLII

O then, too weake and feeble was the forse
 Of salvage beast, his puissance to withstand!
 For he was strong, and of so mightie
 corse, 390
 As ever wielded speare in warlike hand;
 And feates of armes did wisely understand.

Eftsoones he perced through his chauffed chest
 With thrilling point of deadly yron brand,
 And launcht his lordly hart: with death
 opprest 395
 He ror'd aloud, whiles life forsooke his stub-borne brest.

XLIII

Who now is left to keepe the forlorne Maid
 From raging spoile of lawlesse victors will?
 Her faithful gard remov'd; her hope dis-
 maid;
 Her selfe a yielded pray to save or spill! 400
 He now, lord of the field, his pride to fill,
 With foule reproches and disdaineeful spright
 Her vildly entertaines; and, will or nill
 Beares her away upon his courser light:
 Her prayers naught prevaile; his rage is more of might. 405

XLIV

And all the way, with great lamenting paine,
 And piteous plaintes she filleth his dull eares,
 That stony hart could riven have in twaine;
 And all the way she wetts with flowing teares;
 But he, enrag'd with rancor, nothing heares.
 Her servile beast yet would not leave her so,
 But followes her far of, ne ought he feares 412
 To be partaker of her wandering woe,
 More mild in beastly kind, then that her beastly foe.

[After many mishaps and adventures the Book ends with the happy union of the Red Cross Knight and Una;—the marriage of Holiness and Truth.]

THE STORY OF SIR GUYON, OR THE KNIGHT OF

A harder lesson to learne Continen-

 In ioyous pleasure then in grievous paine;
 For sweetnesse doth allure the weaker sence
 So strongly, that unceathes it can refraine
 From that which feeble nature covets faine;
 But grieve and wrath, that be her enemies,
 And foes of life, she better can abstaine: 7
 Yet Vertue vauntes in both her victories;
 And Guyon in them all shewes goodly mysteries.

[Cymochles having met a damsel who represents intemperate pleasure, is tempted by her to neglect duty in inglorious idleness and self-indulgence. He falls under the spell of her blandishments and his coming under her allurements to the Idle Lake, the home of pleasure, is thus described:]

XI

Whiles thus she talked, and whiles thus she toyd, 100
 They were far past the passage which he spake,
 And come unto an island waste and voyd,
 That floted in the midst of that great lake;
 There her small gondelay<sup>31</sup> her port did make
 And that gay payre, issewing on the shore, 105 Disburdened her. Their way they forward
 take
 Into the land that lay them faire before,
 Whose pleasaunce she him shewde, and plentifull great store.

XII

It was a chosen plott of fertile land,
 Amongst wide waves sett, like a little nest,
 As if it had by Nature's cunning hand 111
 Bene choycely picked out from all the rest,
 And laid forth for ensample of the best:
 No daintie flowre or herbe that growes on
 grownd,
 No arborett with painted blossomes drest
 And smelling sweete, but there it might be fownd 116
 To bud out faire, and throwe her sweete smels al around.

XIII

No tree whose braunches did not bravely
 spring;
 No braunch, whereon a fine bird did not sitt;
 No bird, but did her shrill notes sweetly sing;
 No song but did containe a lovely ditt. 121
 Trees, braunches, birds, and songs, were framed fitt
 For to allure fraile mind to careless ease:
 Carelesse the man soone woxe, and his weake witt
 Was overcome of thing that did him please;
 So pleased did his wrathfull purpose faire appease. 126

XIV

Thus when shee had his eyes and sences fed
 With false delights, and fild with pleasures
 vayne,
 Into a shady dale she soft him led,
 And layd him downe upon a grassy playn;
 And her sweete selfe without dread or dis-dayn 131
 She sett beside, laying his head disarmd
 In her loose lap, it softly to sustayn,
 Where soone he slumbred fearing not be harm'd,
 The whiles with a love lay she thus him sweetly
 charmd: 135

XV

"Behold, <sup>32</sup>O man! that toilsome paines doest
 take,
 The flowrs, the fields, and all that pleasaunt
 growes,

<sup>31</sup> Gondola.

<sup>32</sup> This song is apparently suggested by Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Bk. XIV. 62. Cf. Tennyson's Lotus Eaters, stanzas II and III.

How they themselves doe thine ensample
 make,
 Whiles nothing envious nature them forth
 throwes
 Out of her fruitfull lap; how, no man knowes,
 They spring, they bud, they blossome fresh and faire, 141
 And deeke the world with their rich pompous
 showes;
 Yet no man for them taketh paines or care,
 Yet no man to them can his carefull paines compare.

XVI

"The lilly, lady of the flowring field, 145
 The flowre-de-luce, her lovely paramoure,
 Bid thee to them thy fruitlesse labors yield,
 And soone leave off this toylsome weary stoure:
 Loe! loe! how brave she decks her bounteous
 boure,
 With silkin curtens, and gold coverletts, 150
 Therein to shrowd her sumptuous belamour!
 Yet neither spinnes nor cards, ne cares nor fretts,
 But to her mother Nature all her care she letts.

XVII

"Why then doest thou, O man, that of them
 all
 Art lord, and eke of nature souveraine, 155
 Wilfully make thyselfe a wretched thrall,
 And waste thy ioyous howres in needelesse
 paine,
 Seeking for daunger and adventures vaine?
 What bootes it al to have, and nothing use?
 Who shall him rew that swimming in the maine 160
 Will die for thrist, and water doth refuse?
 Refuse such fruitlesse toile, and present pleasures chuse."

XVIII

By this she had him lulled fast asleepe,
 That of no worldly thing he care did take:
 Then she with liquors strong his eies did
 steepe, 165
 That nothing should him hastily awake.
 So she him lefte, and did herselfe betake
 Unto her boat again, with which she clefte
 The slouthfull wave of that great griesy lake:
 Soone shee that Island far behind her lefte,
 And now is come to that same place where first
 she wefte. 171

[Sir Guyon, who has also been assailed by the temptations of Pleasure, next encounters Mammon, or the temptations of Avarice.]

CANTO VII

*Guyon findes Mamon<sup>33</sup> in a delve sunning his treasure hore;
 Is by him tempted, and led downe
 To see his secret store.*

<sup>33</sup> Mammon was not a heathen divinity but, as in the New Testament, a simple personification of money or worldly ambition, from the Syriac word for riches.

II

So Guyon, having lost his trustie guyde, 10
Late left beyond that Ydle Lake, procedes
Yet on his way, of none accompanye;
And evermore himselfe with comfort feedes
Of his own vertues and praise-worthie deedes.
So, long he yode, yet no adventure found, 15
Which Fame of her shrill trompet worthy reedes:
For still he traveild through wide wastfull
ground,
That nought but desert wildernesse shewed all around.

III

At last he came unto a gloomy glade, Cover'd with boughes and shrubs from heavens light, 20
Whereas he sitting found in secret shade
An uncouth, salvage, and uncivile wight,
Of griesly hew and fowle ill-favour'd sight;
His face with smoke was tand, and eies were bleard,
His head and beard with sout were ill bedight,
His cole-blacke hands did seeme to have ben seard 26
In synthes fire-spitting forge, and nayles like clawes appeard.

IV

His yron cote, all overgrowne with rust,
Was underneath enveloped with gold;
Whose glistering glosse darkened with filthy dust, 30
Well yet appeared to have beene of old
A worke of rich entayle and curious mould,
Woven with antickes and wyld ymagery;
And in his lap a masse of coyne he told,
And turned upside downe, to feede his eye
And covetous desire with his huge theasury. 36

V

And round about him lay on every side
Great heapes of gold that never could be spent;
Of which some were rude owre, not purifide
Of Muleibers<sup>34</sup> devouring element; 40
Some others were new driven, and distent
Into great Ingowes and to wedges square;
Some in round plates withouten moniment;
But most were stamp't, and in their metal bare
The antique shapes of kings and kesars strounding and rare. 45

VI

Soone as he Guyon saw, in great affright
And haste he rose for to remove aside
Those pretious hils from straungers envious
sight,
And downe them poured through an hole full
wide

<sup>34</sup> The name given to Vulcan (Lat. mulceo, to soften), as the smoother of metals by fire. Of is here used in the sense of by.

Into the hollow earth, them there to hide; 50
But Guyon, lightly to him leaping, stayd
His hand that trembled as one terrifyde;
And though himselfe were at the sight dismayd,
Yet him perforce restraynd, and to him doubt-full sayd:

VII

"What art thou, Man (if man at all thou art),
That here in desert hast thine habitaunce, 56
And these rich hils of welth doest hide apart
From the worldes eye, and from her right usaunce?"
Thereat, with staring eyes fixed askaunce,
In great disdaine he answerd: "Hardy Elfe,
That darest vew my direfull countenaunce! 61
I read thee rash and heedlesse of thy self,
To trouble my still seate, and heapes of pretious pelfe.

VIII

"God of the world and worldlings I me call,
Great Mammon, greatest god below the skye,
That of my plenty poure out unto all, 66
And unto none my graces do envye:
Riches, renowme, and principality,
Honour, estate, and all this worldes good,
For which men swinck<sup>35</sup> and sweat incessantly, 70
Fro me do flow into an ample flood,
And in the hollow earth have their eternall brood.

IX

"Wherefore, if me thou deigne to serve and sew,
At thy commaund lo! all these mountaines
bee;
Or if to thy great mind, or greedy vew, 75
All these may not suffice, there shall to thee
Ten times so much be nombred francke and free."
"Mammon," said he, "thy godheads vaunt is vaine,
And idle offers of thy golden fee;
To them that covet such eye-glutting gaine
Proffer thy giftes, and fitter servaunte enter-taine. 81

X

"Me ill besits, that in derdoing armes
And honours suit my vowed daies do spend,
Unto thy bounteous baytes, and pleasing charmes,
With which weake men thou witchest, to attend; 85
Regard of worldly mucke doth fowly blend,
And low abase the high heroicke spright.
That ioyes for crownes and kingdomes to contend;
Faire shields, gay steedes, bright armes, be my delight;
Those be the riches fit for an advent'rous knight." 90

<sup>35</sup> Toil.

XI

"Vaine glorious Elfe," saide he, "doest not thou weete,<sup>38</sup>

That money can thy wantes at will supply?
Shields, steeds, and armes, and all things for thee meet,

It can purvey in twineckling of an eye; 94
And crownes and kingdomes to thee multiply.
Doe not I kings create, and throw the crowne
Sometimes to him that low in dust doth ly,
And him that raignd into his rowme thrust downe,

And whom I lust do heape with glory and renowne?"

XII

"All otherwise," said he, "I riches read, 100
And deeme them roote of all disquietnesse;
First got with guile, and then preserv'd with dread,

And after spent with pride and lavishnesse,
Leaving behind them grieve and heavinesse:
Infinite mischiefes of them doe arise; 105
Strife and debate, bloodshed and bitternesse,
Outrageous wrong and hellish covetize,
That noble heart, in great dishonour, doth despize.

XIII

"Ne thine be Kingdomes, ne the scepters thine;

But realmes and rules thou doest both confound, 110

And loyall truth to treason doest incline:
Witnessse the guiltlesse blood pourd oft on ground;

The crowned often slaine; the slayer croud;
The sacred diademe in peeces rent. 114

And purple robe gored with many a wound,
Castles surprizd, great cities sackt and brent:

So mak'st thou kings, and gaynest wrongful government!

XIV

"Long were to tell the troublous stormes that tosse

The private state, and make the life unsweet:
Who swelling sayles in Caspian sea doth crosse, 120

And in frayle wood on Adrian gulf doth fleet,
Doth not, I weene, so many evils meet."

Then Mammon waxing wroth: "And why then," sayd,

"Are mortall men so fond and undiscreet
So evill thing to seeke unto their ayd;

And having not, complaine, and having it, upbrayd?" . . .

XIX

"Me list not," said the Elfin Knight, "receave

Thing offred, till I know it well be gott;
Ne wote I but thou didst these goods bereave
From rightfull owner by unrighteous lott, 175
Or that blood-guiltinesse or guile them blott."

<sup>38</sup> Know.

"Perdy," quoth he, "yet never eie did vew,
Ne tong did tell, ne hand these handled not;
But safe I have them kept in secret mew
From heavens sight and powre of al which them poursew." 180

XX

"What secret place," quoth he, "can safely hold

So huge a masse, and hide from heavens eie?
Or where hast thou thy wonne, that so much gold

Thou canst preserve from wrong and robbery?" 184

"Come thou," quoth he, "and see." So by and by

Through that thick covert he him led, and fowned

A darksome way, which no man could descry,
That deep descended through the hollow
grownd,

And was with dread and horror compassed
arownd.

XXI

At length they came into a larger space, 190
That strecht itselfe into an ample playne;
Through which a beaten broad high way did trace

That streight did lead to Plutoes griesly rayne:

By that wayes side there sate infernall
Payne,<sup>37</sup>

And fast beside him sat tumultuous Strife;
The one in hand an yron whip did strayne, 196

The other brandished a bloody knife;
And both did gnash their teeth, and both did threaten Life.

XXII

On th'other side in one consórt there sate
Cruell Revenge, and rancorous Despight, 200
Disloyall Treason, and hart-burning Hate;
But gnawing Gealosity, out of their sight
Sitting alone, his bitter lips did bight;

And trembling Feare still to and fro did fly,
And found no place wher safe he shroud him
might: 205

Lamenting Sorrow did in darknes lye;
And Shame his ugly face did hide from living eye.

XXIII

And over them sad Horror with grim hew
Did alwaies sore, beating his yron wings;
And after him owles and night-ravens flew, 210

The hatefull messengers of heavy tidings,
Of death and dolor telling sad tidings;

Whiles sad Celeno,<sup>38</sup> sitting on a clifte,
A song of bale and bitter sorrow sings,

That hart of flint a sonder could have rifte;
Which having ended, after him she flyeth
swift. 216

<sup>38</sup> One of the Harpies; ithy, vulture-like creatures, with head and breast of a woman.

XXIV

All these before the gates of Pluto lay;
 By whom they passing spake unto them
 nought;
 But th' Elfin Knight with wonder all the
 way
 Did feed his eyes, and fild his inner thought.
 At last him to a litle dore he brought, 221
 That to the gate of hell, which gaped wide,
 Was next adioingning, ne them parted ought:
 Betwixt them both was but a litle stride,
 That did the house of Richesse from hell-mouth divide. 225

XXV

Before the dore sat selfe-consuming Care, Day and night keeping wary watch and
 ward,
 For feare least Force or Fraud should unaware Breake in, and spoile the treasure there in gard:
 Ne would he suffer Sleepe once thether-ward
 Approach, albe his drowsy den were next; 231
 For next to Death is Sleepe to be compard;
 Therefore his house is unto his annex:
 Here Sleepe, there Richesse, and Hel-gate them both betwext.

XXVI

So soone as Mammon there arrivd, the dore
 To him did open, and afforded way: 236
 Him followed eke Sir Guyon evermore;
 Ne darknesse him, ne daunger might dismay.
 Soone as he entred was, the dore streight way
 Did shutt, and from behind it forth there lept 240
 An ugly feend, more fowle than dismall day;
 The which with monstrous stalke behind him
 septe,
 And ever as he went dew watch upon him kept. . . .

XXVIII

That houses forme within was rude and
 strong,
 Lyke an huge cave hewne out of rocky clifte,
 From whose rough vault the ragged breaches<sup>39</sup> hong
 Embost with massy gold of glorious guifte,
 And with rich metall loaded every rifte, 266
 That heavy ruine they did seeme to threat;
 And over them Arachne<sup>40</sup> high did lifte
 Her cunning web, and spred her subtil net, Enwrapped in fowle smoke and clouds more black then iett. 270

XXIX

Both rooffe, and floore, and walls, were all of
 gold,
 But overgrown with dust and old decay,
 And hid in darknes, that none could behold
 The hew thereof: for vew of cherefull day
 Did never in that house it selfe display, 275

But a faint shadow of uncertein light;
 Such as a lamp, whose life does fade away;
 Or as the moone, cloathed with cloudy night,
 Does shew to him that walks in feare, and sad affright.

XXX

In all that rowme was nothing to be seene
 But huge great yron chests, and coffers
 strong, 281
 All bard with double bends, that none could
 weene
 Them to efforce by violence or wrong;
 On every side they placed were along.
 But all the grownd with sculs was scattered
 And dead mens bones, which round about were flong; 286
 Whose lives, it seemed, whilome there were shed,
 And their vile carcasses now left unburied.

XXXI

They forward passe; ne Guyon yet spoke
 word,
 Till that they came unto an yron dore, 290
 Which to them opened of his owne accord,
 And shewed of riches such exceeding store,
 As eie of man did never see before,
 Ne ever could within one place be fownd,
 Though all the wealth which is, or was of yore
 Could gathered be through all the world
 arownd, 296
 And that above were added to that under grownd.

XXXII

The charge thereof unto a covetous spright
 Commaunded was, who thereby did attend,
 And warily awaited day and night, 300
 From other covetous feends it to defend,
 Who it to rob and ransacke did intend.
 Then Mammon, turning to that warriour,
 said:
 "Loe, here the worldës blis! loe, here the end, 304
 To which al men doe ayme, rich to be made!
 Such grace now to be happy is before thee laid."

XXXIII

"Certes," said he, "I n' ill thine offred grace,
 Ne to be made so happy doe intend!
 Another blis before mine eyes I place,
 Another happines, another end. 310
 To them that list, these base regards I lend:
 But I in armes, and in atchievements brave,
 Do rather choose my flitting houres to spend,
 And to be lord of those that riches have,
 Then them to have myselfe, and be their servile slave." 315

XXXIV

Thereat the Feend his gnashing teeth did grate,
 And griev'd, so long to lacke his greedie pray;
 For well he weened that so glorious bayte
 Would tempt his guest to take thereof assay!

<sup>39</sup> Stalactites.<sup>40</sup> Spider, Arachne was a skilful needlewoman changed unto a spider by Minerva.

Had he so doen, he had him snatcht away 320
More light then culver<sup>1</sup> in the faulcons fist:
Eternall God thee save from such decay!

But, whenas Mammon saw his purpose mist,
Him to entrap unwares another way he wist.

[The poet then goes on to tell of the further temptations to which Guyon is subjected, and of how the Knight withstands them. At length, after three days have passed, according to men's reckoning, Guyon begs to be taken back into the world, and Mammon, though loth, is constrained to comply with the request. But as soon as Guyon reaches the vital air he swoons, and lies as one dead. The next Canto (which ends with the Knight's recovery and reunion with the Palmer, his appointed guide), begins with the following stanzas on the care of God for man, thus leading us to anticipate the happy ending.]

(FROM CANTO VIII)

I

And is there care in heaven? And is there love

In heavenly spirits to these creatures bace,
That may compassion of their evils move?
There is: else much more wretched were the cace

Of men then beasts. But O! th' exceeding
grace 5

Of highest God that loves his creatures so,
And all his workes with mercy doth embrace,
That blessed Angels he sends to and fro,

To serve to wicked man, to serve his wicked foe.

II

How oft do they their silver bowers leave, 10
To come to succour us that succour want!
How oft do they with golden pineons cleave
The fitting skyes, like flying Pursuivant,
Against fowle feedes to ayd us militant!
They for us fight, they watch and dewly
ward, 15

And their bright squadrons round about us plant;

And all for love, and nothing for reward.

O! why should hevenly God to men have such regard?

THE COURTIER<sup>1</sup>

(From Mother Hubbard's Tale, 1591)

Most miserable man, whom wicked fate
Hath brought to court, to sue for had ywist,
That few have found, and manie one hath mist!
Full little knowest thou that hast not tride,
What hell it is in suing long to bide: 5

<sup>1</sup> The poem from which this extract is taken first appeared in a miscellaneous collection entitled Complaints (1591). It was in this year that Spenser returned to his home in Ireland, after a stay in London of some two years. This visit to England had been made under the encouragement of Raleigh, who, Spenser tells us, secured his admission to the queen. The poet gives us an account of this visit in his Colin Clout's Come Home Again (pub. 1596), but in the lines here given we have probably an insight into the real mood in which he left the court.

To loose good dayes, that might be better spent;
To wast long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to day, to be put back tomorrow;
To feed on hope, to pine with feare and sorrow;
To have thy Princes grace, yet want her
Peeres; 10

To have thy asking, yet waite manie yeeres;
To fret thy soule with crosses and with cares;
To eate thy heart through comfortlesse dis-paires; 15

To fawne, to crowche, to waite, to ride, to ronne,

To spend, to give, to want, to be undonne. 15
Unhappie wight, borne to disastrous end,
That doth his life in so long tendance spend!

Who ever leaves sweete home, where meane estate

In safe assurance, without strife or hate, Findes all things needfull for contentment
meeke, 20

And will to court for shadowes vaine to seeke,
Or hope to gaine, himselfe will one daie crye,
That curse God send unto mine enemy!

(1596)

Calm was the day, and through the trembling
air

Sweet-breathing Zephyrus did softly play,
A gentle spirit, that lightly did delay
Hot Titans beams, which then did glisten fair,
When I (whom sullen care, 5

Through discontent of my long fruitless stay
In Princes Court, and expectation vain
Of idle hopes, which still do fly away,

Like empty shadows, did afflict my brain,) 10
Walked forth to ease my pain

Along the shore of silver streaming Thames;
Whose ruddy<sup>2</sup> bank, the which his river hems,

Was painted all with variable flowers,
And all the meads adorned with dainty gems 15

Fit to deck maidens bowers
And crown their paramours

Against the bridal day,<sup>3</sup> which is not long.

Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

There, in a meadow by the river's side
A flock of Nymphs I chanced to spy 20

All lovely daughters of the flood thereby,
With goodly greenish locks, all loose untied,

As each had been a Bride;
And each one had a little wicker basket,

Made of fine twigs entrayled curiously, 25
In which they gathered flowers to fill their flasket,<sup>4</sup>

And with fine fingers cropt full feateously<sup>5</sup>
The tender stalks on high.

Of every sort, which in that meadow grew,
 They gathered some, the Violet pallid blue, 30
 The little Daisy that at evening closes,
 The Virgin Lily, and the Primrose true,
 With store of vermeil<sup>6</sup> Roses,
 To deck their Bridegroomes posies
 Against the bridal day, which was not long. 35
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

With that I saw two swans of goodly hue
 Come softly swimming down along the Lee;<sup>7</sup>
 Two fairer birds I yet did never see;
 The snow which doth the top of Pindus strew,
 Did never whiter shew; 41
 Nor Jove himself, when he a Swan would be,
 For Love of Leda, whiter did appear;
 Yet Leda was (they say) as white as he,
 Yet not so white as these, nor nothing near; 45
 So purely white they were,
 That e'en the gentle stream, the which them
 bare,
 Seem'd foul to them, and bade his billows spare
 To wet their silken feathers, lest they might Soil their fair plumes with water not so fair, 50
 And mar their beauties bright,
 That shone as heaven's light,
 Against their bridal day, which was not long.
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

Eftsoons<sup>8</sup> the Nymphs, which now had flowers their fill, 55
 Ran all in haste to see that silver brood,
 As they came floating on the crystal flood;
 Whom when they saw, they stood amazed still
 Their wondering eyes to fill;
 Them seem'd they never saw a sight so fair, 60
 Of fowls so lovely, that they sure did deem
 Them heavenly born, or to be that same pair
 Which through the sky draw Venus' silver team;
 For sure they did not seem
 To be begot of any earthly seed, 65
 But rather Angels, or of Angels' breed;
 Yet were they bred of Somers-heat<sup>9</sup> they say,
 In sweetest season when each flower and weed
 The earth did fresh array;
 So fresh they seem'd as day, 70
 E'en as their bridal day, which was not long.
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

Then forth they all out of their baskets drew
 Great store of flowers, the honour of the field,
 That to the sense did fragrant odours yield, 75
 All which upon those goodly birds they threw
 And all the waves did strew,
 That like old Peneus waters they did seem,
 When down along by pleasant Tempes shore, Scattered with flowers, through Thessaly they stream, 80

That they appear through lillies pleanteous
 store,
 Like a bride's chamber floor.
 Two of those Nymphs, meanwhile, two gar-lands bound
 Of freshest flowers which in that mead they
 found,
 The which presenting all in trim array, 85
 Their snowy foreheads therewithal they crowned,
 Whil'st one did sing this lay,
 Prepar'd against that day,
 Against their bridal day which was not long.
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my
 song. 90

"Ye gentle Birds! the world's fair ornament,
 And heaven's glory, whom this happy hour
 Doth lead unto your lovers' blissful bower,
 Joy may you have, and gentle hearts content
 Of your love's complement; 95
 And let fair Venus, that is Queen of Love,
 With her heart-quelling son upon you smile,
 Whose smile, they say, hath virtue to remove
 All love's dislike, and friendship's faulty guile
 For ever to assail;<sup>10</sup> 100
 Let endless peace your steadfast hearts accord,
 And blessed plenty wait upon your board;
 And let your bed with pleasures chaste abound,
 That fruitful issue may to you afford,
 Which may your foes confound, 105
 And make your joys redound
 Upon your bridal day, which is not long."
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

So ended she; and all the rest around
 To her redoubled that her undersong,<sup>11</sup> 110
 Which said their bridal day should not be long:
 And gentle Echo from the neighbour-ground
 Their accents did resound.
 So forth those joyous birds did pass along,
 Adown the Lee, that to them murmured low,
 As he would speak, but that he lacked a tongue,
 Yet did by signs his glad affection show, 117
 Making his stream run slow.
 And all the fowl which in his flood did dwell
 'Gan flock about these twain, that did excel 120
 The rest, so far as Cynthia doth shend
 The lesser stars. So they enrag'd well,
 Did on those two attend,
 And did their best service lend Against their wedding day, which was not long: 125
 Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

At length they all to merry London came,
 To merry London, my most kindly nurse,
 That to me gave this life's first native source;
 Though from another place I take my name,
 An house<sup>12</sup> of ancient fame: 131

<sup>12</sup> Spenser claimed kinship with the Spencers of Althorpe; "the ancestors of the Spencers and Churchills of modern days."

There when they came, whereas those bricky
towers
The which on Thames' broad, aged back to ride,
Where now the studious lawyers have their bowers,
There whilom wont the Templar Knights to bide, 135
Till they decayed through pride:
Next whereunto there stands a stately place,<sup>13</sup>
Where oft I gainèd gifts and goodly grace
Of that great lord, which therein wont to dwell, Whose want too well now feels my friendless case; 140
But ah! here fits not well
Old woes, but joys, to tell
Against the bridal day, which is not long:
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

Yet therein now doth lodge a noble peer, 145
Great England's glory, and all the world's wide wonder,
Whose dreadful name late through all Spain
did thunder,
And Hercules' two pillars standing near
Did make to quake and fear:
Fair branch of honour, flower of chivalry! 150
That fillest England with thy triumph's fame,
Joy have thou of thy noble victory,<sup>14</sup>
And endless happiness of thy own name,
That promiseth the same;
That through thy prowess, and victorious
arms, 155
Thy country may be freed from foreign harms;
And great Eliza's glorious name may ring
Through all the world, filled with thy wide alarms,<sup>15</sup>
Which some brave muse may sing
To ages following, 160
Upon the bridal day, which is not long:
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

From those high towers this noble lord issuing,
Like radiant Hesper, when his golden hair
In the Ocean's billows he hath bathed fair, 165
Descended to the river's open viewing,
With a great train ensuing.
Above the rest were goodly to be seen
Two gentle knights of lovely face and feature
Beseeming well the bower of any queen, 170
... gifts of wit, and ornaments of nature,
Fit for so goodly stature,
That like the twins of Jove they seemed in sight,
Which deck the baldrick of the heavens bright;
They two, forth pacing to the river's side, 175
Received those two fair brides, their love's delight;

Which, at the appointed tide,
Each one did make his bride
Against their bridal day, which is not long: 179
Sweet Thames! run softly, till I end my song.

<sup>13</sup> A palace adjoining the Temple, formerly occupied by Elizabeth's favorite, the Earl of Leicester (the "gentle lord" here referred to) and afterwards by the Earl of Essex, the "noble peer" alluded to in the next stanza.

<sup>15</sup> i. e. The alarm you excite.

SONNETS

(From Amoretti, 1595)XL<sup>1</sup>

Mark when she smiles with amiable cheare,
And tell me whereto can ye lyken it;
When on each eyelid sweetly doe appeare
An hundred Graces as in shade to sit.
Lykest it seemeth, in my simple wit, 5
Unto the fayre sunshine in somers day;
That, when a dreadfull storm away is flit,
Through the broad world doth spread his goodly ray:

At sight whereof, each bird that sits on spray,
And every beast that to his den was fled, 10
Comes forth afresh out of their late dismay,
And to thy light lift up their drouping hed.

So my storme-beaten hart likewise is cheared
With that sunshine, when cloudy looks are cleared.

LXXV

One day I wrote her name upon the strand;
But came the waves and washed it away:
Agayne, I wrote it with a second hand;
And came the tyde, and made my paynes his pray.

"Wayne man," sayd she, "that doest in wayne
assay 5

A mortall thing so to immortalize;
For I myselfe shall lyke to this decay,
And eek my name bee wyped out lykewize."
"Not so" (quod I); "let baser things devise
To dy in dust, but you shall live by fame: 10
My verse your vertues rare shall live eternize,
And in the heavens wryte your glorious name;
Where, when as death shall all the world
subdew,

Our love shall live, and later life renew."

THE NYMPH'S REPLY TO THE PAS-
SIONATE SHEPHERD(From England's Helicon, 1600)

If all the world and Love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pleasures might my passion move,
To live with thee, and be thy love.

But time drives flocks from field to fold, 5
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold;
And Philomel becometh dumb,
The rest complains of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yields; 10
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancies spring but sorrows fall.

<sup>1</sup> XL and LXXV. These are from a series of eighty-eight sonnets entitled Amoretti, published together with the splendid Epithalamion, or marriage hymn, in 1595. The sonnets commemorate Spenser's courtship of, and the Epithalamion his marriage to, a certain Irish country girl whose Christian name was certainly Elizabeth, and whose last name (according to Grosart) was Boyle.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies,
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten, 15
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy-buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move,
To come to thee, and be thy love. 20

But could youth last, could love still breed,
Had joys no date, had age no need;
Then those delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

PILGRIM TO PILGRIM

As you came from the holy land
Of Walsingham,
Met you not with my true love
By the way as you came?

How shall I know your true love,
That have met many one,
As I went to the holy land,
That have come, that have gone?

She is neither white nor brown,
But as the heavens fair;
There is none hath a form so divine
In the earth or the air. 10

Such a one did I meet, good sir,
Such an angel-like face,
Who like a queen, like a nymph, did appear, 15
By her gait, by her grace.

She hath left me here all alone,
All alone, as unknown,
Who sometimes did me lead with herself,
And me loved as her own. 20

What's the cause that she leaves you alone,
And a new way doth take,
Who loved you once as her own,
And her joy did you make?

I have loved her all my youth,
And now old, as you see,
Love likes not the falling fruit
From the withered tree. 25

Know that love is a careless child,
And forgets promise past;
He is blind, he is deaf when he list,
And in faith never fast. 30

His desire is a dureless content,
And a trustless joy;
He is won with a world of despair
And is lost with a toy. 35

Of womankind such indeed is the love,
Or the word love abused,
Under which many childish desires
And conceits are excused. 40

But true love is a durable fire,
In the mind ever burning,
Never sick, never old, never dead,
From itself never turning.

LINES WRITTEN THE NIGHT BEFORE HIS DEATH<sup>1</sup>

Even such is time, that takes on trust
Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with (Earth) and dust;
Who, in the dark and silent grave,
(When we have wandered all our ways), 5
Shuts up the story of our days:
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
My God shall raise me up, I trust!

APELLES' SONG

5 (From Alexander and Campaspe, 1584; acted 1581)

Cupid and my Campaspe played
At cards for kisses,—Cupid paid;
He stakes his quiver, bow and arrows,
His mother's doves, and team of sparrows:
Loses them too; then down he throws 5
The coral of his lip, the rose
Growing on 's cheek (but none knows how);
With these the crystal of his brow,
And then the dimple of his chin:
All these did my Campaspe win. 10
At last he set her both his eyes;
She won, and Cupid blind did rise.
O Love, has she done this to thee?
What shall, alas! become of me?

SONNETS

(From Astrophel and Stella, c. 1591)

XXXI

25 With how sad steps, O Moon, thou climb'st the skies!
How silently, and with how wan a face!
What, may it be that even in heavenly place
That busy archer his sharp arrows tries?
30 Sure, if that long-with-love-acquainted eye 5
Can judge of love, thou feel'st a lover's case;
I read it in thy looks, thy languished grace,
To me, that feel the like, thy state describes.
Then ev'n of fellowship, O Moon, tell me,
Is constant love deemed there but want of wit? 10
35 Are beauties there as proud as here they be?
Do they above love to be loved, and yet
Those lovers scorn whom that love doth possess?
Do they call virtue there ungratefulness?

<sup>1</sup> Raleigh was executed Oct. 29th, 1618. These lines are said to have been found in Raleigh's Bible.

XXXIX—ON SLEEP

Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace,
The baiting-place of wit, the balm of woe,
The poor man's wealth, the prisoner's release,
The indifferent judge between the high and low;

With shield of proof, shield me from out the prease 5

Of those fierce darts Despair at me doth throw:
O make in me those civil wars to cease;
I will good tribute pay, if thou do so.
Take thou of me smooth pillows, sweetest bed;
A chamber deaf of noise, and blind of light; 10
A rosy garland and a weary head:
And if these things, as being thine in right,
Move not thy heavy grace, thou shalt in me,
Livelier than elsewhere, Stella's image see.

A FAREWELL

Leave me, O Love! which reachest but to dust;
And thou, my mind, aspire to higher things:
Grow rich in that which never taketh rust;
What ever fades, but fading pleasure brings.

Draw in thy beams, and humble all thy might 5
To that sweet yoke, where lasting freedoms be,
Which breaks the clouds, and opens forth the light,
That doth both shine, and give us sight to see.

O take fast hold! let that light be thy guide,
In this small course, which birth draws out to death, 10

And think how ill becometh him to slide,
Who seeketh heav'n, and comes of heav'nly breath.

Then farewell, World, thy uttermost I see,
Eternal Love, maintain thy life in Me!

A PROTESTATION

(From Rosalind, 1590)

First shall the heavens want starry light,
The seas be robbed of their waves;
The day want sun, and sun want bright,
The night want shade, the dead men graves; 5
The April flowers and leaf and tree,
Before I false my faith to thee.

First shall the tops of highest hills
By humble plains be overpried;<sup>1</sup>
And poets scorn the Muses' quills,
And fish forsake the water glide: 10
And Iris loose her colored weed,
Before I fail thee at thy need.

First direful hate shall turn to peace,
And love relent in deep disdain;
And death his fatal stroke shall cease, 15
And envy pity every pain;
And pleasure mourn, and sorrow smile,
Before I talk of any guile.

First Time shall stay his stayless race,
And winter bless his brows with corn; 20
And snow bemoisten July's face,
And winter spring, and summer mourn;
Before my pen by help of fame,
Cease to recite thy sacred name.

PHILLIS

(From Phillis Honoured with Pastoral Sonnets, 1593)

My Phillis hath the morning sun
At first to look upon her.
And Phillis hath morn-waking birds
Her risings for to honour. 5

My Phillis hath prime-feathered flowers
That smile when she treads on them;
And Phillis hath a gallant flock
That leaps since she doth own them.

But Phillis hath so hard a heart
(Alas that she should have it), 10
As yields no mercy to desert

Nor grace to those that crave it:
Sweet sun, when thou lookest on
Pray her regard my moan.
Sweet birds, when you sing to her 15
To yield some pity woo her.

Sweet flowers, when as she treads on
Tell her her beauty deads one
And if in life her love she will agree me,<sup>1</sup>
Pray her before I die she will come see me. 20

SONG

(From The Arraignment of Paris, printed, 1584)

CENONE. Fair and fair, and twice so fair,
As fair as any may be;
The fairest shepherd on our green,
A love for any lady.

PARIS. Fair and fair, and twice so fair, 5
As fair as any may be;
Thy love is fair for thee alone,
And for no other lady.

CENONE. My love is fair, my love is gay,
As fresh as bin the flowers in May,
And of my love my roundelay, 11
My merry, merry, merry roundelay.
Concludes with Cupid's curse,—
They that do change old love for new,
Pray gods they change for worse! 15

<sup>1</sup> Will not (will) bring in agreement with me.

BOTH. Fair and fair, etc. (repeated)

CENONE. My love can pipe, my love can sing,
 My love can many a pretty thing,
 And of his lovely praises ring
 My merry, merry roundelays,
 Amen to Cupid's curse, 20
 They that do change old love for new,
 Pray gods they change for worse!

HIS GOLDEN LOCKS TIME HATH TO SILVER TURNED

(From Polyhymnia, 1590)

His golden locks Time hath to silver turned—
 O time too swift, O swiftness never ceasing!
 His youth 'gainst time and age hath ever spurned,
 But spurned in vain; youth waneth by increasing!
 Beauty, strength, youth, are flowers but fading
 seen; 5
 Duty, faith, love, are roots, and ever green.

His helmet now shall make a hive for bees,
 And lovers' sonnets turned to holy psalms,
 A man-at-arms must now serve on his knees,
 And feed on prayers, which are Old Age his alms: 10
 But, though from court to cottage he depart,
 His saint is sure of his unspotted heart.

And when he saddest sits in homely cell,
 He'll thank his swains this carol for a song:—
 "Blessed be the hearts that wish my sovereign well, 15
 Cursed be souls that think here any wrong!"
 Goddess, allow this aged man his right,
 To be your bedesman<sup>1</sup> now that was your knight.

ILLUSTRIOUS ENGLAND, ANCIENT SEAT OF KINGS

(From Edward Ist, 1593)

Illustrious England, ancient seat of kings,
 Whose chivalry hath royalized thy fame,
 That sounding bravely through terrestrial vale,
 Proclaiming conquests, spoils, and victories,
 Rings glorious echoes through the farthest
 world; 5
 What warlike nation, trained in feats of arms,
 What barbarous people, stubborn, or untamed,
 What climate under the meridian signs,<sup>1</sup>
 Or frozen zone under his brumal<sup>2</sup> plage,<sup>2</sup> Erst have not quaked and trembled at the name 10
 Of Britain and her mighty conquerors?
 Her neighbour realms, as Scotland, Denmark,
 France,

<sup>3</sup> The firmament was divided into four quarters, each of which was called a plage, or region; the brumal (or intury) plage, was the wintry quarter above the frozen one.

Awed with her deeds and jealous of her arms,
 Have begged offensive and defensive leagues.
 Thus Europe, rich and mighty in her kings, 15
 Hath feared brave England, dreadful in her kings.

And now, t' eternise Albion's champions
 Equivalent with Trojans' ancient fame,
 Comes lovely Edward from Jerusalem,
 Veering before the wind, ploughing the sea; 20
 His stretched sails filled with the breath of men
 That through the world admires his manliness.
 And, lo, at last arrived in Dover-road, Longshanks,<sup>3</sup> your king, your glory, and our
 son,

With troops of conquering lords, and warlike knights, 25
 Like bloody-crested Mars, o'erlooks his host,
 Higher than all his army by the head,
 Marching along as bright as Phœbus eyes!
 And we, his mother, shall behold our son,
 And England's peers shall see their sovereign.<sup>30</sup>

HECTOR AND ANDROMACHE

(From translation of Homer's Iliad, Bk. VI.
 1610)

He answer'd: "Helen, do not seek to make me sit with thee;
 I must not stay, though well I know thy honour'd love of me.
 . . . I myself will now go home, and see My household, my dear wife and son, that little hope of me;
 For, sister, 'tis without my skill, if I shall ever-
 more 5
 Return, and see them, or to earth, her right in me, restore.
 The Gods may stoop me by the Greeks." This said, he went to see
 The virtuous princess, his true wife, whitearm'd Andromache.
 She, with her infant son and maid, was climb'd the tow'r, about
 The sight of him that sought for her, weeping and crying out. 10
 Hector, not finding her at home, was going forth; retir'd;
 Stood in the gate; her woman call'd, and curiously inquir'd
 Where she was gone; bade tell him true, if she were gone to see His sisters, or his brothers' wives; or whether she should be
 At temple with the other dames, t' implore
 Minerva's ruth. 15

Her woman answer'd: Since he ask'd, and urg'd so much the truth,
 The truth was she was neither gone, to see his brothers' wives,

<sup>3</sup> Longshanks: Edward Ist was given this surname on account of his unusual height.

His sisters, nor t' implore the ruth of Pallas on their lives;
 But she (advertis'd of the bane Troy suffer'd, and how vast Conquest herself had made for Greece) like one distraught, made haste 20
 To ample Iliou with her son, and nurse, and all the way
 Mourn'd, and dissolv'd in tears for him. Then Hector made no stay,
 But trod her path, and through the streets,
 magnificently built,
 All the great city pass'd, and came where,
 seeing how blood was spilt, Andromache might see him come; who made as he would pass 25
 The ports without saluting her, not knowing where she was.
 She, with his sight, made breathless haste, to meet him; she, whose grace Brought him withal so great a dow'r; she that of all the race
 Of King Aëtion only lived: Aëtion, whose house stood
 Beneath the mountain Placius, environ'd with the wood 30
 Of Theban Hypoplac, being court to the Cilician land.
 She ran to Hector, and with her, tender of heart and hand,
 Her son, borne in his nurse's arms; when, like a heav'nly sign,
 Compact of many golden stars, the princely child did shine,
 Whom Hector call'd Scamandrius; but whom the town did name 35
 Astyanax, because his sire did only prop the
 same.
 Hector, though grief bereft his speech, yet
 smil'd upon his joy.
 Andromache cried out, mix'd hands, and to the strength of Troy Thus wept forth her affection: "O noblest in desire,
 Thy mind, inflam'd with others' good, will set thyself on fire: 40
 Nor pitiest thou thy son, nor wife, who must thy widow be,
 If now thou issue; all the field will only run on thee.
 Better my shoulders underwent the earth, than thy decease:
 For then would earth bear joys no more; then comes the black increase Of griefs (like Greeks on Iliou). Alas! what one survives 45
 To be my refuge? One black day bereft seven brothers' lives,
 By stern Achilles; by his hand my father breathed his last,
 His high-wall'd rich Cilician Thebes sack'd by him, and laid waste;
 The royal body yet he left unspoil'd; religion
 charm'd
 That act of spoil; and all in fire he burn'd him complete arm'd; 50

Built over him a royal tomb; and to the monument
 He left of him, th' Oreades (that are the high descent Of Ægis-bearing Jupiter) another of their own
 Did add to it, and set it round with elms; by which is shown,
 In theirs, the barrenness of death; yet might it serve beside 55
 To shelter the sad monument from all the ruffinous pride
 Of storms and tempests, us'd to hurt things of that noble kind.
 The short life yet my mother liv'd he sav'd, and serv'd his mind
 With all the riches of the realm; which not enough esteem'd,
 He kept her pris'ner; whom small time, but much more wealth, redeem'd; 60
 And she, in sylvan Hypoplac, Cicilia rul'd
 again,
 But soon was over-rul'd by death; Diana's chaste disdain
 Gave her a lance, and took her life. Yet, all these gone from me,
 Thou amply render'st all; thy life makes still my father be,
 My mother, brothers; and besides thou art my husband too, 65
 Most lov'd, most worthy. Pity then, dear love, and do not go,
 For thou gone, all these go again; pity our common joy,
 Lest, of a father's patronage, the bulwark of all
 Troy,
 Thou leav'st him a poor widow's charge. Stay, stay then, in this tow'r,
 And call up to the wild fig-tree all thy retir'd
 pow'r; 70
 For there the wall is easiest scal'd, and fittest for surprise,
 And there, th' Ajaces, Idomen, th' Atrides,
 Diomed, thrice
 Have both survey'd and made attempt; I know not if induc'd
 By some wise augur, or the fact was naturally infus'd
 Into their wits, or courages." To this, great Hector said: 75
 "Be well assur'd, wife, all these things in my kind cares are weigh'd.
 But what a shame, and fear, it is to think how Troy would scorn
 (Both in her husbands, and her wives, whom long-train'd gowns adorn)
 That I should cowardly fly off! The spirit I first did breath
 Did never teach me that; much less, since the contempt of death 80
 Was settled in me, and my mind knew what a worthy was,
 Whose office is to lead in fight, and give no danger pass
 Without improvement. In this fire must Hector's trial shine;

Here must his country, father, friends, be, in him, made divine.
And such a stormy day shall come (in mind and soul I know) 85
When sacred Troy shall shed her tow'rs, for tears of overthrow;
When Priam, all his birth and pow'r, shall in those tears be drown'd.
But neither Troy's posterity so much my soul
doth wound,
Priam, nor Hecuba herself, nor all my brothers'
woes,
(Who though so many, and so good, must all be food for foes) 90
As thy sad state; when some rude Greek shall lead thee weeping hence,
These free days clouded, and a night of captive violence
Loading thy temples, out of which thine eyes must never see,
But spin the Greek wives' webs of task, and their fetch-water be
To Argos, from Messeides, or clear Hyperia's
spring: 95
Which howsoever thou abhorr'st, Fate's such a shrewish thing
She will be mistress; whose curs'd hands, when they shall crush out cries
From thy oppressions (being beheld by other enemies)
Thus they will nourish thy extremes: 'This dame was Hector's wife,
A man that, at the wars of Troy, did breathe
the worthiest life 100
Of all their army.' This again will rub thy fruitful wounds,
To miss the man that to thy bands could give such narrow bounds.
But that day shall not wound mine eyes; the solid heap of night Shall interpose, shall stop mine ears against thy complaints, and plight."

This said, he reach'd to take his son; who, of his arms afraid, 105
And then the horse-hair plume, with which he was so overlaid,
Nodded so horribly, he cling'd back to his nurse,
and cried.
Laughter affected his great sire, who doff'd, and laid aside
His fearful helm, that on the earth cast round about it light;
Then took and kiss'd his loving son, and (balancing his weight 110
In dancing him) these loving vows to living
Jove he us'd,
And all the other bench of Gods: "O you that have infus'd
Soul to this infant, now set down this blessing on his star:—
Let his renown be clear as mine; equal his strength in war;
And make his reign so strong in Troy, that years to come may yield 115

His facts this fame, when, rich in spoils, he leaves the conquer'd field
Sown with his slaughters: 'These high deeds exceed his father's worth!'
And let this echo'd praise supply the comforts to come forth
Of his kind mother with my life." This said,
th' heroic sire
Gave him his mother; whose fair eyes fresh streams of love's salt fire 120
Billow'd on her soft cheeks, to hear the last of Hector's speech,
In which his vows compris'd the sum of all he did beseech
In her wish'd comfort. So she took into her od'rous breast
Her husband's gift; who, mov'd to see her heart so much oppress'd,
He dried her tears, and thus desir'd: "Afflict me not, dear wife, 125
With these vain griefs. He doth not live, that can disjoin my life
And this firm bosom, but my fate; and Fate, whose wings can fly?
Noble, ignoble, Fate controls. Once born, the best must die.
Go home, and set thy housewif'ry on these extremes of thought;
And drive war from them with thy maids; keep them from doing nought. 130
These will be nothing; leave the cares of war to men, and me
In whom, of all the Ilium race, they take their high'st degree."

On went his helm; his princess home, half cold with kindly fears;
When every fear turn'd back her looks, and every look shed tears.

ZEUS SENDS HERMES TO CALYPSO

(From translation of Homer's Odyssey, Bk. V.
1614)

Thus charged he; nor Argicides denied,
But to his feet his fair wing'd shoes he tied,
Ambrosian, golden; that in his command
Put either sea, or the unmeasured land,
With pace as speedy as a puft of wind. 5
Then up his rod went, with which he declined
The eyes of any waker, when he pleased,
And any sleeper, when he wish'd, diseased.
This took; he stoop'd Pieria, and thence Glid through the air, and Neptune's confluence, Kiss'd as he flew, and check'd the waves as
light 11
As any sea-mew in her fishing flight
Her thick wings sousing in the savoury seas.
Like her, he pass'd a world of wilderness;
But when the far-off isle he touch'd, he went 15
Up from the blue sea to the continent,
And reach'd the ample cavern of the Queen,
Whom he within found; without seldom seen.
A sun-like fire upon the hearth did flame;
The matter precious, and divine the frame; 20

Of cedar cleft and incense was the pile,
That breathed an odour round about the isle.
Herself was seated in an inner room,
Whom sweetly sing he heard, and at her loom,
About a curious web, whose yarn she threw 25
In with a golden shuttle.<sup>1</sup> A grove grew
In endless spring about her cavern round,
With odorous cypress, pines, and poplars,
crown'd,

Where hawks, sea-owls, and long-tongued
bittours<sup>2</sup> bred,

And other birds their shady pinions spread; 30
All fowls maritimal; none roosted there,
But those whose labours in the waters were.

A vine did all the hollow cave embrace,
Still green, yet still ripe bunches gave it brace.
Four fountains, one against another, pour'd 35
Their silver streams; and meadows all enflour'd
With sweet balm-gentle, and blue violets hid,
That deck'd the soft breasts of each fragrant mead.

Should any one, though he immortal were,
Arrive and see the sacred objects there, 40
He would admire them, and be over-joy'd;
And so stood Hermes' ravish'd powers employ'd.

CONTENT

(From Farewell to Folly, 1591)

Sweet are the thoughts that savour of content,
The quiet mind is richer than a crown,
Sweet are the nights in careless slumber spent,
The poor estate scorns fortune's angry
frown:

Such sweet content, such minds, such sleep, 5
such bliss,

Beggars enjoy, when princes oft do miss,

The homely<sup>1</sup> house that harbours quiet rest,
The cottage that affords no pride nor care,
The mean that grees<sup>2</sup> with country music best,
The sweet consort of mirth and modest fare,
Obscured life sets down a type of bliss: 11
A mind content both crown and kingdom is.

SONNET LI

(From Delia, Containing certain Sonnets, 1592)

Care-charmer Sleep, son of the sable Night,
Brother to Death, in silent darkness born:
Relieve my languish and restore the light;
With dark forgetting of my care, return, 5
And let the day be time enough to mourn
The shipwreck of my ill-adventured youth:

<sup>2</sup> The middle state, or modest circumstances. That best agrees, etc.

Let waking eyes suffice to wail their scorn
Without the torment of the night's untruth.
Cease dreams, the images of day desires,
To model forth the passions of the morrow; 10
Never let rising sun approve you liars,
To add more grief to aggravate my sorrow.
Still let me sleep, embracing clouds in vain,
And never wake to feel the day's disdain.

PROPHECY OF LITERATURE IN AMERICA

(From Musophilus, 1599)

Pow'r above powers! O heavenly Eloquence!
That with the strong rein of commanding words

Dost manage, guide, and master th' eminence
Of men's affections, more than all their swords!
Shall we not offer to thy excellence, 5
The richest treasure that our wit affords?

Thou that canst do much more with one poor
pen,

Than all the pow'rs of princes can effect;
And draw, divert, dispose and fashion men,
Better than force or rigour can direct! 10
Should we this ornament of glory then,
As th' unmaterial fruit of shades, neglect?

Or should we careless come behind the rest
In power of words, that go before in worth;
When as our accent's equal to the best, 15
Is able greater wonders to bring forth?
When all that ever hotter spir'its expressed,
Comes better'd by the patience of the north.

And who (in time) knows whither we may vent
The treasure of our tongue? To what strange shores 20

This gain of our best glory shall be sent,
T' enrich unknowing nations with our stores?
What worlds in th' unformed Occident,
May come refin'd with th' accents that are ours?

Or who can tell for what great work in hand 25
The greatness of our style is now ordain'd?
What pow'rs it shall bring in, what spir'its command?

What thoughts let out; what humours keep restrain'd?

What mischief it may pow'rfully withstand;
And what fair ends may thereby be attain'd? 30

TO THE LADY MARGARET, COUNTESS OF CUMBERLAND

He that of such a height hath built his mind,
And rear'd the dwelling of his thoughts so
strong,

As neither fear nor hope can shake the frame
Of his resolved powers; nor all the wind
Of vanity or malice pierce to wrong 5
His settled peace, or to disturb the same:
What a fair seat hath he, from whence he may
The boundless wastes and wilds of man survey!

And with how free an eye doth he look down
Upon these lower regions of turmoil? 10
Where all the storms of passions mainly beat
On flesh and blood: where honour, power, renown,
Are only gay afflictions, golden toil;
Where greatness stands upon as feeble feet
As frailty doth; and only great doth seem 15
To little minds, who do it so esteem.

He looks upon the mightiest monarch's wars
But only as on stately robberies;
Where evermore the fortune that prevails
Must be the right: the ill-succeeding mars 20
The fairest and the best-fac'd enterprise.
Great pirate Pompey lesser pirates quails:
Justice, he sees (as if seduced) still Conspires with power, whose cause must not be ill.

He sees the face of right t' appear as manifold 25
As are the passions of uncertain man;
Who puts it in all colours, all attires,
To serve his ends, and make his courses hold.
He sees, that let deceit work what it can,
Plot and contrive base ways to high desires; 30
That the all-guiding Providence doth yet
All disappoint, and mocks the smoke of wit.

Nor is he mov'd with all the thunder-cracks
Of tyrant's threats, or with the surly brow
Of Pow'r, that proudly sits on others' crimes: 35
Charg'd with more crying sins than those he checks.

The storms of sad confusion, that may grow
Up in the present for the coming times,
Appal not him; that hath no side at all,
But of himself, and knows the worst can 40
fall. . . .

And whereas none rejoice more in revenge;
Than women use to do; yet you well know,
That wrong is better cheek'd by being con-
temn'd,

Than being pursu'd; leaving him t' avenge,
To whom it appertains. Wherein you show 45
How worthily your clearness hath condemn'd
Base malediction, living in the dark,
That at the rays of goodness still doth bark.

Knowing the heart of man is set to be
The centre of this world, about the which 50
These revolutions of disturbances
Still roll; where all th' aspects of misery
Predominate: whose strong effects are such,
As he must bear, being pow'rless to redress:
And that unless above himself he can 55
Erect himself, how poor a thing is man.

And how turmoil'd they are that level lie
With earth, and cannot lift themselves from thence;

That never are at peace with their desires,
But work beyond their years; and ev'n deny 60
Dottage her rest, and hardly will dispense
With death. That when ability expires,
Desire lives still—So much delight they have,
To carry toil and travel to the grave.

TO HENRY WRIOTHESLY, EARL OF SOUTHAMPTON

Non ferat ullum ictum illæsa felicitas<sup>1</sup>

He who hath never war'd with misery,
Nor ever tugg'd with fortune and distress,
Hath had n' occasion, nor no field to try
The strength and forces of his worthiness. 5
Those parts of judgment which felicity
Keeps as conceal'd, affliction must express;
And only men show their abilities,
And what they are, in their extremities.

The world had never taken so full note
Of what thou art, had'st thou not been un-
done; 10

And only thy affliction hath begot
More fame, than thy best fortunes could have
done:

For ever by adversity are wrought
The greatest works of admiration;
And all the fair examples of renown, 15
Out of distress and misery are grown.

Mutius the fire, the tortures Regulus,
Did make the miracles of faith and zeal;
Exile renown'd and grac'd Rutilius:
Imprisonment and poison did reveal 20
The worth of Socrates. Fabritius'
Poverty did grace that commonweal,
More than all Sylla's riches got with strife;
And Cato's death did vie with Caesar's life.

Not to b' unhappy is unhappiness, 25
And mis'ry not to have known misery:
For the best way unto discretion is
The way that leads us by adversity,
And men are better show'd what is amiss,
By th' expert finger of calamity, 30
Than they can be with all that fortune brings,
Who never shows them the true face of things.

How could we know that thou couldst have endur'd,

With a repos'd cheer, wrong, and disgrace;
And with a heart and countenance assur'd, 35
Have look'd stern Death and horror in the face!
How should we know thy soul had been secur'd,
In honest counsels, and in way unbase;
Had'st thou not stood to show us what thou wer't,

By thy affliction that descry'd thy heart! 40

It is not but the tempest that doth show
The seaman's cunning; but the field that tries
The captain's courage; and we come to know
Best what men are, in their worst jeopardies.
For lo! how many have we seen to grow 45
To high renown from lowest miseries,
Out of the hands of Death? And many a one T' have been undone, had they not been undone?

<sup>1</sup> Unbroken prosperity is unable to bear any evil stroke.
Seneca, De Providentia.

He that endures for what his conscience knows
 Not to be ill, doth from a patience high 50
 Look only on the cause whereto he owes
 Those sufferings, not on his misery:
 The more he endures, the more his glory grows,
 Which never grows from imbecility:
 Only the best compos'd, and worthiest hearts, 55
 God sets to act the hard'st and constant'st parts.

SONNET LXI

(From Idea's Mirror, 1594)

Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part,
 Nay I have done, you get no more of me;
 And I am glad, yea glad with all my heart,
 That thus so cleanly I myself can free;
 Shake hands forever, cancel all our vows, 5
 And when we meet at any time again,
 Be it not seen in either of our brows
 That we one jot of former love retain.
 Now at the last gasp of Love's latest breath,
 When his pulse failing, Passion speechless lies, 10
 When Faith is kneeling by his bed of death,
 And Innocence is closing up his eyes:
 Now if thou would'st, when all have given him over,
 From death to life thou might'st him yet recover.

AGINCOURT

TO MY FRIENDS THE CAMBER-BRITONS<sup>1</sup> AND THEIR HARP(From Poems, Lyrics and Pastorals, 1605?)

Fair stood the wind for France,
 When we our sails advance,
 And now to prove our chance
 Longer not tarry, 5
 But put unto the main,
 At Caux, the mouth of Seine,
 With all his warlike train,
 Landed King Harry.

And taking many a fort,
 Furnished in warlike sort, 10
 Coming toward Agincourt
 In happy hour,
 Skirmishing day by day
 With those oppose his way,
 Where as the gen'ral lay 15
 With all his power:

Which in his height of pride,
 As Henry to deride,
 His ransom to provide
 Unto him sending; 20

Which he neglects the while,
 As from a nation vile,
 Yet with an angry smile,
 Their fall portending;

And, turning to his men, 25
 Quoth famous Henry then,
 "Though they to one be ten,
 Be not amazèd;
 Yet have we well begun,
 Battles so bravely won, 30
 Ever more to the sun
 By fame are raisèd.

"And for myself," quoth he,
 "This my full rest shall be,
 England ne'er mourn for me, 35
 Nor more esteem me.
 Victor I will remain,
 Or on this earth be slain,
 Never shall she sustain
 Loss to redeem me. 40

"Poyters and Cressy tell,
 When most their pride did swell,
 Under our swords they fell,
 No less our skill is 45
 Than when our grandsire great,
 Claiming the regal seat,
 In many a warlike feat
 Lopp'd the French lilies."

The Duke of York<sup>2</sup> so dread,
 The eager vaward led; 50
 With the main Henry sped,
 Amongst his henchmen.<sup>3</sup>
 Excester had the rear,
 A braver man not there,
 And now preparing were 55
 For the false Frenchman,

And ready to be gone,
 Armor on armor shone,
 Drum unto drum did groan,
 To hear was wonder; 60
 That with the cries they make
 The very earth did shake,
 Trumpet to trumpet spake,
 Thunder to thunder.

Well it thine age became, 65
 O noble Erpingham,<sup>4</sup>
 Thou did'st the signal frame
 Unto the forces;
 When from a meadow by,
 Like a storm suddenly, 70
 The English archery
 Stuck the French horses.

The Spanish yew so strong,
 Arrows a cloth-yard long,
 That like to serpents stong, 75
 Piercing the wether;

<sup>3</sup> Followers.

<sup>1</sup> The Britons of Cambria, or Wales, as distinguished from the Britons of Cornwall and Armorica. The harp was intimately associated with the Welsh poetry as it was with that of Celtic Ireland.

<sup>4</sup> Sir Thomas Erpingham, "who threw up his truncheon as a signal to the English forces, who lay in ambush, to advance."

None from his death now starts,
But playing manly parts,
And like true English hearts
Stuck close together. 80

When down their bows they threw,
And forth their bilbows<sup>5</sup> drew,
And on the French they flew:
No man was tardy;
Arms from the shoulders sent, 85
Scalps to the teeth were rent,
Down the French peasants went,
These were men hardy.

When now that noble king,
His broad sword brandishing, 90
Into the host did fling,
As to o'erwhelm it;
Who many a deep wound lent,
His arms with blood besprent,
And many a cruel dent 95
Bruised his helmet.

Gloster,<sup>6</sup> that duke so good,
Next of the royal blood,
For famous England stood,
With his brave brother, 100
Clarence, in steel most bright,
That yet a maiden knight,
Yet in this furious fight
Scarce such another.

Warwick in blood did wade, 105
Oxford the foes invade,
And cruel slaughter made,
Still as they ran up;
Suffolk his axe did ply,
Beaumont and Willoughby 110
Bear them right doughtily,
Ferrers and Fanhope.

On happy Crispin day<sup>7</sup>
Fought was this noble fray,
Which fame did not delay 115
To England to carry;
O when shall Englishmen,
With such acts fill a pen?
Or England breed again 120
Such a King Harry?

FROM THE "VIRGINIAN VOYAGE"

You brave heroic minds,
Worthy your countries name,
That honour still pursue,
Go, and subdue,
Whilst loit' ring hinds 5
Lurke here at home with shame.

Britons, you stay too long,
Quickly aboard bestow you,
And with a merry gale
Swell your stretch'd sail, 10
With vows as strong
As the winds that blow you.

Your course securely steer,
West and by south forth keep,
Rocks, lee-shores, nor shoals, 15
When Eolus scowls,
You need not fear,
So absolute the deep.

And cheerfully at sea,
Success you still intend, 20
To get the pearl and gold,
And ours to hold,
Virginia,
Earth's only paradise. . . .

When as the luscious smell
Of that delicious land,
Above the seas that flows,
The clear wind throws, 45
Your hearts to swell
Approaching the dear strand;

In kenning<sup>1</sup> of the shore
(Thanks to God first given),
O you the happy 'st men, 50
Be frolic then,
Let cannons roar,
Frighting the wide heaven.

And in regions far
Such heroes bring ye forth, 55
As those from whom we came,
And plant our name
Under that starre
Not known unto our North.

THE PASSIONATE SHEPHERD TO HIS LOVE(In The Passionate Pilgrim, 1599, enlarged form in England's Helicon, 1600)

Come live with me, and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove,
That valleys, groves,<sup>1</sup> hills and fields,
Woods or steepy mountains yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks 5
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses,
And a thousand fragrant posies, 10
A cap of flowers and a kirtle
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

<sup>1</sup> In sight, or view.<sup>1</sup> Groves is here a dissyllable.<sup>5</sup> Swords. From Bilboa in Spain, a town famous for its blades.<sup>6</sup> Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, younger brother of the king. Thomas, Duke of Clarence, alluded to here as Clarence, was also the King's brother.<sup>7</sup> The Feast of Crispin, Saint and martyr, which falls on Oct. 25th.

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair-lined slippers for the cold, 15
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy-buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
An if these pictures may thee move, 20
Come live with me and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning;<sup>2</sup>
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

PASSAGES FROM THE DRAMAS

AMBITION

(From Tamburlaine<sup>1</sup> the Great, Pt. II. Pub. 1590)

Nature that framed us of four elements,
Warring within our breasts for regiment,<sup>2</sup>
Doth teach us all to have aspiring minds:
Our souls, whose faculties can comprehend
The wondrous architecture of the world, 5
And measure every wandering planet's course,
Still climbing after knowledge infinite,
And always moving as the restless spheres,
Will us to wear ourselves, and never rest,
Until we reach the ripest fruit of all, 10
That perfect bliss and sole felicity,
The sweet fruition of an earthly crown.

TAMBURLAINE TO THE SUBJECT
KINGS<sup>1</sup>

(From the same, Act IV. iii.)

Holla, ye pampered jades of Asia!
What! can ye draw but twenty miles a day,
And have so proud a chariot at your heels,
And such a coachman as great Tamburlaine,
But from Asphaltis, where I conquered you, 5
To Byron here, where thus I honour you?
The horse that guide the golden eye of Heaven,
And blow the morning from their nosterils,
Making their fiery gait above the clouds,
Are not so honoured in their governor, 10
As you, ye slaves, in mighty Tamburlaine.
The headstrong jades of Thrace Alcides tamed,
That King Egeus fed with human flesh,
And made so wanton, that they knew their strengths,

<sup>2</sup> Rule.

Were not subdued with valour more divine 15
Than you by this unconquered arm of mine.
To make you fierce, and fit my appetite,
You shall be fed with flesh as raw as blood,
And drink in pails the strongest muscadell;
If you can live with it, then live, and draw 20
My chariot swifter than the racking clouds;
If not, then die like beasts, and fit for naught
But perches for the black and fatal ravens,
Thus am I right the highest scourge of Jove;
And see the figure of my dignity 25
By which I hold my name and majesty!

FAUSTUS' VISION OF HELEN

(From Doctor Faustus, Pub. 1604)

Was this the face that launched a thousand ships,
And burnt the topless towers of Ilium!
Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss.
Her lips suck forth my soul! see where it flies;
Come, Helen, come, give me my soul again. 5
Here will I dwell, for heaven is in these lips,
And all is dross that is not Helena.
I will be Paris, and for love of thee,
Instead of Troy, shall Wittenberg be sacked;
And I will combat with weak Menelaus, 10
And wear thy colours on my plumed crest:
Yea I will wound Achilles in the heel,
And then return to Helen for a kiss.
Oh! thou art fairer than the evening air
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars; 15
Brighter art thou than flaming Jupiter,
When he appeared to hapless Semele;
More lovely than the monarch of the sky
In wanton Arethusa's azure arms;
And none but thou shalt be my paramour! 20

FAUSTUS FULFILLS HIS COMPACT
WITH THE DEVIL

(From the same, Act V. sc. IV.)

Oh, Faustus!
Now hast thou but one bare hour to live,
And then thou must be damned perpetually.
Stand still you ever-moving spheres of heaven,<sup>1</sup>
That time may cease, and midnight never come. 5
Fair nature's eye, rise, rise again, and make Perpetual day; or let this hour be but
A year, a month, a week, a natural day,
That Faustus may repent and save his soul.
O lente! lente currite noctis equi! 10
The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike,
The devil will come, and Faustus must be damned.
Oh, I'll leap up to heaven!—Who pulls me
down?
See where Christ's blood streams in the firma-
ment:

<sup>1</sup> The transparent spheres which, according to the Ptolemaic system of astronomy envelope and move about the earth.

<sup>2</sup> O run slowly, slowly, ye coursers of night.

One drop of blood will save me: oh, my Christ!
Read not my heart for naming of my Christ;
Yet will I call on him. Oh, spare me Lucifer!—
Where is it now?—'tis gone!

And see, a threatening arm, an angry brow! 19
Mountains and hills, come, come and fall on me,
And hide me from the heavy wrath of heaven!
No!

Then will I headlong run into the earth:
Gape, earth! —O no, it will not harbour me.
You stars that reigned at my nativity, 25
Whose influence hath allotted death and hell,
Now draw up Faustus, like a foggy mist,
Into the entrails of yon labouring cloud;
That, when ye vomit forth into the air
My limbs may issue from your smoky mouths;
But let my soul mount and ascend to heaven. 31

(The clock strikes the half hour.)

Oh, half the hour is past, 'till all be past anon.
Oh! if my soul must suffer for my sin,
Impose some end to my incessant pain.

Let Faustus live in hell a thousand years— 35
A hundred thousand—and at last be saved:
No end is limited to damned souls.

Why wert thou not a creature wanting soul?
Or why is this immortal that thou hast?
Oh! Pythagorus<sup>3</sup> Metempsychosis! 40

Were that (but) true; this soul should fly from
me,

And I be changed into some brutish beast.
All beasts are happy, for when they die
Their souls are soon dissolved in elements;
But mine must live still to be plagued in hell. 45
Cursed be the parents that engendered me!
No, Faustus, curse thyself, curse Lucifer,
That hath deprived thee of the joys of heaven.

(The clock strikes twelve.)

It strikes, it strikes! now body, turn to air,
Or Lucifer will bear thee quick to hell. 50

(Thunder and rain.)

O soul! be changed into small water-drops,
And fall into the ocean; ne'er be found.

Enter the Devils

Oh! mercy, heaven, look not so fierce on me!
Adders and serpents, let me breathe awhile!—
Ugly hell, gape not!—Come not, Lucifer! 55
I'll burn my books!—Oh, Mephistophilis!

LEANDER SEES HERO AT THE FEAST AT SESTOS

(From Hero and Leander)

The men of wealthy Sestos every year, 91
For his sake whom their goddess held so dear,
Rose-cheeked Adonis, kept a solemn feast;
Thither resorted many a wandering guest
To meet their loves: such as had none at all, 95
Came lovers home from this great festival;
For every street, like to a firmament, Glistened with breathing stars, who, where they went,

<sup>3</sup> According to the doctrine of Metempsychosis, taught by the Greek philosopher Pythagoras and others, souls passed after death, either into the body of an animal, or of some human being, in reincarnation. This is sometimes called "the transmigration of souls."

Frighted the melancholy earth, which deemed
Eternal heaven to burn, for so it seemed, 100
As if another Phaeton had got
The guidance of the sun's rich chariot.
But, far above the loveliest, Hero shined,
And stole away the enchanted gazer's mind;
For the sea-nymph's inveigling harmony, 105
So was her beauty to the standers by;
Not that night-wandering, pale, and watery star

(When yawning dragons draw her thirling<sup>1</sup> car
From Latmus' mount up to the gloomy sky,
Where, crowned with blazing light and majesty, 110

She proudly sits) more over-rides the flood
Than she the hearts of those that near her stood.
Even as when gaudy nymphs pursue the chase,
Wretched Ixion's shaggy-footed race,
Incensed with savage heat, gallop amain 115
From steep pine-bearing mountains to the plain,

So ran the people forth to gaze upon her,
And all that viewed her were enamoured on her:
And as in fury of a dreadful fight,
Their fellows being slain or put to flight, 120
Poor soldiers stand with fear of death dreadstrooken,

So at her presence all surprised and taken,<sup>2</sup>
Await the sentence of her scornful eyes;
He whom she favours lives; the other dies:
There might you see one sigh; another rage; 125
And some, their violent passions to assuage,
Compile sharp satires; but, alas, too late!
For faithful love will never turn to hate;
And many, seeing great princes were denied,
Pined as they went, and thinking on her
died. 130

On this feast-day—oh, cursèd day and hour!—
Went Hero, thorough Sestos, from her tower
To Venus' temple, where unhappily,
As after chanced, they did each other spy.
So fair a church as this had Venus none: 135
The walls were of discoloured jasper-stone,
Wherein was Proteus carved; and over-head
A lively vine of green sea-agate spread,
Where by one hand light-headed Bacchus hung,
And with the other wine from grapes out-wring. 140

Of crystal shining fair the pavement was;
The town of Sestos called it Venus' glass. . . .

There Hero sacrificing turtles' blood, 153
Veiled to the ground, veiling her eyelids close;
And modestly they opened as she rose: 160
Thence flew Love's arrow with the golden head;
And thus Leander was enamoured.
Stone-still he stood, and evermore he gazed,
Till with the fire, that from his countenance
blazed,

Relenting gentle Hero's heart was strook: 165
Such force and virtue hath an amorous look.
It lies not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is over-ruled by fate,
When two are stript, long ere the course begin,
We wish that one should lose, the other win; 170

<sup>2</sup> Captured, taken captive.

And one especially do we affect
Of two gold ingots, like in each respect:
The reason no man knows; let it suffice,
What we behold is censured<sup>3</sup> by our eyes.
Where both deliberate, the love is slight: 175
Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?

SONGS

SILVIA

(From The Two Gentlemen of Verona, acted 1592-93)

Who is Silvia? what is she,
That all our swains commend her?
Holy, fair, and wise is she,
The heaven such grace did lend her,
That she might admired be. 5

Is she kind as she is fair?
For beauty lives with kindness:
Love doth to her eyes repair,
To help him of his blindness;
And, being help'd, inhabits there. 10

Then to Silvia let us sing,
That Silvia is excelling:
She excels each mortal thing,
Upon the dull earth dwelling:
To her let us garlands bring. 15

FAIRY SONG

(From A Midsummer Night's Dream, 1593-4)

Over hill, over dale,
Thorough bush, thorough briar,
Over park, over pale,
Thorough flood, thorough fire,
I do wander everywhere, 5
Swifter than the moon's sphere;
And I serve the fairy queen,
To dew her orbs upon the green:
The cowslips tall her pensioners be;
In their gold coats spots you see; 10
Those be rubies, fairy favours,
In those freckles live their savours:
I must go seek some dew-drops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.

YOU SPOTTED SNAKES, WITH DOUBLE TONGUE

(From the same)

You spotted snakes, with double tongue,
Thorny hedgehogs, be not seen;
Newts, and blind-worms do no wrong;
Come not near our fairy queen:

<sup>3</sup> Judged, estimated.

Chorus

Philomel, with melody 5
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby; lulla, lulla, lullaby;
Never harm, nor spell, nor charm,
Come our lovely lady nigh;
So, good night, with lullaby. 10

II

Weaving spiders, come not here:
Hence, you long-legg'd spinners, hence:
Beetles black, approach not near;
Worm, nor snail, do no offence.

Chorus

Philomel, with melody, etc.

FAIRIES SONG

(From the same)

Now the hungry lion roars,
And the wolf howls the moon;
Whilst the heavy ploughman snores,
All with weary task fordone.
Now the wasted brands do glow, 5
Whilst the scritch-owl, scritch'ing loud,
Puts the wretch, that lies in woe,
In remembrance of a shroud.
Now it is the time of night,
That the graves, all gaping wide, 10
Every one lets forth his sprite,
In the church-way paths to glide:
And we fairies, that do run
By the triple Hecate's team,
From the presence of the sun, 15
Following darkness like a dream,
Now are frolic; not a mouse
Shall disturb this hallow'd house:
I am sent with broom before,
To sweep the dust behind the door. 20

Through the house give glimmering light,
By the dead and drowsy fire;
Every elf, and fairy sprite,
Hop as light as bird from briar;
And this ditty, after me, 25
Sing and dance it trippingly.
First, rehearse this song by rote:
To each word a warbling note,
Hand in hand, with fairy grace,
Will we sing, and bless this place. 30

UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE

(From As You Like It, acted 1599)

Under the greenwood tree
Who loves to lie with me,
And turn his merry note
Unto the sweet bird's throat,
Come hither, come hither, come hither:
Here shall he see 6
No enemy

But winter and rough weather.
 Who doth ambition shun
 And loves to live i' the sun, 10
 Seeking the food he eats
 And pleas'd with what he gets,
 Come hither, come hither, come hither:
 Here shall he see
 No enemy 15
 But winter and rough weather.

O MISTRESS MINE, WHERE ARE YOU ROAMING

(From Twelfth Night, c. 1601)

O mistress mine, where are you roaming?
 O, stay and hear; your true love's coming,
 That can sing both high and low:
 Trip no further, pretty sweeting;
 Journeys end in lovers' meeting, 5
 Every wise man's son doth know.

What is love? 'Tis not hereafter:
 Present mirth hath present laughter;
 What's to come is still unsure:
 In delay there lies no plenty; 10
 Then come kiss me, sweet and twenty,
 Youth's a stuff will not endure.

TAKE, OH, TAKE THOSE LIPS AWAY

(From Measure for Measure, 1603)

Take, oh take those lips away,
 That so sweetly were forsworn;
 And those eyes, the break of day,
 Lights that do mislead the morn;
 But my kisses bring again, bring again. 5
 Seals of love, but seal'd in vain, seal'd in vain.

HARK, HARK, THE LARK

(From Cymbeline, 1609)

Hark! hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings,
 And Phoebus 'gins arise,
 His steeds to water at those springs
 On chalied flowers that lies;
 And winking Mary-buds<sup>1</sup> begin to ope their 5
 golden eyes;
 With everything that pretty is—My lady sweet, arise: Arise, arise.

DIRGE

(From the same)

Fear no more the heat of the sun
 Nor the furious winter's rages;
 Thou thy worldly task hast done,
 Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages:
 Golden lads and girls all must, 5
 As chimney-sweepers, come to dust.

<sup>1</sup> Marigold.

Fear no more the frown o' the great,
 Thou art past the tyrants' stroke;
 Care no more to clothe, and eat;
 To thee the reed is as the oak: 10
 The sceptre, learning, physic, must
 All follow this, and come to dust.

Fear no more the light'ning flash;
 Nor the all-dreaded thunder-stone;
 Fear not slander, censure rash;
 Thou hast finished joy and moan: 16
 All lovers young, all lovers must Consign to thee, and come to dust.
 No excoriser harm thee!
 Nor no witchcraft charm thee! 20
 Ghost unlaid forbear thee!
 Nothing ill come near thee!
 Quiet consummation have;
 And renowned be thy grave!

A SEA DIRGE

(From The Tempest, 1610)

Full fathom five thy father lies;
 Of his bones are coral made;
 Those are pearls that were his eyes:
 Nothing of him that doth fade,
 But doth suffer a sea-change 5
 Into something rich and strange.
 Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell:
 Ding-dong.
 Hark! now I hear them—Ding-dong bell.

ARIEL'S SONG

(From the same)

Where the bee sucks, there suck I:
 In a cowslip's bell I lie;
 There I couch when owls do cry.
 On the bat's back I do fly
 After summer merrily. 5
 Merrily, merrily shall I live now
 Under the blossom that hangs on the bough.

CRABBED AGE AND YOUTH

(From The Passionate Pilgrim, pub. 1599)

Crabbed age and youth
 Cannot live together;
 Youth is full of pleasance;
 Age is full of care;
 Youth like summer morn, 5
 Age like winter weather;
 Youth like summer brave;
 Age like winter bare.
 Youth is full of sport,
 Age's breath is short, 10
 Youth is nimble; age is lame.
 Youth is hot and bold,
 Age is weak and cold;
 Youth is wild, and age is tame. 15
 Age, I do abhor thee,

Youth, I do adore thee,
 O, my love, my love is young!
 Age, I do defy thee;
 O sweet shepherd, hie thee,
 For methinks thou stay'st too long! 20

SONNETS

(From Sonnets, pub. 1609)

XV

When I consider everything that grows
 Holds in perfection but a little moment,
 That this huge stage presenteth naught but shows

Whereon the stars in secret influence comment;
 When I perceive that men as plants increase, 5
 Cheered and check'd even by the selfsame sky,
 Vaunt in their youthful sap, at height decrease,
 And wear their brave state out of memory;
 Then the conceit of this inconstant stay
 Sets you most rich in youth before my sight, 10
 Where wasteful Time debateth with Decay,
 To change your day of youth to sullied night;
 And all in war with Time for love of you,
 As he takes from you, I engrave you new.

XXVIII

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
 Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
 Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
 And summer's lease hath all too short a date:
 Sometimes too hot the eye of heaven shines, 5
 And often is his gold complexion dimm'd;
 And every fair from fair sometime declines,
 By chance or nature's changing course untrimm'd:

But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
 Nor lose possession of that fair thou owest, 10
 Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his
 shade,
 When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st;
 So long as men can breathe, or eyes can see
 So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

XXIX

When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
 I all alone beweep my outcast state,
 And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless
 cries,

And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
 Wishing me like to one more rich in hope, 5
 Featured like him, like him with friends possess'd,

Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,
 With what I most enjoy contented least;
 Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
 Haply I think on thee, and then my state, 10
 Like to the lark at break of day arising From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate:

For thy sweet love rememb'ed such wealth brings
 That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

XXX

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
 I summon up remembrance of things past,
 I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
 And with old woes new wail my dear time's
 waste:

Then can I drown an eye, unused to flow, 5
 For precious friends hid in death's dateless
 night,

And weep afresh love's long since cancell'd woe,
 And moan the expense of many a vanish'd
 sight:

Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
 And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er 10

The sad account of fore-bemoaned moan,
 Which I new pay as if not paid before.
 But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
 All losses are restored and sorrows end.

XXXIII

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
 Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
 Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
 Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
 Anon permit the basest clouds to ride 5
 With ugly rack on his celestial face,
 And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
 Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace:
 Even so my sun one early morn did shine
 With all-triumphant splendour on my brow; 10
 But, out, alack! he was but one hour mine,
 The region cloud hath mask'd him from me
 now.

Yet him for this my love no whit disdaineth;
 Suns of the world may stain when heaven's sun staineth.

LV

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
 Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rime;
 But you shall shine more bright in these contents

Than unswept stone, besmear'd with sluttish
 time.

When wasteful war shall statues overturn, 5
 And broils root out the work of masonry, Nor Mars his sword nor war's quick fire shall burn

The living record of your memory.
 'Gainst death and all-oblivious enmity Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room 10

Even in the eyes of all posterity
 That wear this world out to the ending doom.
 So, till the judgment that yourself arise,
 You live in this, and dwell in lover's eyes.

LX

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled
 shore,

So do our minutes hasten to their end;
 Each changing place with that which goes
 before,
 In sequent toil all forwards do contend.

Nativity, once in the main of light, 5
 Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crown'd,
 Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
 And Time that gave doth now his gift confound.
 Time doth transfix the flourish set on youth
 And delves the parallels in beauty's brow, 10
 Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
 And nothing stands but for his scythe to mow:
 And yet to times in hope my verse shall stand,
 Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

LXV

Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea,
 But sad mortality o'ersways their power,
 How with this rage shall beauty hold a plea,
 Whose action is no stronger than a flower?
 O, how shall summer's honey breath hold out 5
 Against the wreckful siege of battering days,
 When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
 Nor gates of steel so strong, but Time decays?
 O fearful meditation! where, alack,
 Shall Time's best jewel from Time's chest lie hid? 10
 Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back?
 Or who his spoil of beauty can forbid?
 O, none, unless this miracle have might,
 That in black ink my love may still shine bright.

LXVI

Tired with all these, for restful death I cry,
 As, to behold desert a beggar born,
 And needy nothing trimm'd in jollity,
 And purest faith unhappily forsworn;
 And gilded honour shamefully misplaced, 5
 And maiden virtue rudely strumpeted,
 And right perfection wrongfully disgraced,
 And strength by limping sway disabled,
 And art made tongue-tied by authority,
 And folly, doctor-like, controlling skill, 10
 And simple truth miscall'd simplicity,
 And captive good attending captain ill:
 Tired with all these, from these would I be gone,
 Save that, to die, I leave my love alone.

LXXIII

That time of year thou may'st in me behold
 When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold, Bare ruin'd choirs, where late the sweet birds sang.
 In me thou see'st the twilight of such day 5
 As after sunset fadeth in the west;
 Which by and by black night doth take away,
 Death's second self, that seals up all in rest.
 In me thou see'st the glowing of such fire,
 That on the ashes of his youth doth lie, 10
 As the death-bed whereon it must expire,
 Consumed with that which it was nourish'd by.
 This thou perceivest, which makes thy love more strong,
 To love that well which thou must leave ere long.

CXI

O, for my sake do you with Fortune chide, a
 The guilty goddess of my harmful deeds, sh
 That did not better for my life provide Than public means which public manners breeds, b
 Thence comes it that my name receives a brand, c 5
 And almost thence my nature is subdued d
 To what it works in, like the dyer's hand; e
 Pity me then and wish I were renew'd; d
 Whilst, like a willing patient, I will drink e
 Potions of eisel, 'gainst my strong infection; f 10
 No bitterness that I will bitter think, e
 Nor double penance, to correct correction. f
 Pity me then, dear friend, and I assure ye
 Even that your pity is enough to cure me. g

CXVII

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
 Admit impediments. Love is not love
 Which alters when it alteration finds,
 Or bends with the remover to remove:
 O, no! It is an ever-fixed mark, 5
 That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
 It is the star to every wandering bark,
 Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.
 Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
 Within his bending sickle's compass come; 10
 Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks;
 But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
 If this be error and upon me proved,
 I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

CXLVI

Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth,
 (Press'd by) these rebel powers that thee array,
 Why dost thou pine within and suffer dearth,
 Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
 Why so large cost, having so short a lease, 5
 Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
 Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
 Eat up thy charge? Is this thy body's end?
 Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
 And let that pine to aggravate thy store; 10
 Buy terms divine in selling hours of dress;
 Within be fed, without be rich no more;
 So shalt thou feed on Death, that feeds on
 men,
 And Death once dead, there's no more dying
 then.

FROM THE DRAMAS

THE SHEPHERD'S LIFE

HENRY VI.'S SOLILOQUY AT THE BATTLE OF TOWTON

(From III Henry VI., Act II. v., 1590-92)

This battle fares like to the morning's war,
 When dying clouds contend with growing light;
 What time the shepherd, blowing of his nails,
 Can neither call it perfect day nor night.

Now sways it this way, like a mighty sea, 5
 Forc'd by the tide to combat with the wind;
 Now sways it that way, like the self-same sea
 Forc'd to retire by the fury of the wind:
 Sometime, the flood prevails; and then, the wind:

Now, one the better, then, another best; 10
 Both tugging to be victors, breast to breast,
 Yet neither conqueror, nor conquered:
 So is the equal poise of this fell war.
 Here on this molehill will I sit me down.
 To whom God will, there be the victory! 15
 For Margaret my queen, and Clifford too,
 Have chid me from the battle; swearing both
 They prosper best of all when I am thence.
 Would I were dead! if God's good will were so:
 For what is in this world but grief and woe? 20
 O God! methinks it were a happy life,
 To be no better than a homely swain:
 To sit upon a hill, as I do now,
 To carve out dials quaintly, point by point,
 Thereby to see the minutes how they run: 25
 How many make the hour full complete;
 How many hours bring about the day,
 How many days will finish up the year,
 How many years a mortal man may live.
 When this is known, then to divide the times: 30
 So many hours must I tend my flock;
 So many hours must I take my rest;
 So many hours must I contemplate;
 So many hours must I sport myself;
 So many days my ewes have been with young;
 So many weeks ere the poor fools will yean; 36
 So many years ere I shall shear the fleece;
 So minutes, hours, days, weeks, months, and years,

Pass'd over to the end they were created,
 Would bring white hairs unto a quiet grave. 40
 Ah, what a life were this! how sweet! how lovely!
 Gives not the hawthorne bush a sweeter shade
 To shepherds, looking on their silly sheep,
 Than doth a rich embroider'd canopy
 To kings, that fear their subjects' treachery? 45
 O, yes it doth; a thousand-fold it doth.
 And to conclude,—the shepherd's homely
 curds,

His cold thin drink out of his leather bottle,
 His wonted sleep under a fresh tree's shade,
 All which secure and sweetly he enjoys, 50
 Is far beyond a prince's delicacies,
 His viands sparkling in a golden cup;
 His body couched in a curious bed,
 When, care, mistrust, and treason wait on him.

ENGLAND

(From Richard II., Act II., i., 1594)

This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle, 40
 This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
 This other Eden, demi-paradise;
 This fortress, built by nature for herself,
 Against infection and the hand of war;
 This happy breed of men, this little world; 45
 This precious stone set in the silver sea,
 Which serves it in the office of a wall,

Or as a moat defensive to a house,
 Against the envy of less happier lands;
 This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England. 50

SLEEP

(From II Henry IV., Act III., i., 1597-98)

How many thousand of my poorest subjects 4
 Are at this hour asleep! O sleep, O gentle sleep,
 Nature's soft nurse, how have I frighted thee, 6
 That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down,
 And steep my senses in forgetfulness?
 Why rather, sleep, liest thou in smoky cribs,
 Upon uneasy pallets stretching thee, 10
 And hush'd with buzzing night-flies to thy slumber,
 Than in the perfum'd chambers of the great,
 Under the canopies of costly state,
 And lull'd with sounds of sweetest melody?
 O thou dull god, why liest thou with the vile, 15
 In loathsome beds; and leav'st the kingly couch,

A watch-case, or a common 'larum-bell?
 Wilt thou upon the high and giddy mast
 Seal up the ship-boy's eyes, and rock his brains
 In cradle of the rude imperious surge, 20
 And in the visitation of the winds,
 Who take the ruffian billows by the top,
 Curling their monstrous heads, and hanging
 them

With deaf'ning clamours in the slippery clouds,
 That, with the hurly, death itself awakes? 25
 Canst thou, O partial sleep! give thy repose
 To the wet sea-boy in an hour so rude;
 And, in the calmest and most stillest night,
 With all appliances and means to boot,
 Deny it to a king? Then, happy low, lie down!
 Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown. 31

HENRY V'S ADDRESS TO HIS SOLDIERS BEFORE HARFLEUR

(From Henry V., Act III., i., 1599)

Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once
 more;
 Or close the wall up with our English dead!
 In peace, there's nothing so becomes a man
 As modest stillness and humility:
 But when the blast of war blows in our ears, 5
 Then imitate the action of the tiger;
 Stiffen the sinews, summon up the blood,
 Disguise fair nature with hard-favour'd rage:
 Then lend the eye a terrible aspect;
 Let it pry through the portage of the head, 10
 Like the brass cannon; let the brow o'erwhelm
 it,

As fearfully as does a galled rock
 O'erhang and jutty his confounded base,
 Swill'd with the wild and wasteful ocean.
 Now set the teeth, and stretch the nostril wide;
 Hold hard the breath, and bend up every spirit 16
 To his full height! On, on, you nobless English,

Whose blood is fet from fathers of war-proof!
 Fathers that, like so many Alexanders,
 Have in these parts from morn till even fought,
 And sheath'd their swords for lack of argument.
 Dishonour not your mothers; now attest 22
 That those whom you call'd fathers did beget
 you!

Be copy now to men of grosser blood,
 And teach them how to war!—And you, good yeomen, 25
 Whose limbs were made in England, show us
 here

The mettle of your pasture; let us swear
 That you are worth your breeding; which I doubt not;

For there is none of you so mean and base
 That hath not noble lustre in your eyes. 30
 I see you stand like greyhounds in the slips,
 Straining upon the start. The game's afoot;
 Follow your spirit; and, upon this charge,
 Cry—God for Harry! England! and Saint George!

DEATH AND HEREAFTER

(From Measure for Measure, Act III., i., 1603)

Ay, but to die, and go we know not where;
 To lie in cold obstruction, and to rot;
 This sensible warm motion to become 120
 A kneaded clod; and the delighted spirit
 To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
 In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice;
 To be imprison'd in the viewless winds, 124
 And blown with restless violence round about
 The pendant world; or to be worse than worst
 Of those, that lawless and uncertain thoughts
 Imagine howling!—'tis too horrible!
 The weariest and most loathed worldly life,
 That age, ache, penury, and imprisonment 130
 Can lay on nature, is a paradise
 To what we fear of death.

ISABELLA'S PLEA FOR MERCY

(From the same, Act II., ii.)

He's sentenc'd; 'tis too late.
 Too late? why, no, I, that do speak a word,
 May call it back again: Well believe this,
 No ceremony that to great ones 'longs,
 Not the king's crown, nor the deputed sword, 60
 The marshal's truncheon, nor the judge's robe,
 Become them with one half so good a grace
 As mercy does.
 If he had been as you, and you as he,
 You would have slipp'd like him; but he, like
 you, 65
 Would not have been so stern. . . .

Alas! Alas! 72

Why, all the souls that were, were forfeit once;
 And He that might the vantage best have took Found out the remedy; How would you be,
 If He, which is the top of judgment, should

But judge you as you are? O, think on that;
 And mercy then will breathe within your lips,
 Like a man new made. 79

PROSPERO'S SOLILOQUY

(From The Tempest, Act IV., i., 1610)

Our revels now are ended: these our actors,
 As I foretold you, were all spirits, and
 Are melted into air, into thin air; 150
 And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
 The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces,
 The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
 Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve;
 And, like this insubstantial pageant faded, 155
 Leave not a wrack behind: We are such stuff
 As dreams are made on, and our little life
 Is rounded with a sleep.

DEATH'S SUMMONS

(From Summer's Last Will and Testament, 1600)

Adieu, farewell, earth's bliss,
 This world uncertain is:
 Fond <sup>1</sup> are life's lustful joys,
 Death proves them all but toys.
 None from his darts can fly:
 I am sick, I must die. 5
 Lord, have mercy on us!

Rich men, trust not in wealth,
 Gold cannot buy you health;
 Physic himself must fade; 10
 All things to end are made;
 The plague <sup>2</sup> full swift goes by:
 I am sick, I must die.
 Lord, have mercy on us!

Beauty is but a flower, 15
 Which wrinkles will devour:
 Brightness falls from the air;
 Queens have died young and fair;
 Dust hath closed Helen's eye:
 I am sick, I must die. 20
 Lord, have mercy on us!

Strength stoops unto the grave;
 Worms feed on Hector brave;
 Swords may not fight with fate;
 Earth still holds ope her gate; 25
 Come, come, the bells do cry.
 I am sick, I must die!
 Lord, have mercy on us!

Wit with his wantonness,
 Tasteth death's bitterness; 30
 Hell's executioner
 Hath no ears for to hear

<sup>1</sup> Foolish.

<sup>2</sup> London was suffering from the plague in 1598, when the play from which this song is taken was produced.

What vain art can reply;
I am sick, I must die:
Lord, have mercy on us!

35

Haste therefore each degree
To welcome destiny!
Heaven is our heritage,
Earth but a player's stage;
Mount we unto the sky:
I am sick, I must die.
Lord, have mercy on us!

THE COMING OF WINTER

(From the same)

Autumn hath all the summer's fruitful treasure;
Gone is our sport, fled is our Croydon's pleasure!
Short days, sharp days, long nights come on apace:

Ah, who shall hide us from the winter's face?
Cold doth increase, the sickness will not cease, 5
And here we lie, God knows, with little ease.

From winter, plague and pestilence, good
Lord, deliver us!

London doth mourn, Lambeth is quite forlorn!
Trades cry, woe worth that ever they were born!

The want of term is town and city's harm;<sup>1</sup> 10
Close chambers we do want to keep us warm.
Long banished must we live from our friends;
This low-built house will bring us to our ends.

From winter, plague and pestilence, good
Lord, deliver us!

O SWEET CONTENT

(From The Patient Grissell, acted 1599)

Art thou poor, yet hast thou golden slumbers?
O sweet content!

Art thou rich, yet is thy mind perplexèd?
O punishment!

Dost thou laugh to see how fools are vexèd 5
To add to golden numbers, golden numbers?
O sweet content! O sweet, O sweet content!

Work apace, apace, apace, apace;
Honest labor bears a lovely face;

Then hey nonny nonny, hey nonny nonny! 10

Canst drink the waters of the crispèd spring?
O sweet content!

Swim'st thou in wealth, yet sink'st in thine own tears?

O punishment!
Then he that patiently want's burden bears 15

No burden bears, but is a king, a king!
O sweet content! O sweet, O sweet content!

Work apace, apace, apace, apace;
Honest labor bears a lovely face;

Then hey nonny nonny, hey nonny nonny! 20

<sup>1</sup> In this year, 1598, the Michaelmas (autumn) Term, or session of the Law Court, was held in St. Albans instead of London, in consequence of the plague.

SAINT HUGH!

(From The Shoemaker's Holiday, 1594)

Cold's the wind, and wet's the rain,
Saint Hugh be our good speed!
Ill is the weather that bringeth no gain,
Nor helps good hearts in need.

Troll the bowl,<sup>1</sup> the jolly nut-brown bowl, 5
And here kind mate to thee!
Let's sing a dirge for Saint Hugh's soul,
And down it merrily.

Down-a-down, hey, down-a-down.
Hey derry derry down-a-down. 10

Ho! well done, to me let come,
Ring compass, gentle joy!<sup>2</sup>
Troll the bowl, the nut-brown bowl,
And here kind mate to thee!

Cold's the wind, and wet's the rain, 15
Saint Hugh! be our good speed;
Ill is the weather that bringeth no gain,
Nor helps good hearts in need.

AN ELEGY UPON THE DEATH OF THE LADY MARKHAM

(First published 1633)

Man is the world, and death the ocean
To which God gives the lower parts of man.
This sea environs all, and though as yet
God hath set marks and bounds 'twixt us and it,
Yet doth it roar and gnaw, and still pretend 5
To break our bank, where'er it takes a friend:
Then our land-waters (tears of passion) vent;
Our waters then above our firmament—
Tears, which our soul doth for her sin let fall,—
Take all a brackish taste, and funeral. 10
And even those tears, which should wash sin, are sin.

We, after God, new drown our world again.
Nothing but man of all envenom'd things,
Doth work upon itself with inborn stings.
Tears are false spectacles; we cannot see 15
Through passion's mist, what we are, or what she.

In her this sea of death hath made no breach;
But as the tide doth wash the shining beach,
And leaves embroider'd works upon the sand,
So is her flesh refin'd by Death's cold hand. 20
As men of China, after an age's stay,
Do take up porcelain, where they buried clay,
So at this grave, her limbec (which refines
The diamonds, rubies, sapphires, pearls and mines,

Of which this flesh was) her soul shall inspire 25
Flesh of such stuff, as God, when His last fire

<sup>2</sup> Let the bowl, (the gentle joy) come to me; let it circle or ring the compass, or circle, formed by those about the table. To ring compass, was therefore equivalent to let the bowl go round, or circulate freely.

- Annuls this world, to recompense it, shall Make and name them th' elixir of this all.
They say the sea, when th' earth it gains, loseth too;
If carnal Death, the younger brother, do 30
Usurp the body; our soul, which subject is
To th' elder Death by sin, is free by this;
They perish both, when they attempt the just;
For graves our trophies are, and both Death's dust.
So, unobnoxious now, she hath buried both; 35
For none to death sins, that to sin is loath,
Nor do they die, which are not loath to die;
So she hath this and that virginity.
Grace was in her extremely diligent,
That kept her from sin, yet made her repent. 40
Of what small spots pure white complains!
Alas!
How little poison cracks a crystal glass!
She sinn'd, but just enough to let us see
That God's word must be true,—all sinners be.
So much did zeal her conscience rarify, 45
That extreme truth lack'd little of a lie,
Making omissions acts; laying the touch
Of sin on things, that sometimes may be such.
As Moses' cherubims, whose natures do
Surpass all speed, by him are wing'd too, 50
So would her soul, already in heaven, seem then
To climb by tears the common stairs of men.
How fit she was for God, I am content
To speak, that Death his vain haste may repent;
How fit for us, how even and how sweet, 55
How good in all her titles, and how meet
To have reform'd this forward heresy,
That women can no parts of friendship be;
How moral, how divine, shall not be told,
Lest they, that hear her virtues, think her old:
And lest we take Death's part, and make him glad 61
Of such a prey, and to his triumphs add.

A VALEDICTION FORBIDDING MOURNING

(Sometimes called "Upon Parting from his Mistress," written, 1612?)

- As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
"Now his breath goes," and some say, "No;"
So let us melt, and make no noise, 5
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move;
'Twere profanation of our joys,
To tell the laity our love.
Moving of th' earth brings harm and fears, 10
Men reckon what it did, and meant;
But trepidations of the spheres,
Though greater far, are innocent.
Dull sublunary Lovers' love,
(Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
Absence; for that it doth remove 15
Those things which elemented it.
But we, by a love so far refin'd
That ourselves know now what it is,
Inter-assured of the mind
Careless eyes, lips, and hands, to miss. 20
Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.
If they be two, they are two so 25
As stiff twin compasses are two;
Thy soul, the fixt foot, makes no show,
To move, but doth if th' other do.
And though it in the centre sit.
Yet when the other far doth roam, 30
It leans and harkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.
Such wilt thou be to me, who must
Like th' other foot, obliquely run;
Thy firmness makes my circle just, 35
And makes me end where I begun.
SONG
(From Poems, with Elegies on the Author's Death, 1633)
Sweetest Love, I do not go
For weariness of thee,
Nor in hope the world can show
A fitter Love for me;
But since that I 5
Must die at last, 'tis best
Thus to use myself in jest,
Thus by feign'd death to die.
Yesternight the sun went hence,
And yet is here to-day; 10
He hath no desire nor sense,
Nor half so short a way.
Then fear not me;
But believe that I shall make
Hastier journeys, since I take 15
More wings and spurs than he.
O how feeble is man's power,
That, if good fortune fall,
Cannot add another hour,
Nor a lost hour recall. 20
But come bad chance,
And we join to it our strength,
And we teach it art and length,
Itself o'er us t' advance.
When thou sigh'st, thou sigh'st no wind, 25
But sigh'st my soul away;
When thou weep'st, unkindly kind,
My life's-blood doth decay.

It cannot be
That thou lov'st me as thou say'st, 30
If in thine my life thou waste
That art the best of me.

Let not thy divining heart
Forethink me any ill;
Destiny may take thy part 35
And may thy fears fulfil;
But think that we
Are but turned aside to sleep:
They, who one another keep Alive, ne'er parted be. 40

SONNET X.—ON DEATH

(From Holy Sonnets, written before 1607)

Death, be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou art not so;
For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
Die not, poor Death; nor yet cans't thou kill
me.
From rest and sleep, which but thy picture be, 5
Much pleasure, then from thee much more must flow:
And soonest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.
Thou art slave to Fate, chance, kings, and desperate men, 9
And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell,
And poppy or charms can make us sleep as well,
And better than thy stroke; why swell'st thou,
then?
One short sleep pass, we wake eternally,
And Death shall be no more; Death, thou shalt die.

A HYMN TO GOD THE FATHER

(First published 1631)

Wilt Thou forgive that sin where I begun,
Which was my sin, though it were done before?
Wilt Thou forgive that sin, through which I run
And do run still, though still I do deplore?
When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done;
For I have more. 6
Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I have won
Others to sin, and made my sins their door?
Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I did shun
A year or two, but wallow'd in, a score? 10
When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done;
For I have more.

I have a sin of fear, that when I have spun
My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
But swear by Thyself, that at my death Thy
Son 15
Shall shine, as He shines now and heretofore:
And having done that, Thou hast done;
I fear no more.

Ben Jonson

1573-1637

TO THE MEMORY OF MY BELOVED MASTER WIL-LIAM SHAKESPEARE, AND WHAT HE HATH LEFT US

(From First Folio edition of Shakespeare, 1623)

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name,
Am I thus ample to thy book and fame;
While I confess thy writings to be such,
As neither Man nor Muse can praise too much.
'Tis true, and all men's suffrage. But these ways 5

Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise;
For silliest ignorance on these may light,
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right;
Or blind affection, which doth ne'er advance
The truth, but gropes, and urgeth all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise, 11
And think to ruin where it seemed to raise. . . .
But thou art proof against them and, indeed, 15
Above the ill fortune of them, or the need.
I therefore will begin: Soul of the age!
The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage!
My SHAKESPEARE, rise! I will not lodge thee by<sup>1</sup>
Chaucer, or Spenser, or bid Beaumont lie 20
A little further, to make thee a room:
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
Thou art alive still while thy book doth live,
And we have visits to read, and praise to give.
That I not mix thee so my brain excuses,— 25
I mean with great but disproportioned Muses;
For if I thought my judgment were of years,<sup>2</sup>
I should commit thee surely with thy peers,
And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine,
Or sporting Kyd,<sup>3</sup> or Marlowe's mighty line. 30
And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek,

From thence to honour thee I would not seek
For names, but call forth thund'ring Æschylus,<sup>4</sup>

Euripides, and Sophocles to us,
Pacuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead, 35
To life again, to hear thy buskin<sup>5</sup> tread,
And shake a stage; or when thy socks were on,
Leave thee alone for a comparison
Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.
Triumph, my Britain, thou hast one to show, 41
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe.

<sup>1</sup>Chaucer, Spenser and Beaumont are buried near each other in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. Proximity to the tomb of Chaucer, the first great English poet, was considered as a great honor. Spenser had been granted this in 1599, and Beaumont in 1616.

<sup>3</sup>A satirical play upon the dramatist's name, since Thomas Kyd was anything but "Sporting," being chiefly known as the author of tragedies.

<sup>4</sup>The three great poets, Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, represent three stages in the development of the Greek tragic drama; so Pacuvius, Accius, and "him of Cordova" (Seneca) stand in a similar manner for Roman tragedy-writing at successive epochs.

<sup>5</sup>The ancients are summoned to hear Shakespeare both as a tragic and a comic writer; the buskin, or shoe worn by Greek and Roman actors in tragedy, stands for tragedy; as the sock worn for comedy, means comedy.

He was not of an age, but for all time!
 And all the Muses still were in their prime,
 When, like Apollo, he came forth to warm 45
 Our ears, or like a Mercury to charm!
 Nature herself was proud of his designs,
 And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines,
 Which were so richly spun, and woven so fit,
 As, since, she will vouchsafe no other wit. 50
 The merry Greek, tart Aristophanes,
 Neat Terence, witty Plautus, now not please;
 But antiquated and deserted lie,
 As they were not of Nature's family.
 Yet must I not give Nature all; thy Art, 55
 My gentle Shakespeare, must enjoy a part.
 For though the poet's matter nature be,
 His art doth give the fashion; and that he
 Who casts to write a living line, must sweat
 (Such as thine are) and strike the second heat
 Upon the Muses' anvil, turn the same, 61
 And himself with it, that he thinks to frame;
 Or for the laurel he may gain a scorn;
 For a good poet's made, as well as born.
 And such wert thou! Look, how the father's face 65
 Lives in his issue, even so the race
 Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
 In his well turnèd and true filèd lines,
 In each of which he seems to shake a lance,
 As brandished at the eyes of ignorance. 70
 Sweet Swan of Avon! what a sight it were
 To see thee in our waters yet appear,
 And make those flights upon the banks of Thames,
 That so did take Eliza and our James!
 But stay, I see thee in the hemisphere 75
 Advanced, and made a constellation there!
 Shine forth, thou Star of Poets, and with rage
 Or influence chide or cheer the drooping stage,
 Which, since thy flight from hence, hath mourned like night,
 And despairs day but for thy volume's light. 80

SONG.—TO CYNTHIA

(From Cynthia's Revels, 1600)

Queen and huntress, chaste and fair,
 Now the sun is laid to sleep;
 Seated in thy silver chair,
 State in wonted manner keep:
 Hesperus entreats thy light,
 Goddess excellently bright. 5

Earth, let not thy envious shade
 Dare itself to interpose;
 Cynthia's shining orb was made
 Heaven to clear, when day did close;
 Bless us then with wished sight,
 Goddess excellently bright. 10

Lay thy bow of pearl apart,
 And thy crystal-shining quiver;
 Give unto the flying hart
 Space to breathe, how short soever:
 Thou that makest a day of night,
 Goddess excellently bright. 15

SIMPLEX MUNDITIIS<sup>1</sup>(From Epicæne; or, The Silent Woman, 1609–10)

Still to be neat, still to be drest,
 As you were going to a feast;
 Still to be powdered, still perfumed:
 Lady, it is to be presumed,
 Though art's hid causes are not found. 5
 All is not sweet, all is not sound.
 Give me a look, give me a face,
 That makes simplicity a grace;
 Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:
 Such sweet neglect more taketh me 10
 Than all the adulteries of art;
 They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.

SONG TO CELIA

(From The Forest, 1616)

Drink to me only with thine eyes,
 And I will pledge with mine;
 Or leave a kiss within the cup,
 And I'll not look for wine.
 The thirst that from the soul doth rise 5
 Doth ask a drink divine;
 But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
 I would not change for thine.

I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
 Not so much honouring thee
 As giving it a hope, that there
 It could not withered be.
 But thou thereon didst only breathe,
 And sent'st it back to me.
 Since when it grows, and smells, I swear, 15
 Not of itself, but thee.

THE TRIUMPH OF CHARIS

(From "A Celebration of Charis" in Underwoods,<sup>1</sup> 1616)

See the chariot at hand here of Love,
 Wherein my Lady rideth!
 Each that draws is a swan or a dove,
 And well the car Love guideth. 5
 As she goes, all hearts do duty
 Unto her beauty;
 And enamoured do wish, so they might
 But enjoy such a sight,
 That they still were to run by her side,
 Through swords, through seas, whither she 10 would ride.

Do but look on her eyes, they do light
 All that Love's world compriseth!
 Do but look on her hair, it is bright
 As Love's star when it riseth!

<sup>1</sup> Plain, or unadorned, in thy neatness, the phrase is from Horace's ode to Pyrrha (Odes, Lib. I. Car. V.).<sup>1</sup> Jonson thus explains the title Underwoods, which consists of a collection of comparatively short poems on various subjects: "As the multitude called Timber-trees promiscuously growing, a Wood, or Forest; so I am bold to entitle these lesser poems of later growth by this name of Underwood." Preface "To the Reader."

Do but mark, her forehead's smother 15
 Than words that soothe her;
 And from her arched brows, such a grace
 Sheds itself through the face,
 As alone there triumphs to the life
 All the gain, all the good of the elements'
 strife. 20

Have you seen but a bright lily grow
 Before rude hands have touched it?
 Have you marked but the fall o' the snow
 Before the soil hath smutched it?
 Have you felt the wool of beaver? 25
 Or swan's down ever?
 Or have smelt o' the bud o' the briar?
 Or the nard in the fire?
 Or have tasted the bag of the bee?
 O so white,—O so soft,—O so sweet is she! 30

LIFE'S TRUE MEASURE

(From A Pindaric Ode in the same)

To the immortal memory of that noble pair, Sir
 Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison
 For what is life, if measur'd by the space,
 Not by the act?
 Or masked man, if valued by his face,
 Above his fact?
 Here's one outliv'd his peers, 5
 And told forth fourscore years:
 He vexed time, and busied the whole state;
 Troubled both foes and friends;
 But ever to no ends;
 What did this stirrer but die late? 10
 How well at twenty had he fallen or stood!
 For three of his fourscore he did no good.

He enter'd well by virtuous parts,
 Got up, and thrived with honest arts;
 He purchased friends, and fame, and honours
 then, 15
 And had his noble name advanc'd with men:
 But weary of that flight,
 He stooped in all men's sight
 To sordid flatteries, acts of strife,
 And sunk in that dead sea of life, 20
 So deep, as he did then death's waters sup,
 But that the cork of title buoy'd him up.

Alas! But Morison fell young:
 He never fell,—thou falls't my tongue,
 He stood a soldier to the last right end, 25
 A perfect patriot and a noble friend;
 But most a virtuous son.
 All offices were done
 By him, so ample, full, and round,
 In weight, in measure, number, sound, 30
 As, though his age imperfect might appear,
 His life was of humanity the sphere.

It is not growing like a tree
 In bulk, doth make men better be.
 Or standing long an oak, three hundred year, 35
 To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sear:
 A lily of a day,
 Is fairer far, in May,

Although it fall and die that night;
 It was the plant and flower of light. 40
 In small proportions we just beauties see;
 And in short measures, life may perfect be.

TO LESBIA<sup>1</sup>

(In Rosseter's Book of Airs, 1601)

My sweetest Lesbia, let us live and love,
 And though the sager sort our deeds reprove
 Let us not weigh them. Heaven's great lamps do dive
 Into their west, and straight again revive;
 But soon as once set is our little light, 5
 Then must we sleep one ever-during night.

If all would lead their lives in love like me,
 Then bloody swords and armour should not be;
 No drum nor trumpet peaceful sleeps should move,
 Unless alarm came from the Camp of Love: 10
 But fools do live and waste their little light,
 And seek with pain their ever-during night.

When timely death my life and fortunes ends,
 Let not my hearse be vex't with mourning
 friends;
 But let all lovers, rich in triumph, come 15
 And with sweet pastimes grace my happy tomb;
 And, Lesbia, close up thou my little light
 And crown with love my ever-during night.

THE ARMOUR OF INNOCENCE<sup>1</sup>

(From the same)

The man of life upright,
 Whose guiltless heart is free
 From all dishonest deeds,
 Or thought of vanity;

The man whose silent days 5
 In harmless joys are spent,
 Whom hopes cannot delude
 Nor sorrow discontent:

That man needs neither towers
 Nor armour for defence, 10
 Nor secret vaults to fly
 From thunder's violence:

He only can behold
 With unaffrighted eyes
 The horrors of the deep 15
 And terrors of the skies.

Thus scorning all the cares
 That fate or fortune brings,
 He makes the heaven his book;
 His wisdom heavenly things; 20

<sup>1</sup> One of the many variations of the noble theme of Horace's Integer Vitæ. (Odes, Bk. I, Car. XXII.).

Good thoughts his only friends,
His wealth a well-spent age,
The earth his sober inn
And quiet pilgrimage.

FORTUNATI NIMIUM<sup>1</sup>

Jack and Joan, they think no ill,
But loving live, and merry still;
Do their week-day's work, and pray
Devoutly on the holy-day:
Skip and trip it on the green,
And help to choose the Summer Queen;
Lash out at a country feast
Their silver penny with the best.

Well can they judge of nappy ale,
And tell at large a winter tale;
Climb up to the apple loft,
And turn the crabs till they be soft.
Tib is all the father's joy,
And little Tom the mother's boy:—
All their pleasure is, Content,
And care, to pay their yearly rent.

Joan can call by name her cows
And deck her windows with green boughs;
She can wreaths and tutties make,
And trim with plums a bridal cake.
Jack knows what brings gain or loss,
And his long flail can stoutly toss:
Makes the hedge which others break,
And ever thinks what he doth speak.

Now, you courtly dames and knights,
That study only strange delights,
Though you scorn the homespun gray,
And revel in your rich array;
Though your tongues dissemble deep
And can your heads from danger keep;
Yet, for all your pomp and train,
Securer lives the silly swain!

GOOD MORROW

(From The Rape of Lucrece, acted c. 1605)

Pack, clouds, away, and welcome day,
With night we banish sorrow;
Sweet air blow soft, mount lark aloft,
To give my love good-morrow.
Wings from the wind to please her mind, 5
Notes from the lark I'll borrow;
Bird prune thy wing, nightingale sing,
To give my love good-morrow,
To give my love good-morrow, 10
Notes from them both I'll borrow.

Wake from thy rest, robin redbreast,
Sing birds in every furrow;
And from each bill let music shrill
Give my fair love good-morrow.

<sup>1</sup> Happy beyond measure. See Vergil, Georgics, Bk. ii., 108 et seq.<sup>1</sup> More.

Blackbird and thrush in every bush, 15
Stare,<sup>1</sup> linnet, and cock-sparrow,
You pretty elves, amongst yourselves
Sing my fair love good-morrow;
To give my love good-morrow
Sing birds in every furrow. 20

WEEP NO MORE

(From Queen of Corinth)

Weep no more, nor sigh, nor groan,
Sorrow calls no time that's gone;
Violets pluck'd, the sweetest rain
Makes not fresh nor grow again. 5
Trim thy locks, look cheerfully;
Fate's hid ends eyes cannot see.
Joys as wingèd dreams fly fast,
Why should sadness longer last?
Grief is but a wound to woe;
Gentlest fair, mourn, mourn no moe.<sup>1</sup> 10

THE PRAISES OF PAN

(From The Faithful Shepherdess, acted 1610)

Sing his praises that doth keep
Our flocks from harm,
Pan, the father of our sheep;
And arm in arm
Tread we softly in a round,<sup>1</sup> 5
Whilst the hollow neighbouring ground
Fills the music with her sound.

Pan, O great god Pan, to thee
Thus do we sing!
Thou that keep'st us chaste and free 10
As the young spring;
Ever be thy honour spoke,
From that place the Morn is broke
To that place Day doth unyoke!

SONG OF THE PRIEST OF PAN

(From the same)

Shepherds all, and maidens fair
Fold your flocks up, for the air
'Gins to thicken, and the sun
Already his great course hath run. 5
See the dew-drops how they kiss
Every little flower that is;
Hanging on their velvet heads,
Like a rope of crystal beads;
See the heavy clouds low falling,
And bright Hesperus down calling 10
The dead night from under ground;
At whose rising mists unsound,
Damps and vapours fly apace,
Hovering o'er the wanton face
Of these pastures, where they come 15
Striking dead both bud and bloom:

<sup>1</sup> Starling.<sup>1</sup> Round-dance.

Therefore from such danger lock
 Every one his lovèd flock;
 And let your dogs lie loose without,
 Lest the wolf come as a scout 20
 From the mountain, and, ere day,
 Bear a lamb or kid away;
 Or the crafty thievish fox
 Break upon your simple flocks.
 To secure yourselves from these 25
 Be not too secure in ease;
 Let one eye his watches peep
 While the other eye doth sleep;
 So you shall good shepherds prove,
 And for ever hold the love 30
 Of our great god. Sweetest slumbers,
 And soft silence, fall in numbers<sup>1</sup>
 On your eyelids! So, farewell!
 Thus I end my evening's knell.

SONG TO PAN

(From the same)

All ye woods, and trees, and bowers,
 All ye virtues and ye powers
 That inhabit in the lakes,
 In the pleasant springs or brakes,
 Move your feet 5
 To our sound,
 Whilst we greet
 All this ground
 With his honour and his name
 That defends our flocks from blame. 10

He is great, and he is just,
 He is ever good, and must
 Thus be honoured. Daffodillies,
 Roses, pinks, and lovèd lilies,
 Let us fling 15
 Whilst we sing
 Ever holy,
 Ever holy,
 Ever honoured, ever young!
 Thus great Pan is ever sung! 20

MELANCHOLY

(From "Nice Valour")

Hence all you vain delights,
 As short as are the nights
 Wherein you spend your folly!
 There's naught in this life sweet,
 If man were wise to see 't, 5
 But only melancholy;
 O sweetest melancholy!

Welcome folded arms, and fixed eyes,
 A sigh that piercing mortifies,
 A look that's fastened to the ground, 10
 A tongue chained up, without a sound!

Fountain heads, and pathless groves,
 Places which pale passion loves!
 Moonlight walks, when all the fowls
 Are warmly housed, save bats and owls! 15
 A midnight bell, a parting groan!
 These are the sounds we feed upon;
 Then stretch your bones in a still gloomy valley:
 Nothing's so dainty-sweet as lovely melancholy.

ON THE LIFE OF MAN<sup>1</sup>(From Poems, 1640)

Like to the falling of a star,
 Or as the flights of eagles are,
 Or like the fresh spring's gaudy hue,
 Or silver drops of morning dew,
 Or like the wind that chafes the flood, 5
 Or bubbles which on water stood;
 Even such is man, whose borrowed light
 Is straight called in and paid to-night.
 The wind blows out, the bubble dies,
 The spring entombed in autumn lies, 10
 The dew's dried up, the star is shot,
 The flight is past, and man forgot.

ON THE TOMBS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

(From Poems, 1653)

Mortality, behold and fear!
 What a change of flesh is here!
 Think how many royal bones
 Sleep within this heap of stones;
 Here they lie, had realms and lands, 5
 Who now want strength to stir their hands;
 Where from their pulpits sealed with dust
 They preach, "In greatness is no trust."
 Here's an acre sown indeed
 With the richest, royall'st seed 10
 That the earth did e'er suck in
 Since the first man died for sin:
 Here the bones of birth<sup>1</sup> have cried,
 "Though gods they were, as men they died!"

A DIRGE

(From The White Devil; or, Vittoria Corombona, 1612)

Call for the robin-rebreast and the wren,
 Since o'er shady groves they hover,
 And with leaves and flowers do cover
 The friendless bodies of unburied men.

<sup>1</sup> Sometimes attributed to Henry King (1592–1669).<sup>1</sup> The ashes or remains of those of high or royal lineage.<sup>1</sup> Fall with a musical or rhythmical cadence.

Call unto his funeral dole<sup>1</sup> 5
 The ant, the field-mouse and the mole,
 To rear him hillocks that shall keep him warm,
 And (when gay tombs are robbed) sustain no harm;
 But keep the wolf far thence, that's foe to men,
 For with his nails he'll dig them up again. 10

DIRGE BEFORE DEATH

(From The Duchess of Malfy, 1623)

Hark, now everything is still,
 The screech-owl, and the whistler<sup>1</sup> shrill,
 Call upon our dame aloud,
 And bid her quickly don her shroud!
 Much you had of land and rent; 5
 Your length in clay's now competent:
 A long war disturbed your mind;
 Here your perfect peace is signed.
 Of what is't fools make such vain keeping?
 Since their conception, their birth weeping, 10
 Their life a general mist of error,
 Their death, a hideous storm of terror.
 Strew your hair with powders sweet,
 Don clean linen, bathe your feet,
 And (the foul fiend more to check), 15
 A crucifix let bless your neck:
 'Tis now full tide 'tween night and day;
 End your groan, and come away.

SONG: "ALL THE FLOWERS OF THE SPRING"

(From The Devil's Law Case)

All the flowers of the spring
 Meet to perfume our burying;
 These have but their growing prime,
 And man does flourish but his time:
 Survey our progress from our birth— 5
 We are set, we grow, we turn to earth.
 Courts adieu, and all delights,
 All bewitching appetites!
 Sweetest breath and clearest eye
 Like perfumes go out and die; 10
 And consequently this is done
 As shadows wait upon the sun.
 Vain the ambition of kings
 Who seek by trophies and dead things
 To leave a living name behind, 15
 And weave but nets to catch the wind.

ON SLEEP

(From Poems, Amorous, Funeral, etc., 1616)

Sleep, Silence' child, sweet father of soft rest, Prince whose approach peace to all mortals brings,
 Indifferent host to shepherds and to kings,
 Sole comforter of minds which are oppress'd;

<sup>1</sup> Gifts of food or money and the like, were sometimes distributed at funerals for the benefit of the soul of the deceased.

<sup>1</sup> Green plover or lapwing.

Lo, by thy charming rod, all breathing things 5
 Lie slumb'ring, with forgetfulness possess'd,
 And yet o'er me to spread thy drowsy wings
 Thou spar'st, alas! who cannot be thy guest.
 Since I am thine, O come, but with that face
 To inward light, which thou are wont to shew, 10
 With feigned solace ease a true-felt woe;
 Or if, deaf god, thou do deny that grace,
 Come as thou wilt, and what thou wilt bequeath,
 I long to kiss the image of my death.

SONNET

I know that all beneath the moon decays,
 And what by mortals in this world is brought
 In time's great periods shall return to naught;
 That fairest states have fatal nights and days.
 I know that all the Muses' heavenly lays, 5
 With toil of sprite, which are so dearly bought,
 As idle sounds, of few, or none are sought,
 That there is nothing lighter than vain praise.
 I know frail beauty's like the purple flow'r,
 To which one morn oft birth and death affords,
 That love a jarring is of mind's accords, 11
 Where sense and will bring under reason's power:
 Know what I list, this all cannot me move,
 But that, alas, I both must write and love.

SONNET

Of this fair volume which we world do name,
 If we the sheets and leaves could turn with care,
 Of him who it corrects, and did it frame,
 We clear might read the art and wisdom rare,
 Find out his power which wildest powers doth 5
 tame,
 His providence extending everywhere,
 His justice, which proud rebels doth not spare,
 In every page, no period of the same:
 But silly we, like foolish children, rest 10
 Well pleas'd with colour'd vellum, leaves of
 gold,
 Fair dangling ribbands, leaving what is best,
 On the great writer's sense ne'er taking hold:
 Or if by chance we stay our minds on aught,
 It is some picture on the margin wrought.

MADRIGAL

This life, which seems so fair,
 Is like a bubble blown up in the air,
 By sporting children's breath,
 Who chase it every where,
 And strive who can most motion it bequeath. 5
 And though it sometime seem of its own might
 Like to an eye of gold to be fix'd there,
 And firm to hover in that empty height,
 That only is because it is so light.
 But in that pomp it doth not long appear; 10
 For when 'tis most admired, in a thought,
 Because it erst was nought, it turns to nought.

MADRIGAL

This world a hunting is,
The prey poor man, the Nimrod fierce is Death;
His speedy greyhounds are
Lust, sickness, envy, care,
Strife that ne'er falls amiss,
With all those ills which haunt us while we breathe.

Now, if by chance we fly
Of these the eager chase,
Old age with stealing pace
Casts up his nets, and there we panting die.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES OF OLD LONDON

(From A Survey of London, 1598)

"Let us now," saith Fitzstephen,<sup>1</sup> "come to the sports and pastimes, seeing that it is fit that a city should not only be commodious and serious, but also merry and sportful. . . .

"But London, for the shows upon theatres, and comical pastimes, hath holy plays, representations of miracles, which holy confessors have wrought, or representations of torments wherein the constancy of martyrs appeared. Every year also at Shrove Tuesday,<sup>2</sup> that we may begin with children's sports, seeing we all have been children, the schoolboys do bring cocks of the game to their master, and all the forenoon they delight themselves in cock-fighting: after dinner all the youths go into the fields to play at the ball.

"The scholars of every school have their ball, or baton, in their hands; the ancient and wealthy men of the city come forth on horseback to see the sport of the young men, and to take part of the pleasure in beholding their agility. . . .

"When the great fen, or moor, which watereth the walls of the city on the north side, is frozen, many young men play upon the ice; some striding as wide as they may, do slide swiftly; others make themselves seats of ice, as great as millstones; one sits down, many hand in hand to draw him, and one slipping on a sudden, all fall together; some tie bones to their feet and under their heels; and shoving themselves by a little picked staff, do slide as swiftly as a bird flieth in the air, or an arrow out of a cross-bow. Sometime two run together with poles, and hitting one the other, either one or both do fall, not without hurt; some break their arms, some their legs, but youth desirous of glory in this sort exerciseth itself against the time of war. Many of the citizens do delight themselves in hawks and hounds; for they have liberty of hunting in Middlesex, Hertfordshire, all Chiltern, and in Kent to the water of the Cray." Thus far Fitzstephen of sports.

These, or the like exercises, have been continued till our time, namely, in stage plays, whereof ye may read in anno 1391, a play by the parish clerks of London at the Skinner's Well besides Smithfield, which continued three days together, the king, queen, and nobles of the realm being present. And of another, in the year 1419, which lasted eight days, and was of matter from the creation of the world, whereat was present most part of the nobility and gentry of England. Of late time, in place of those stage plays, hath been used comedies tragedies, interludes, and histories, both true and feigned; for the acting whereof certain public places, as the Theatre, the Curtain,<sup>3</sup> etc., have been erected. Also cocks of the game are yet cherished by divers men for their pleasures much money being laid on their heads, when they fight in pits, whereof some be costly made for that purpose. The ball is used by noblemen and gentlemen in tennis courts, and by people of meaner sort in the open fields and streets. . . .

Thus much for sportful shows in triumphs may suffice. Now for sports and pastimes yearly used.

First, in the feast of Christmas, there was in the King's house, wheresoever he was lodged, a lord of misrule, or master of merry disports, and the like had ye in the house of every nobleman of honor or good worship, were he spiritual or temporal. Amongst the which the mayor of London, and either of the sheriffs, had their several lords of misrule, ever contending, without quarrel or offence, who should make the rarest pastimes to delight the beholders. These lords beginning their rule on Allhallow eve,<sup>4</sup> continued the same until the morrow after the Feast of the Purification, commonly called Candlemas Day.<sup>5</sup> In all which space there were fine and subtle disguisings, masks, and mummeries, with playing at cards for counters, nails, and points, in every house more for pastime than for gain.

Against the feast of Christmas every man's house, as also the parish churches, were decked with holm, ivy, bays, and whatsoever the season of the year afforded to be green. The conduits and standards in the streets were likewise garnished; amongst the which I read, in the year 1444, that by tempest of thunder and lightning, on the 1st of February, at night, Paule's Steeple was fired, but with great labor quenched; and towards the morning of Candlemas Day, at the Leadenhall in Cornhill, a standard of tree being set up in midst of the pavement, fast in the ground, nailed full of holm and ivy, for disport of Christmas to the people, was torn up, and cast down by the malignant spirit (as was thought), and the stones of the pavement all about were cast in the streets, and into divers houses, so that the people were sore aghast of the great tempests.

In the week before Easter, had ye great shows made for the fetching in of a twisted tree, or with,<sup>6</sup> as they termed it, out of the woods into the king's house; and the like into every man's house of honor or worship.

In the month of May, namely, on May-day in the morning, every man except impediment, would walk into the sweet meadows and green woods, there to rejoice their spirits with the beauty and savor of sweet flowers, and with the harmony of birds, praising God in their kind; and for example hereof, Edward Hall<sup>7</sup> hath noted, that King Henry VIII., as in the 3rd of his reign, and divers other years, so namely in the 7th of his reign, on May-day in the morning, with Queen Katherine his wife, accompanied with many lords and ladies, rode a-maying from Greenwich to the high ground of Shooter's Hill, where, as they passed by the way, they espied a company of tall yeomen, clothed all in green, with green hoods, and bows and arrows, to the number of two hundred; one being their chieftan, was called Robin Hood, who required the king and his company to stay and see his men shoot; whereunto the king granting, Robin Hood whistled, and all the two hundred archers shot off, loosing all at once; and when he whistled again they likewise shot again; their arrows whistled by craft of the head, so that the noise was strange and loud, which greatly delighted the king, queen, and their company. Moreover, this Robin Hood desired the king and queen, with their retinue, to enter the greenwood, where in harbors made of boughs, and decked with flowers, they were set and served plentifully with venison and wine by Robin Hood and his men, to their great contentment, and had other pageants and pastimes, as ye may read in my said author.

I find also, that in the month of May, the citizens of London of all estates, lightly<sup>8</sup> in every parish, or sometimes two or three parishes joining together, had their several mayings, and did fetch in maypoles, with divers warlike shows, with good archers, morris dancers, and other devices, for pastime all the day long; and toward the evening they had stage plays, and bonfires in the streets. Of these mayings we read, in the reign of Henry VI. that the aldermen and sheriffs of London, being on May-day at the Bishop of London's woods, in the parish of Stebunheath, and having there a worshipful dinner for themselves and other commoners, Lydgate the poet, that was a monk of Bury, sent to them, by a pursuivant, a joyful commendation of that season, containing sixteen staves of meter royal, beginning thus:—

“Mightie Flora! goddess of fresh flowers,—” &c.

These great mayings, and May games, made by the governors and masters of this city, with the triumphant setting up of the great shaft (a principal maypole in Cornhill, before the parish church of St. Andrew therefore called Undershaft)<sup>9</sup> by means of an insurrection of youths against aliens on May-day, 1517, the 9th of Henry VIII., have not been so freely used as afore, and therefore I leave them.

THE DEATH OF CÆSAR

(From translation of Plutarch's Lives, 1597)

Now a day being appointed for the meeting of the Senate, at what time they hoped Cæsar would not fail to come: the conspirators determined then to put their enterprise in execution, because they might meet safely at that time without suspicion; and the rather, for that all the noblest and chiefest men of the city would be there. Who, when they should see such a great matter executed, would every man then set to their hands, for the defence of their liberty. Furthermore, they thought also, that the appointment of the place where the council should be kept, was chosen of purpose by divine providence, and made all for them. For it was one of the porches about the Theatre, in the which there was a certain place full of seats for men to sit in, where also was set up the image of Pompey, which the city had made and consecrated in honor of him: when he did beautify that part of the city with the Theatre he built, with divers porches about it. In this place was the assembly of the Senate appointed to be; just on the fifteenth day of the month of March, which the Romans call, Idus Martias: so that it seemed some god of purpose had brought Cæsar thither to be slain, for revenge of Pompey's death. So when the day was come, Brutus went out of his house with a dagger by his side under his long gown, that nobody saw nor knew, but his wife only. The other conspirators were all assembled at Cassius's house, to bring his son into the market place, who on that day did put on the man's gown, called Toga Virilis, and from thence they came all in a troop together unto Pompey's porch, looking that Cæsar would straight come thither. . . . When Cæsar came out of his litter: Popilius Læna, that had talked before with Brutus and Cassius, and had prayed the gods they might bring this enterprise to pass: went unto Cæsar and kept him a long time with a talk. Cæsar gave good ear unto him. Wherefore the conspirators (if so they should be called) not hearing what he said to Cæsar, but conjecturing by that he had told them a little before, that his talk was none other but the very discovery of their conspiracy: they were afraid every man of them; and one looking in another's face, it was easy to see they all were of a mind, that it was no tarrying for them till they were apprehended, but rather that they should kill themselves with their own hands. And when Cassius and certain other clapped their hands on their swords under their gowns to draw them: Brutus marking the countenance and gesture of Læna, and considering that he did use himself rather like an humble and earnest suitor than like an accuser: he said nothing to his companion (because there were many amongst them that were not of the conspiracy), but with a pleasant countenance encouraged Cassius. And immediately after, Læna went from Cæsar, and kissed his hand: which showed plainly that it was for some matter concerning himself that he had held him so long in talk. Now all the Senators being entered first into this place or chapter house where the council should be kept, all the other conspirators straight stood about Cæsar's chair, as if they had had something to have said unto him. And some say that Cassius casting his eyes upon Pompey's image, made his prayer unto it, as if it had been alive. Trebonius on the other side, drew Antonius aside, as he came into the house where the Senate sat, and held him with a long talk without. When Cæsar was come into the house, all the Senate rose to honor him at his coming in. So when he was set, the conspirators flocked about him, and amongst them they presented one Tullius Cimber, who made humble suit for the calling home again of his brother that was banished. They all made as they were intercessors for him, and took him by the hands, and kissed his head and breast. Cæsar at the first simply refused their kindness and entreaties: but afterwards, perceiving they still pressed on him, he violently thrust them from him. Then Cimber with both his hands plucked Cæsar's gown over his shoulders, and Casca that stood behind him, drew his dagger first, and struck Cæsar upon the shoulder, but gave him no great wound. Cæsar feeling himself hurt, took him straight by the hand he held his dagger in, and cried out in Latin: O traitor Casca, what doest thou? Casca on the other side cried in Greek, and called his brother to help him. So divers running on a heap together to fly upon Cæsar, he looking about him to have fled, saw Brutus with a sword drawn in his hand ready to strike at him: then he let Casca's hand go, and casting his gown over his face, suffered every man to strike at him that would. Then the conspirators thronging one upon another because every man was desirous to have a cut at him, so many swords and daggers lighting upon one body, one of them hurt another, and among them Brutus caught a blow on his hand, because he would make one in murdering of him, and all the rest also were every man of them bloodied. Cæsar being slain in this manner, Brutus standing in the midst of the house, would have spoken, and stayed the other Senators that were not of the conspiracy, to have told them the reason why they had done this fact. But they as men both afraid and amazed, fled one upon another's neck in haste to get out at the door, and no man followed them. For it was set down and agreed between them, that they should kill no man but Cæsar only, and should entreat all the rest to look to defend their liberty.

<sup>9</sup> St. Andrew's Undershaft was in Leadenhall street. The shaft (or May pole) which was higher than the church steeple, was set up before it for the last time in 1517, after which it was hung on iron hooks over the doors in a neighboring alley. In 1550, a young curate declared that this shaft had been made an idol, and to show the superstitious subjection of the parish to the old relic, spoke of the church as St. Andrew's “Under-that-shaft.”

MACBETH'S MEETING WITH THE WEIRD SISTERS

(From A Chronicle of England and Scotland, 1578)

Shortly after happened a strange and uncouth wonder, which afterward was the cause of much trouble in the realm of Scotland, as ye shall after hear. It fortun'd as Makbeth and Banquo journeyed towards Fores, where the king then lay, they went sporting by the way together without other company save only themselves, passing through the woods and fields, when suddenly in the midst of a land, there met them three women in strange and wild apparel, resembling creatures of the elder world, whom when they attentively beheld, wondering much at the sight, the first of them spoke and said:—

"All hail Makbeth, thane of Glamis!"

(for he had lately entered into that office by the death of his father Sinell). The second then said:—

"Hail Makbeth, thane of Cawder!"

But the third said:—

"All hail Makbeth, that hereafter shall be King of Scotland!"

Then Banquo: "What manner of women (saith he) are you that seem so little favorable unto me, whereas to my fellow here, besides high offices, ye assign also the kingdom, appointing forth nothing for me at all?" "Yes," (saith the first of them), "we promise greater benefits unto thee than unto him; for he shall reign indeed, but with an unlucky end; neither shall he leave any issue behind him to succeed in his place, when certainly thou indeed shalt not reign at all, but of thee those shall be born which shall govern the Scottish kingdom by long order of continual descent." Herewith the foresaid women vanished immediately out of their sight. This was reputed at the first but some vain fantastical illusion by Makbeth and Banquo, insomuch that Banquo would call Makbeth in jest, King of Scotland; and Makbeth again would call him in sport likewise, father of many kings. But afterwards the common opinion was, that these women were either the weird sisters, that is (as ye would say) the goddesses of destiny, or else some nymphs or fairies, indued with knowledge of prophecy by their necromantical science, because everything came to pass as they had spoken.

DEDICATION TO SIR FRANCIS WAL-

(From Voyages and Discoveries, 1589)

Right honorable, I do remember that being a youth, and one of her Majesty's scholars at

Westminster,<sup>2</sup> that fruitful nursery, it was my hap to visit the chamber of Mr. Richard Hakluyt, my cousin, a gentleman of the Middle Temple,<sup>3</sup> well known unto you, at a time when I found lying open on his board certain books of cosmography, with a universal map. He, seeing me somewhat curious in the view thereof, began to instruct my ignorance by showing me the division of the earth into three parts after the old account, and then according to the latter, and better distribution, into more. He pointed with his wand to all the known seas, gulfs, bays, straits, capes, rivers, empires, kingdoms, dukedoms, and territories of each part with declaration also of their special commodities, and particular wants, which, by the benefit of traffic and intercourse of merchants, are plentifully supplied. From the map he brought me to the Bible, and turning to the 107th Psalm, directed me to the 23rd and 24th verses, where I read, that they which go down to the sea in ships and occupy by the great waters, they see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep, etc. Which words of the prophet, together with my cousin's discourse (things of high and rare delight to my young nature), took in me so deep an impression that I constantly resolved, if ever I were preferred to the university, where better time and more convenient place might be ministered for these studies, I would by God's assistance prosecute that knowledge and kind of literature, the doors whereof, after a sort, were so happily opened before me.

According to which my resolution, when, not long after, I was removed to Christ Church in Oxford, my exercises of duty first performed, I fell to my intended course, and by degrees read over whatsoever printed or written discoveries and voyages I found extant either in the Greek, Latin, Italian, Spanish, Portugal, French, or English languages, and in my public lectures<sup>4</sup> was the first that produced and showed both the old imperfectly composed, and the new lately reformed maps, globes, spheres, and other instruments of this art for demonstration in the common schools, to the singular pleasure played on various diplomatic missions, and was one of the Commissioners to try Mary, Queen of Scots, v. pp. 721, 764.

<sup>2</sup> One of the oldest and best of the London "Grammar Schools." Founded by Henry VIII., it was so reorganized by Queen Elizabeth in 1560, that its revenues were sufficient to provide for some 40 "free," or "Queen's scholars." Besides Hakluyt, George Herbert, Dryden, and Warren Hastings were among its free, or foundation, scholars.

<sup>3</sup> This implies that he belonged to the legal profession, as the Middle Temple was one of the legal societies of London.

and general contentment of my auditory. In continuance of time, and by reason principally of my insight in this study, I grew familiarly acquainted with the chiefest captains at sea, the greatest merchants, and the best mariners of our nation; by which means having gotten somewhat more than common knowledge, I passed at length the narrow seas into France with Sir Edward Stafford, her Majesty's careful and discreet Ligier,<sup>5</sup> where during my five years' abode with him in his dangerous and changeable residence in her Highness' service, I both heard in speech, and read in books other nations miraculously extolled for their discoveries and notable enterprises by sea, but the English of all others for their sluggish security, and continual neglect of the like attempts, especially in so long and happy a time of peace, either ignominiously reported, or exceedingly condemned; which singular opportunity, if 20 some other people, our neighbors, had been blessed with, their protestations are often and vehement, they would far otherwise have used. . . .

Thus both hearing and reading the obloquy 25 of our nation, and finding few or none of our own men to reply herein; and further, not seeing any man to have care to recommend to the world the industrious labors and painful travels of our countrymen: for stopping the mouths of the reproachers, myself being the last winter returned from France with the honorable the Lady Sheffield, for her passing good behavior highly esteemed in all the French court, determined notwithstanding all 30 difficulties to undertake the burden of that work wherein all others pretended either ignorance or lack of leisure, or want of sufficient argument, whereas (to speak truly) the huge toil and the small profit to ensue were the 40 chief causes of the refusal. I call the work a burden in consideration that these voyages lay so dispersed, scattered, and hidden in several hucksters' hands, that I now wonder at myself to see how I was able to endure the delays, 45 curiosity, and backwardness of many from whom I was to receive my originals, so that I have just cause to make that complaint of the maliciousness of divers in our time, which Pliny made of the men of his age: At nos 50 elaborata vis abscondere atque suppressere cupimus et fraudare vitam etiam aliensis bonis, etc.<sup>6</sup>

To harp no longer upon this string, and to speak a word of that just commendation 55 which our nation do indeed deserve: it cannot be denied, but as in all former ages they have been men full of activity, stirrers abroad, and searchers of the remote parts of the world, so 5 in this most famous and peerless government of her most excellent Majesty, her subjects, through the special assistance and blessing of God, in searching the most opposite corners and quarters of the world, and to speak plainly, in compassing the vast globe of the earth more 10 than once, have excelled all the nations and people of the earth. For which of the kings of this land before her Majesty had their banners ever seen in the Caspian sea? Which of them 15 hath ever dealt with the emperor of Persia as her Majesty hath done, and obtained for her merchants large and loving privileges? who ever saw, before this regiment, an English Ligier in the stately porch of the Grand Signor at Constantinople? who ever found English 20 consuls and agents at Tripolis in Syria, at Aleppo, at Babylon, at Balsara, and which is more, who ever heard of Englishmen at Goa<sup>7</sup> before now? what English ships did heretofore 25 ever anchor in the mighty river of Plate? pass and repass the unpassable (in former opinion) Strait of Magellan, range along the coast of Chili, Peru, and all the backside of Nova Hispania,<sup>8</sup> further than any Christian ever 30 passed, traverse the mighty breadth of the South Sea, land upon the Luzones in despite of the enemy, enter into alliance, amity, and traffic with the princes of the Moluccas and the isle of Java, double the famous cape of Bona 35 Speranza,<sup>10</sup> arrive at the isle of St. Helena, and last of all return home most richly laden with the commodities of China, as the subjects of this now flourishing monarchy have done?

THE LOSS OF SIR HUMPHREY GILBERT<sup>1</sup>

(From a report of the voyage and success thereof, attempted in the year of our Lord, 1583, by Sir Humphrey Gilbert, knight, with other gentlemen assisting him in that action,

<sup>1</sup> Sir Humphrey Gilbert (1539–1583) was one of the great English navigators in the age of Drake, Hawkins, and Frobisher. He was half-brother of Sir Walter Raleigh, and like other great sailors of the time, he was born in Devon. He started from Plymouth on what proved to be his last voyage of discovery, June 11th, 1583. After landing in Newfoundland, which he took possession of in the name of the Queen, he lost his largest ship, and was forced to return home, with the only two vessels left him, the Golden Hind and the Squirrel or, as it is called in the text the Frigate.

<sup>6</sup> But we are anxious to steal away from them and suppress the result of their labors, and even to beguile the very life from the goods of others.

intended to discover and to plant christian inhabitants in place convenient, upon those large and ample countries extended northward from the cape of Florida, lying under very temperate climes, esteemed fertile and rich in minerals, yet not in the actual possession of any christian prince, written by Mr. Edward Haie, gentleman, and principal actor in the same voyage, who alone continued to the end, and by God's special assistance returned home with his retinue safe and entire.)

So upon Saturday in the afternoon, the 31st of August, we changed our course and returned back for England, at which very instant, even in winding about, there passed along between us and towards the land which we now forsook, a very lion to our seeming, in shape, hair, and color, not swimming after the manner of a beast, by moving of his feet, but rather sliding upon the water with his whole body (excepting the legs) in sight; neither yet diving under, and again rising above the water, as the manner is of whales, dolphins, tunnies, porpoises, and all other fish, but confidently showing himself above water without hiding. Notwithstanding, we presented ourselves in open view and gesture to amaze him, as all creatures will be commonly at a sudden gaze and sight of men. Thus he passed along turning his head to and fro, yawning and gaping wide, with ugly demonstration of long teeth and glaring eyes, and to bid us a farewell (coming right against the Hind)<sup>2</sup> he sent forth a horrible voice, roaring or bellowing as doth a lion, which spectacle we all beheld so far as we were able to discern the same, as me prone to wonder at every strange thing, as this doubtless was, to see a lion in the ocean sea, or fish in shape of a lion. What opinion others had thereof, and chiefly the general himself, I forbear to deliver. But he took it for bonum omen,<sup>3</sup> rejoicing that he was to war against such an enemy, if it were the devil. The wind was large for England at our return, but very high, and the sea rough, insomuch as the frigate wherein the general went was almost swallowed up.

Monday in the afternoon (Sept. 2), we passed in the sight of Cape Race, having made as much way in little more than two days and nights back again, as before we had done in eight days from Cape Race unto the place where our ship perished, which hindrance thitherward and speed back again, is to be imputed unto the swift current, as well as to the winds, which we had more large in our return.

This Monday the general came aboard the Hind to have the surgeon of the Hind to dress his foot, which he hurt by treading upon a nail. At what time we comforted each other with the hope of hard success to be all past, and of the good to come. So agreeing to carry out lights always by night, that we might keep together, he departed into his frigate, being by no means to be entreated to tarry in the Hind, which had been more for his security. Immediately after followed a sharp storm which we overpassed for that time. Praised be God.

The weather fair, the general came aboard the Hind again to make merry together with the captain, master, and company, which was the last meeting, and continued there from morning until night. During which time there passed sundry discourses, touching affairs past and to come, lamenting greatly the loss of his great ship, more of the men, but most of all his books and notes, and what else I know not; for which he was out of measure grieved, the same doubtless being of some matter of more importance than his books, which I could not draw from him, yet by circumstance I gathered the same to be the ore which Daniel the Saxon had brought unto him in the New-found-land. Whatsoever it was, the remembrance touched him so deep as not able to contain himself, he beat his boy in great rage, even at the same time, so long after the miscarriage of the great ship, because upon a fair day, when we were becalmed upon the coast of the New-found-land, near unto Cape Race, he sent his boy aboard the Admiral to fetch certain things, amongst which, this being chief, was yet forgotten, and left behind. After which time he could never conveniently send again aboard the great ship; much less he doubted her ruin so near at hand.

Herein my opinion was better confirmed diversely, and by sundry conjectures, which maketh me have the greater hope of this rich mine. For whereas the general had never before good conceit of these north parts of the world, now his mind was wholly fixed upon the New-found-land. And as before he refused not to grant assignments liberally to them that required the same into these north parts, now he became contrarily affected, refusing to make any so large grants, especially of St. John's which certain English merchants made suit for, offering to employ their money and travel upon the same. Yet neither by their own suit, nor of others of his own company, whom he seemed willing to pleasure, it could be obtained.

Also laying down his determination in the spring following, for disposing of his voyage then to be re-attempted, he assigned the captain and master of the Golden Hind unto the south discovery, and reserved unto himself the north, affirming that this voyage had won his heart from the south, and that he was now become a northern man altogether.

Last, being demanded what means he had at his arrival in England to compass the charges of so great preparation as he intended to make the next spring, having determined upon two fleets, one for the south, another for the north: Leave that to me (he replied), I will ask a penny of no man. I will bring good tidings unto her Majesty, who will be so gracious to lend me 10,000 pounds, willing as before to be of good cheer, for he did thank God (he said) with all his heart for that he had seen, the same being enough for us all, and that we needed not to seek any further. And these last words he would oft repeat with demonstration of great fervency of mind, being himself very confident and settled in belief of inestimable good by this voyage, which the greater number of his followers nevertheless mistrusted altogether, not being made partakers of those secrets, which the general kept unto himself. Yet all of them that are living may be witnesses of his words and protestations, which sparingly I have delivered.

Leaving the issue of this good hope unto God, who knoweth the truth only, and can at his good pleasure bring the same to light, I will hasten to the end of this tragedy, which must be knit up in the person of our general. And as it was God's ordinance upon him, even so the vehement persuasion and entreaty of his friends could nothing avail to divert him from a wilful resolution of going through in his frigate; which was overcharged upon their decks, with fights, nettings, and small artillery, too cumbersome for so small a boat that was to pass through the ocean sea at that season of the year, when by course we might expect much storm of foul weather, whereof indeed we had enough.

But when he was entreated by the captain, master, and other his well-willers of the Hind, not to venture in the frigate, this was his answer: I will not forsake my little company going homeward, with whom I have passed so many storms and perils. And in very truth, he was urged to be so over hard, by hard reports given of him, that he was afraid of the sea, albeit this was rather rashness than advised resolution, to prefer the wind of a vain report to the weight of his own life.

Seeing that he would not bend to reason, he had provision out of the Hind, such as was wanting aboard his frigate. And so we committed him to God's protection, and set him aboard his pinnace, we being more than 300 leagues onward of our way home.

By that time we had brought the islands of Azores south of us; yet we then much keeping to the north, until we had got into the height and elevation of England, we met with very foul weather and terrible seas, breaking short and high, pyramid wise. The reason whereof seemed to proceed either of hilly grounds, high and low, within the sea, (as we see hills and dales upon the land), upon which the seas do mount and fall; or else the cause proceedeth of diversity of winds, shifting often in sundry points, all which having power to move the great ocean, which again is not presently settled, so many seas do encounter together as there had been diversity of winds. Howsoever it cometh to pass, men which all their lifetime had occupied the sea, never saw more outrageous seas. We had also upon our main-yard, an apparition of a little fire by night, which seamen do call Castor and Pollux. But we had only one; which they take an evil sign of more tempest; the same is usual in storms.

Monday the ninth of September, in the afternoon, the frigate was near cast away, oppressed by waves; yet at that time recovered; and giving forth signs of joy, the general sitting abaft with a book in his hand cried out unto us in the Hind (so oft as we did approach within hearing): We are as near to heaven by sea as by land. Reiterating the same speech, well beseming a soldier, resolute in Jesus Christ, as I can testify he was.

The same Monday night, about twelve of the clock, or not long after, the frigate being ahead of us in the Golden Hind, suddenly her lights were out, whereof, as it were in a moment, we lost the sight, and withal our watch cried, the general was cast away, which was too true. For in that moment, the frigate was devoured and swallowed up of the sea. Yet still we looked out all that night and ever after, until we arrived upon the coast of England, omitting no small sail at sea, unto which we gave not the tokens between us agreed upon, to have perfect knowledge of each other, if we should at any time be separated.

In great torment of weather, and peril of drowning, it pleased God to send safe home the Golden Hind, which arrived in Falmouth, the 22nd day of September, being Sunday, not without as great danger escaped in a flaw, coming from the south-east, with such thick mist that we could not discern land, to put in right with the haven.

RALEIGH'S ACCOUNT OF HIS BOOK

(From the Preface to The History of the World, 1614)

How unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of myself, to undertake a work of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it been begotten then with my first dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open itself to my younger years; and before any wound received, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well have doubted that the darkness of age and death would have covered over both it and me, long before the performance. For beginning with the creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my discourse within this our renowned Island of Great Britain. I confess that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travails; to have set together (as I could) the unjointed and scattered frame of our English affairs, than of the Universal; in whom, had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began.<sup>1</sup> But those inmost, and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever aching while uncured; with the desire to satisfy those few friends, which I have tried by the fire of adversity, the former enforcing, the latter persuading; have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and myself the subject of every opinion wise or weak.

To the world I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have authors that were (Fortune changing), sped much better in any age. For, prosperity and adversity have evermore tied and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, that dogs do always bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude; who, wanting that virtue which we call honesty in all men and that especial gift of God which we call charity in Christian men; condemn without hearing; and wound, without offense given: led thereunto by uncertain report only; which His Majesty truly acknowledged for the author of all lies. Blame no man (saith Siracides<sup>2</sup>) before thou have enquired the matter; understand first, and then reform righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine iudice, maligna, fallax; Rumor is without witness, without judge, malicious, and deceivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave Saint Augustine argument to affirm, that he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evil. And herein no man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca; Conscientia satisfaciamus: nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let us satisfy our own consciences, and not trouble ourselves with fame: be it never so ill, it is to be despised so we deserve well.

For myself, if I have in anything served my country, and prized it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time than doth a fair sunshine day to a seaman after shipwreck: and the contrary, no other harm than an outrageous tempest after the port attained. . . .

However, I know that it will be said by many, that I might have been more pleasing to the reader, if I had written the story of mine own times, having been permitted to draw water as near the well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoever in writing a modern history, shall follow truth too near the heels, it may haply strike out his teeth. There is no mistress or guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself: and he that walks after her at a middle distance; I know not whether I should call that kind of course temper or baseness. It is true, that I never travailed after men's opinions, when I might have made the best use of them: and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardice, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times: wherein also why may it not be said, that in speaking of the past, I point at the present, and tax the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that finding themselves spotted like the tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for

And if we could afford ourselves but so much leisure as to consider, that he which hath most in the world hath, in respect of the world, nothing: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide forever: I say, if both, to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting those mortal things of the world, as if our souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if ourselves after the world were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wisdom as he pleaseth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the revenger esteem all negligent, that have not trod down their opposites; the politician, all gross, that cannot merchandise their faith: yet when we come in sight of the port of death, to which all winds drive us; and when by letting fall that fatal anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end: then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our health and felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when ourselves can no longer exercise cruelty to others; and it is only then, that we are stricken through the soul with this terrible sentence, that God will not be mocked.<sup>3</sup>

FAME AND DEATH

(From The History of the World, 1614)

By this which we have already set down, is seen the beginning and end of the first three Monarchies of the world;<sup>1</sup> whereof the founders and erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We have left it flourishing in the middle of the field; having rooted up, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the storms of ambition shall beat her great boughs and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous nations enter the field, and cut her down.

Now these great Kings, and conquering nations, have been the subject of those ancient histories, which have been perused, and yet remain among us; and withal of so many tragical poets, as in the persons of powerful princes, and other mighty men have complained against infidelity, time, destiny, and most of all against the variable success of worldly things, and instability of fortune. To these undertakings, these great lords of the world have been stirred up, rather by the desire of fame, which ploweth up the air, and soweth in the wind; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cineas to Pyrrus<sup>2</sup> proves. And certainly, as fame hath often been dangerous to the living, so is it to the dead of no use at all, because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargain of buying this lasting discourse, understood by them which are dissolved; they themselves would then rather have wished, to have stolen out of the world without noise; than to be put in mind, that they have purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and cruelty; by giving in spoil the innocent and labouring soul to the idle and insolent, and by having emptied the cities of the world of their ancient inhabitants, and filled them again with so many and so variable sorts of sorrows. . . .

For the rest, if we seek a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundless ambition in mortal man, we may add to that which hath been already said; that the kings and princes of the world have always laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great ones which preceded them. They are always transported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the misery of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsel of death, upon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world without speaking a word; which God with all the words of His law, promises, or threats, doth infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, is always deferred. I have con- sidered (saith Solomon) all the works that are under the sun and behold, all is vanity, and vexation of spirit; but who believes it, till death tells it us? It was death, which opening the conscience of Charles the fifth, made him enjoin his son Philip to restore Navarre; and king Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done upon the murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrières, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can suddenly make man to know himself. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but abjects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them cry, complain, and repent, yea, even to hate their forepast happiness. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath interest in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a glass before the eyes of the most beautiful, and makes them see therein, their deformity and rottenness; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, just, and mighty Death! whom none could advise, thou hast persuaded; what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised; thou hast drawn together all the star-stretched greatness, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man and covered it all over with these two narrow words, Hic jacet.

A PLEA FOR CHARITY IN CONTROVERSIES, AND FOR SINCERITY

(From the Preface to Ecclesiastical Polity, 1594)

The best and safest way for you, therefore, my dear brethren, is to do all your deeds past to a new reckoning, to re-examine the cause ye have taken in hand, and to try it even point by point, argument by argument, with all the legal exactness ye can, to lay aside the gall of that bitterness wherein your minds have hitherto over-abounded, and with meekness to search the truth. Think, ye are men, deem it not impossible for you to err; sift impartially your own hearts whether it be force of reason or vehemence of affection which hath bred, and still doth feed these opinions in you. If truth do anywhere manifest itself seek not to smother it with glossing delusion, acknowledge the greatness thereof, and think it your best victory when the same doth prevail over you.

That ye have been earnest in speaking or writing again and again the contrary way should be no blemish or discredit at all unto you. Amongst so many so huge volumes as the infinite pains of St. Augustine have brought forth, what one hath gotten him greater love, commendation and honour than the book wherein he carefully collecteth his own oversights and sincerely condemneth them? Many speeches there are of Job, whereby his wisdom and other virtues may appear, but the glory of an ingenuous mind he hath purchased by these words only, "Behold I will lay mine hand on my mouth; I have spoken once, yet will I not therefore maintain argument; yea, twice, howbeit for that cause further I will not proceed."<sup>1</sup> Far more comfort it were for us, so small is the joy we take in these strifes, to labour under the same yoke, as men that look for the same eternal reward of their labours, to be enjoyed with you in bands of indissoluble love and amity, to live as if our persons being many our souls were but one, rather in such dismembered sort to spend our few and wretched days in a tedious prosecuting of wearisome contentions, the end whereof, if they have not some speedy end, will be heavy even on both sides. Brought already we are even to that estate which Gregory Nazianzen mournfully describeth, saying:

"My mind leadeth me (since there is no other remedy) to fly and to convey myself into some corner out of sight, where I may escape from this cloudy tempest of maliciousness, whereby all parts are entered into a deadly war amongst themselves, and that little remnant of love which was is now consumed to nothing. The only godliness we glory in is to find out somewhat whereby we may judge others to be ungodly. Each other's faults we observe as matter of exprobation<sup>2</sup> and not of grief. By these means we are grown hateful in the eyes of the heathens themselves, and (which woundeth thus the more deeply) able we are not to deny but that we have deserved their hatred. With the better sort of our own our fame and credit is clean lost. The less we are to marvel if they judge vilely of us, who although we did well would hardly allow thereof. On our backs they also build that are lewd,<sup>3</sup> and what we object one against another the same they use to the utter scorn and disgrace of us all. This we have gained by our mutual home dissensions. This we are worthily rewarded with, which are more forward to strive than becometh men of virtuous and mild disposition." But our trust in the Almighty is, that with us contentions are now at their highest float, and that the day will come (for what cause of despair is there) when the passions of former enmity being allayed, we shall with ten times redoubled tokens of our unfeignedly reconciled love, show ourselves each toward the other the same, which Joseph and the brethren of Joseph were at the time of their interview in Egypt. Our comfortable expectation and most thirsty desire, whereof what man soever amongst you shall anyway help to satisfy (as we truly hope there is no one amongst you but some way or other will) the blessings of the God of peace, both in this world and in the world to come, be upon him more than the stars of the firmament in number.

THE DIVINE SOURCE OF LAW

(From the same)

This world's first creation, and the preservation since of things created, what is it but only so far forth a manifestation by execution what the eternal law of God is concerning things natural? And as it cometh to pass in a kingdom rightly ordered, that after a law is once published it presently takes effect far and wide, all states framing themselves thereunto, even so let us think it fareth in the natural course of the world. Since the time that God did first proclaim the edicts of His law upon it, heaven and earth have harkened unto His voice, and their labour hath been to do His will. He made a law for the rain, He gave His decree unto the sea that the waters should not pass his commandment. Now if nature should intermit her course, and leave altogether, though it were but for awhile, the observation of her own laws; if those principal and mother elements of the world whereof all things in this lower world are made should lose the qualities which now they have; if the frame of that heavenly arch erected over our heads should loosen and dissolve itself; if celestial spheres should forget their wonted motions and by irregular volubility turn themselves any way as it might happen; if the prince of the lights of heaven, which now as a giant doth run his unwearied course, should, as it were, through a languishing faintness, begin to stand and to rest himself; if the moon should wander from her beaten way, the times and seasons of the year blend themselves by disordered and confused mixture, the winds breathe out their last gasp, the clouds yield no rain, the earth be defeated of heavenly influence, the fruits of the earth pine away as children at the withered breasts of their mother, no longer able to yield them relief—what would become of man himself whom these things now do all serve? See we not plainly that obedience of creatures unto the law of nature is the stay of the whole world? . . . Thus far, therefore, we have endeavoured in part to open of what nature and force laws are, according unto their several kinds: the law which God with Himself hath eternally set down to follow in His own works; the law which He hath made for His creatures to keep, the law of natural and necessary agents; the law which angels in heaven obey; the law whereunto, by the light of reason, men find themselves bound in that they are men; the law which they make, by composition, for multitudes and politic societies of men to be guided by; the law which belongeth unto each nation, the law that concerneth the fellowship of all; and lastly the law which God Himself hath supernaturally revealed. . . .

Wherefore that here we may briefly end, of law there can be no less acknowledged, than that her seat is in the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world, all things in heaven and earth do her homage, the very least as feeling her care, and the greatest as not exempted from her power, both angels and men and creatures of what condition soever though each in a different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent, admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.

A GOOD SCHOOLMASTER

(From Euphues, 1579)

A good and discreet schoolmaster should be such an one as Phœnix was the instructor of Achilles, whom Pelleus (as Homer reporteth) appointed to that end that he should be unto Achilles not only a teacher of learning, but an ensample of good living. But that is most principally to be looked for, and most diligently to be forseen, that such tutors be sought out for the education of a young child, whose life hath never been stained with dishonesty, whose good name hath never been called into question, whose manners hath been irreprehensible before the world. As husbandmen hedge in their trees, so should good schoolmasters with good manners hedge in the wit and disposition of the scholar, whereby the blossoms of learning may the sooner increase to a bud.

Many parents are in this to be misliked, which having neither trial of his honesty, nor experience of his learning to whom they commit the child to be taught, without any deep or due consideration, put them to one either ignorant or obstinate, the which if they themselves shall do of ignorance the folly cannot be excused, if of obstinacy their lewdness<sup>1</sup> is to be abhorred.

Some fathers are overcome with the flattery of those fools who profess outwardly great knowledge, and show a certain kind of dissembling sincerity in their life, others at the entreating of their familiar friends are content to commit their sons to one, without either substance of honesty or shadow of learning. By which their undiscereet dealing, they are like those sick men which reject the expert and cunning physician, and at the request of their friends admit the heedless practiser, which dangereth the patient, and bringeth the body to his bane:<sup>2</sup> or not unlike unto those, which at the instant and importunate suit of their acquaintance refuse a cunning pilot, and choose an unskilful mariner, which hazardeth the ship and themselves in the calmest sea.

Good God, can there be any that hath the name of a father that will esteem more the fancy of his friend than the nurture of his son? It was not in vain that Crates would often say, that if it were lawful even in the market place he would cry out: Whether run you fathers, which have all your cark and care to multiply your wealth, nothing regarding your children unto whom you must leave all. In this they resemble him which is very curious about the shoe and hath no care for the foot. Besides this there be many fathers so inflamed with the love of wealth, that they be as it were incensed with hate against their children; which Arisippus seeing in an old miser did partly note it, this old miser asking of Arisippus what he would take to teach and bring up his son, he answered a thousand groats: a thousand groats, God shield, answered this old huddle, I can have two servants at that price. Unto whom he made answer, thou shalt have two servants and one son, and whether wilt thou sell? Is it not absurd to have so great a care of the right hand of the child to cut his meat, that if he handle his knife in the left hand we rebuke him severely, and to be sure of his nurture in discipline and learning? . . .

It is good nurture that leadeth to virtue, and discreet demeanour that plaineth the path to felicity. If one have either the gifts of Fortune, as great riches, or of Nature, as seemly personage, he is to be despised in respect of learning. To be a noble man it is most excellent, but that is our ancestors, as Ulysses said to Ajax, as for our nobility, our stock, our kindred, and whatsoever we ourselves have not done, I scarcely account ours. Riches are precious, but Fortune ruleth the roost, which oftentimes taketh away all from them that have much, and giveth them more that had nothing, glory is a thing worthy to be followed, but as it is gotten with great travail, so is it lost in a small time.

Beauty is such a thing as we commonly prefer before all things, yet it fadeth before we perceive it to flourish: health is that which all men desire, yet ever subject to any disease; strength is to be wished for, yet is it either abated with an ague, or taken away with age; whosoever therefore boasteth of force, is too beastly, seeing he is in that quality not to be compared with beasts, as the lion, the bull, the elephant.

It is virtue, yea virtue, Gentlemen, that maketh gentlemen; that maketh the poor rich, the base born noble, the subject a sovereign, the deformed beautiful, the sick whole, the weak strong, the most miserable, the most happy. There are two principal and peculiar gifts in the nature of man, knowledge and reason: the one commandeth, the other obeyeth; these things neither the whirling wheel of fortune can change, neither the deceitful calling of worldlings separate, neither sickness abate, neither age abolish.

It is only knowledge, which worn with years waxeth young, and when all things are cut away with the sickle of Time, knowledge flourisheth so high that Time cannot reach it. War taketh all things with it even as the whirlpool, yet must it leave learning behind it, wherefore it was wisely answered in my opinion, of Stilpo the Philosopher, for when Demetrius won the City, and made it even to the ground leaving nothing standing, he demanded of Stilpo whether he had lost anything of his in this great spoil; unto whom he answered, no verily, for war getteth no spoil of virtue.

Unto the like sense may the answer of Socrates be applied, when Gorgias asked him whether he thought the Persian king happy or not; I know not, said he, how much virtue or discipline he hath, for happiness doth not consist in the gifts of fortune, but in the grace of virtue.

EUPHUES GLASS FOR EUROPE

(From Euphues and His England, 1580)

TO THE LADIES AND GENTLEWOMEN OF ITALY:
EUPHUES WISHETH HEALTH AND HONOUR

If I had brought (ladies) little dogs from Malta, or strange stones from India, or fine carpets from Turkey, I am sure that you would have either wooed me to have them, or wished to see them.

But I am come out of England with a glass, wherein you shall behold the things which you never saw, and marvel at the sights when you have seen. Not a glass to make you beautiful, but to make you blush, yet not at your vices, but at others' virtues, not a glass to dress your hairs but to redress your harms, by the which if you every morning correct your manners, being as careful to amend faults in your hearts, as you are curious to find faults in your heads, you shall in short time be as much commended for virtue of the wise, as for beauty of the wanton.

Thus, fair ladies, hoping you will be as willing to pry in this glass for amendment of manners, as you are to prank yourselves in a looking-glass, for commendation of men, I wish you as much beauty as you would have, so as you would endeavour to have as much virtue as you should have. And so farewell.

EUPHUES.

There is an isle lying in the ocean sea, directly against that part of France, which containeth Picardy and Normandy, called now England, heretofore named Britain, it hath Ireland upon the west side, on the north the main sea, on the east side the German Ocean. This Island is in circuit 1720 miles, in form like unto a triangle, being broadest in the south part, and gathering narrower and narrower till it come to the farthest point of Caithness, northward where it is narrowest, and there endeth in manner of a promontory. To repeat the ancient manner of this island or what sundry nations have inhabited there, to set down the giants, which in bigness of bone have passed the ordinary size, and almost common credit, to rehearse what diversity of languages have been used, into how many kingdoms it hath been divided, what religions have been followed before the coming of Christ, although it would breed great delight to your ears, yet might it happily seem tedious: for that honey taken excessively cloyeth the stomach though it be honey.

But my mind is briefly to touch such things as at my being there I gathered by mine own study and enquiry, not meaning to write a chronicle, but, to set down in a word what I heard by conference. . . .

Their air is very wholesome and pleasant, 5 their civility not inferior to those that deserve best, their wits very sharp and quick, although I have heard that the Italian and Frenchmen have accounted them but gross and dull pated, which I think came not to pass by the proof they made of their wits, but by the Englishman's report.

But this is strange (and yet how true it is, there is none that ever travelled thither but can report) that it is always incident to an 15 Englishman, to think worst of his own nation, either in learning, experience, common reason, or wit, preferring always a stranger rather for the name, than for the wisdom. I for mine own part think, that in all Europe there are 20 not lawyers more learned, divines more profound, physicians more expert, than are in England.

But that which most allureth a stranger is their courtesy, their civility and good entertainment. I speak this by experience, that I found more courtesy in England among those I never knew, in one year, than I have done in Athens or Italy among those I ever loved, in twenty.

But having entreated of the country and their conditions, let me come to the glass I promised, being the court.<sup>1</sup> . . .

Is not this a glass, fair ladies, for all other countries to behold, where there is not only an agreement in faith, religion, and counsel, but in friendship, brotherhood, and living? By whose good endeavours vice is punished, virtue rewarded, peace established, foreign broils repressed, domestic cares appeased? 40 what nation can of counsellors desire more? what dominion, yet excepted hath so much? when neither courage can prevail against their counsel, nor both joined in one be of force to undermine their country, when you have dazzled your eyes with this glass, behold here is another. It was my fortune to be acquainted with certain English gentlemen, which brought me to the court, where when I came, I was driven into a maze to behold the lusty and brave gallants, the beautiful and chaste ladies, the rare and godly orders, so as I could not tell whether I should most commend virtue or bravery. At the last coming oftener thither, than it besemed one of my degree, yet not so often as they desired my company, I began to pry after their manners, natures, and lives, and that which followeth I saw, whereof whose doubteth, I will swear.

The ladies spend the morning in devout prayer, not resembling the gentlewomen in Greece and Italy, who begin their morning at mid-noon, and make their evening at midnight, sing sonnets for psalms, and pastimes for prayers, reading the Epistle of a Lover, when they should peruse the Gospel of our Lord, drawing wanton lines when death is before their face, as Archimedes did triangles and circles when the enemy was at his back.<sup>2</sup> Behold, ladies, in this glass, that the service of God is to be preferred before all things, imitate the English damoselles who have their books tied to their girdles, not feathers; who are as cunning in the scriptures, as you are in Ariosto 15 or Petrarch or any book that liketh you best, and becometh you most.

For bravery I cannot say that you exceed them, for certainly it is the most gorgeous court that ever I have seen, read, or heard of, 20 but yet do they not use their apparel so nicely as you in Italy, who think scorn to kneel at service, for fear of wrinkles in your silks, who dare not lift up your head to heaven, for fear of rumpling the ruff in your neck, yet your hands I confess are holden up, rather I think, to show your rings, than to manifest your righteousness. The bravery they use is for the honour of their Prince, the attire you wear for the alluring of your prey, the rich apparel maketh their beauty more seen, your disguising causeth your faces to be more suspected, they resemble in their raiment the Ostrich who being gazed on, closeth her wings and hideth her feathers, you in your robes are not 35 unlike the peacock, who being praised spreadeth her tail, and betrayeth her pride. Velvets and silks in them are like gold about a pure diamond, in you like a green hedge, about a filthy dunghill. Think not, ladies, that because you are decked with gold, you are endued with grace, imagine not that shining like the sun in earth, ye shall climb the sun in heaven, look diligently into this English glass, and then shall you see that the more costly your apparel is, the greater your courtesy should be, that you ought to be as far from pride, as you are from poverty, and as near to princes in beauty, as you are in brightness. Because you are brave, disdain not those that are base, 50 you think with yourselves that russet coats have their Christendom, that the sun when he is at his height shineth as well upon coarse kersey, as cloth of tissue, though you have pearls in your ears, jewels in your breasts, precious stones on your fingers, yet disdain not the stones in the street, which although they are nothing so noble, yet are they much more necessary. Let not your robes hinder your devotion, learn of the English ladies, that God is worthy to be worshipped with the most price, to whom you ought to give all praise, then shall ye be like stars to the wise, who now are but staring stocks to the foolish, then shall you be praised of most, who are now pointed at of all, then shall God bear with your folly, who now abhorreth your pride.

THE PREËMINENCE OF POETRY

(From The Defense of Poesy, c. 1581)

Now therein of all sciences—I speak still of human, and according to the human conceit—is our poet the monarch. For he doth not only show the way, but giveth so sweet a prospect into the way as will entice any man to enter into it. Nay, he doth, as if your journey should lie through a fair vineyard, at the very first give you a cluster of grapes, that full of that taste you may long to pass further. He beginneth not with obscure definitions, which must blur the margent<sup>1</sup> with interpretations, and load the memory with doubtfulness. But he cometh to you with words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well-enchancing skill of music; and with a tale, forsooth, he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner, and, pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue; even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things, by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste,—which, if one should begin to tell them the nature of the aloes or rhubarb they should receive, would sooner take their physic at their ears than at their mouth. So it is in men, most of which are childish in the best things, till they be cradled in their graves,—glad they will be to hear the tales of Hercules, Cyrus, Æneas; and, hearing them, must needs hear the right description of wisdom, valor, and justice; which, if they had been barely, that is to say philosophically, set out, they would swear they be brought to school again.

That imitation whereof poetry is, hath the most conveniency to nature of all other; insomuch that, as Aristotle saith, those things which in themselves are horrible, as cruel battles, unnatural monsters, are made in poetical imitation delightful. Truly, I have known men, that even with reading Amadis de Gaule,<sup>2</sup> which, God knoweth, wanteth much of a perfect poesy, have found their hearts moved to the exercise of courtesy, liberality, and especially courage. Who readeth Æneas carrying old Anchises on his back, that wisheth not it were his fortune to perform so excellent an act? Whom do not those words of Turnus move, the tale of Turnus having planted his image in his imagination?

Fugientem hæc terra videbit?

Where<sup>4</sup> the philosophers, as they scorn to delight, so must they be content little to move—saving wrangling whether virtue be the chief or the only good, whether the contemplative or the active life do excel—which Plato and Boethius well knew, and therefore made Mistress Philosophy very often borrow the masking raiment of Poesy. For even those hard hearted evil men who think virtue a school-name, and know no other good but indulgere genio,<sup>5</sup> and therefore despise the austere admonitions of the philosopher, and feel not the inward reason they stand upon, yet will be content to be delighted, which is all the good-fellow poet seemeth to promise; and so steal to see the form of goodness—which, seen, they cannot but love—are themselves be aware, as if they took a medicine of cherries.

(From The Arcadia, 1590)

Who can choose that saw her but think where she stayed, where she walked, where she turned, where she spoke? But what is all this? Truly no more, but as this place served us to think of those things, so those things serve as places to call to memory more excellent matters. No, no, let us think with consideration, and consider with acknowledging, and acknowledge with admiration, and admire with love, and love with joy in the midst of all woes; let us in such sort think, I say, that our poor eyes were so enriched as to behold; and our low hearts so exalted as to love, a maid, who is such, that as the greatest thing the world can show, is her beauty, so the least thing that may be praised in her, is her beauty. Certainly as her eyelids are more pleasant to behold, than two white kids climbing up a fair tree, and browsing on his tenderest branches, and yet are nothing compared to the day-shining stars contained in them; and as her breath is more sweet than a gentle South-west wind, which comes creeping over flowery fields and shadowed waters in the extreme heat of the summer, and yet is nothing, compared to the honey-flowing speech that breath doth carry: no more all that our eyes can see of her (though when they have seen her, what else they shall ever see is but dry stubble after clover's grass) is to be matched with the flock of unspeakable virtues laid up delightfully in that best builded fold. But indeed as we can best consider the sun's beauty, by marking how he gilds these waters and mountains, than by looking upon his own face, too glorious for our weak eyes: so it may be our conceits (not able to bear her sun staining excellency) will better weigh it by her works upon some meaner subject employed. And alas, who can better witness that than we, whose experience is grounded upon feeling? Hath not the only love of her made us (being silly ignorant shepherds) raise up our thoughts above the ordinary level of the world, so as great clerks do not disdain our conference? Hath not the desire to seem worthy in her eyes, made us, when others were sleeping, to sit viewing the course of the heavens? When others were running at Base,<sup>1</sup> to run over learned writings? When others mark their sheep, we to mark ourselves? Hath not she thrown reason upon our desires, and, as it were, given eyes unto Cupid? Hath in any, but in her, love-fellowship maintained friendship between rivals, and beauty taught the beholders chastity?

A DESCRIPTION OF ARCADIA

(From the same)

There were hills which garnished their proud heights with stately trees: humble valleys, whose base estate seemed comforted with the refreshing of silver rivers: meadows, enamelled with all sorts of eye-pleasing flowers; thickets, which being lined with most pleasant shade were witnessed so to, by the cheerful disposition of many well tuned birds: each pasture stored with sheep, feeding with sober security, while the pretty lambs with bleating oratory craved the dams' comfort, here a shepherd's boy piping, as though he should never be old: there a young shepherdess knitting, and withal singing, and it seemed that her voice comforted her hands to work, and her hands kept time to her voice-music. As for the houses of the country (for many houses came under my eye) they were all scattered, no two being one by the other, and yet not so far off as that it barred mutual succour: a show, as it were of an accompanable solitariness, and of a civil wildness. I pray you (said Musidorus, then first unsealing his long silent lips) what countries be these we pass through, which are so divers in show, the one wanting no store, the other having no store but of want?

The country (answered Claius) where you were cast ashore, and now are passed through, is Laconia, not so poor by the barrenness of the soil (though in itself not passing fertile) as by a civil war, which being these two years within the bowels of that estate, between the gentlemen and the peasants (by them named Helots) hath in this sort as it were disfigured the face of nature, and made it so unhospitable as now you have found it: the towns neither of the one side, nor the other, willingly opening their gates to strangers, nor strangers willingly entering for fear of being mistaken.

But this country (where now you set your foot) is Arcadia: and even hard by is the house of Kalander, whither we lead you. This country being thus decked with peace, and (the child of peace) good husbandry, these houses you see so scattered, are of men, as we two are, that live upon the commodity of their sheep: and therefore in the division of the Arcadian estate are termed shepherds; a happy people, wanting little, because they desire not much.

SALADIN AND ROSADER<sup>1</sup>

(From Rosalind, 1590)

Saladin, how art thou disquieted in thy thoughts, and perplexed with a world of restless passions, having thy mind troubled with the tenor of thy father's testament, and thy heart fired with the hope of present preferment? By the one thou art counseled to content thee with thy fortunes, by the other, persuaded to aspire to higher wealth. Riches, Saladin, is a great royalty, and there is no sweeter physic than store. Avicen<sup>2</sup> like a fool forgot in his aphorisms to say that gold was the most precious restorative, and that treasure was the most excellent medicine of the mind. Oh Saladin! what, were thy father's precepts breathed into the wind? hast thou so soon forgotten his principles? did he not warn thee from coveting without honor, and climbing without virtue? did he not forbid thee to aim at any action that should not be honorable? and what will be more prejudicial to thy credit, than the careless ruin of thy brothers' prosperity? and wilt thou become the subversion of their fortunes? Is there any sweeter thing than concord, or a more precious jewel than amity? are you not sons of one father, scions of one tree, birds of one nest? and wilt thou become so unnatural as to rob them whom thou shouldst relieve? No, Saladin, entreat them with favors, and entertain them with love, so shalt thou have thy conscience clear and thy renown excellent. Tush, what words are these, base fool, far unfit (if thou be wise) for thy honor. What though thy father at his death talked of many frivolous matters, as one that doated for age and raved in his sickness, shall his words be axioms, and his talk be so authentic, that thou wilt (to observe them) prejudice thyself? No, no, Saladin, sick men's wills that are parole, and have neither hand nor seal, are like the laws of a city written in dust, which are broken with the blast of every wind. What, man! thy father is dead, and he can neither help thy fortunes nor measure thy actions; therefore bury his words with his carcase, and be wise for thyself. What, 'tis not so old as true:

"Non sapit, qui sibi non sapit."<sup>3</sup>

Thy brother is young, keep him now in awe, make him not cheekmate with thyself: for

"Nimia familiaritas contemptum parit."<sup>4</sup>

Let him know little, so shall he not be able to execute much; suppress his wits with a base estate, and though he be a gentleman by nature yet form him anew, and make him a peasant by nurture; so shalt thou keep him as a slave, and reign thyself sole lord over all thy father's possessions. As for Fernandine, thy middle brother, he is a scholar, and hath no mind but on Aristotle; let him read on Galen<sup>5</sup> while thou riflest with gold, and pore on his book till thou dost purchase lands: wit is great wealth; if he have learning it is enough, and so let all rest.

In this humor was Saladin, making his brother Rosader his foot-boy for the space of two or three years, keeping him in such servile subjection, as if he had been the son of any country vassal. The young gentleman bore all with patience, till on a day walking in the garden by himself, he began to consider how he was the son of John of Bordeaux, a knight renowned for many victories, and a gentleman famous for his virtues; how, contrary to the testament of his father, he was not only kept from his land, and entreated as a servant, but smothered in such secret slavery, as he might not attain to any honorable actions. Alas, quoth he to himself (nature working these effectual passions), why should I, that am a gentleman born, pass my time in such unnatural drudgery?<sup>6</sup> were it not better either in Paris to become a scholar, or in the court a courtier, or in the field a soldier, than to live a foot-boy to my own brother? Nature hath lent me wit to conceive, but my brother denied me art to contemplate: I have strength to perform any honorable exploit, but no liberty to accomplish my virtuous endeavors: those good parts that God hath bestowed upon me, the envy of my brother doth smother in obscurity; the harder is my fortune, and the more his frowardness. With that casting up his hand he felt hair on his face, and perceiving his beard to bud, for choler he began to blush, and swore to himself he would be no more subject to such slavery. As thus he was ruminating of his melancholy passions, in came Saladin with his men, and seeing his brother in a brown study, and to forget his wonted reverence, thought to shake him out of his dumps thus: "Sir," quoth he, "what, is your heart on your halfpenny, or are you saying a dirge for your father's soul? what, is my dinner ready?" At this question—Rosader turning his head askance, and bending his brows as if anger there had ploughed the furrows of her wrath, with his eyes full of fire—he made this reply, "Dost thou ask me, Saladin, for thy cates? ask some of thy churls who are fit for such office; I am thine equal by nature, though not by birth, and though thou hast more cards in the bunch, have as many trumps in my hand as thyself. Let me question with thee, why thou hast felled my woods, spoiled my manor houses, and made havoc with such utensils as my father bequeathed unto me? I tell thee, Saladin, either answer me as a brother, or I will trouble thee as an enemy."

At this reply of Rosader's, Saladin smiled as laughing at his presumption, and frowned as checking his folly: he therefore took him up thus shortly: "What, sir! well I see early pricks the tree that will prove a thorn: hath my familiar conversing with you made you coy,<sup>7</sup> or my good looks drawn you to be thus contemptuous? I can quickly remedy such a fault, and I will bend the tree while it is a wand. In faith, sir boy, I have a snaffle for such a headstrong colt. You, sirs, lay hold on him and bind him, and then I will give him a cooling card for his choler." This made Rosader half mad, that stepping to a great rake that stood in the garden, he laid such load upon his brother's men that he hurt some of them, and made the rest of them run away. Saladin seeing Rosader so resolute, and with his resolution so valiant, thought his heels his best safety, and took him to a loft adjoining the garden, whither Rosader pursued him hotly. Saladin, afraid of his brother's fury, cried out to him thus, "Rosader, be not so rash, I am thy brother, and thy elder, and if I have done thee wrong, I'll make thee amends: revenge not anger in blood, for so shalt thou stain the virtue of old Sir John of Bordeaux: say wherein thou art discontent and thou shalt be satisfied. Brothers' frowns ought not to be periods of wrath: what, man, look not so sourly; I know we shall be friends, and better friends than we have been; for, Amantium ira amoris redintegratio est."<sup>8</sup>

These words appeased the choler of Rosader, for he was of a mild and courteous nature, so that he laid down his weapons, and upon the faith of a gentleman assured his brother he would offer him no prejudice: whereupon Saladin came down, and after a little parley, they embraced each other and became friends, and Saladin promising Rosader the restitution of all his lands, and what favor else, quoth he, anyways my ability or the nature of a brother may perform.

<sup>6</sup> Rosader's soliloquy, and the interview with his brother which follows, should be compared with the opening scene of As You Like It. That comedy appeared some eight or nine years after the publication of Lodge's romance, and Shakespeare's indebtedness to Lodge is self-evident.

<sup>8</sup> The anger of lovers is the restoration of love. This saying is the theme of a well-known poem, the Amantium ira of Richard Edwards, which appeared in 1576. In this poem the proverb recurs as a kind of refrain.

GREENE'S FAREWELL TO HIS FELLOW-PLAYWRIGHTS*(From A Groat's worth of Wit, bought with a million of Repentance, 1592)To those Gentlemen his quondam acquaintances, that spend their wits in making Plays R. G. wisheth a better exercise, and wisdom to prevent his extremities.*

If woeful experience may move you (Gentlemen) to beware, or unheard of wretchedness entreat you to take heed: I doubt not but you will look back with sorrow on your time past, and endeavor with repentance to spend that which is to come. Wonder not, (for with thee will I first begin, thou famous gracer of tragedians,<sup>1</sup> that Greene, who hath said with thee like the fool in his heart "there is no God," should now give glory unto his greatness: for penetrating is his power, his hand lies heavy upon me, he hath spoken unto me with a voice of thunder, and I have felt he is a God that can punish enemies. Why should thy excellent wit, his gift, be so blinded, that thou shouldst give no glory to the giver? Is it pestilent Machiavellian policy<sup>2</sup> that thou hast studied? O punish folly! What are his rules but mere confused mockeries, able to extirpate in some small time the generation of mankind. For if Sic volo, sic jubeo,<sup>3</sup> hold in those that are able to command: and if it be lawful Fas et nefas<sup>4</sup> to do anything that is beneficial, only Tyrants should possess the earth, and they striving to exceed in tyranny, should each to other be a slaughter man; till the mightiest outliving all, one stroke were left for Death, that in one age man's life should end. The brother of this Diabolical atheism is dead, and in his life had never the felicity he aimed at; but as he began in craft, lived in fear, and ended in despair. Quam inscrutabilia sunt Dei judicia!<sup>5</sup> This murderer of many brethren, had his conscience seared like Cain: this betrayer of him that gave his life for him, inherited the portion of Judas: this Apostata perished as ill as Julian.<sup>6</sup> and wilt thou, my friend, be his Disciple? Look unto me, by him persuaded to that liberty, and thou shalt find it an infernal bondage. I know the least of my demerits merit this miserable death, but wilful striving against known truth, exceedeth all the terrors of my soul. Defer not (with me) till this last point of extremity; for little knowest thou how in the end thou shalt be visited.

10 With thee I join young Juvenal,<sup>7</sup> that biting Satyrst, that lastly with me together writ a comedy. Sweet boy, might I advise thee, be advised, and get not many enemies by bitter words: inveigh against vain men, for thou canst do it, no man better, no man so well: thou hast a liberty to reprove all and none more; for one being spoken to, all are offended, none being blamed no man is injured. Stop shallow water still running, it will rage, tread on a worm and it will turn: then blame not scholars vexed with sharp lines, if they reprove thy too much liberty of reproof.

And thou no less deserving than the other two,<sup>8</sup> in some things rarer, in nothing inferior; driven (as myself) to extreme shifts, a little have I to say to thee; and were it not an idolatrous oath, I would swear by sweet St. George, thou art unworthy better hap, sith thou depended on so mean a stay. Base minded men all three of you, if by my misery ye be not warned: for unto none of you (like me) sought those burrs to cleave, those Puppets (I mean) that speech from our mouths, those anticks<sup>9</sup> garnished in our colors. Is it not strange that I, to whom they all have been beholding:<sup>10</sup> is it not like that you, to whom they all have been beholding, shall (were ye in that case that I am now) be both at once of them forsaken? Yes, trust them not: for there is an upstart Crow,<sup>11</sup> beautiful with our feathers that with his Tigers heart wrapt in a Players hide, supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blank verse as the best of you! and being an absolute Johannes fac totem,<sup>12</sup> is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene in a county. O that I might entreat your rare wit to be employed in more profitable courses; and let those Apes imitate your past excellence, and never more acquaint them with your admired inventions. I know 50 the best husband<sup>13</sup> of you all will never prove an Usurer, and the kindest of them all will never prove a kind nurse: Yet whilst you may, seek you better masters; for it is a pity men of such rare wits should be subject to the pleasures of such rude grooms.

In this I might insert two more, that both have writ against these buckram Gentlemen: but let their own works serve to witness against their own wickedness, if they persevere to maintain any such peasants. For other new comers, I leave them to the mercy of these painted monsters, who (I doubt not) will drive the best minded to despise them, for the rest, it skills not though they make a jest at them.

But now return I again to you three, knowing my misery is to you no news; and let me heartily entreat you to be warned by my harms. Delight not (as I have done) in irreligious oaths; for from the blasphemers house, a curse shall not depart. Despire drunkenness, which wasteth the wit, and maketh men all equal unto beasts. Fly lust, as the deathsmen of the soul, and defile not the Temple of the Holy Ghost. Abhor thou Epicurus, whose loose life hath made religion loathsome to your ears; and when they soothe you with terms of mastership, remember Robert Greene, whom they have so often flattered, perishes now for want of comfort. Remember, Gentlemen, your lives are like so many lighted Tapers, that are with care delivered to all of you to maintain; these with wind-puffed wrath may be extinguished, which drunkenness put out, which negligence let fall: for man's time of itself is not so short, but it is more shortened by sin. The fire of my life is now at its last snuff, and the want of wherewith to sustain it, there is no substance left for life to feed on. Trust not then (I beseech ye) to such weak stays; for they are as changeable in mind, as in many attires. Well, my hand is tired, and I am forced to leave when I would fain begin; for a whole book cannot contain these wrongs, which I am forced to knit up in some few lines of words.

Desirous that you should live, though himself be dying,

ROBERT GREENE.

Francis Bacon

OF DEATH

(Essays, 1597, 1612, 1625)

Men fear death as children fear to go into the dark; and as that natural fear in children is increased with tales, so is the other. Certainly, the contemplation of death, as the wages of sin, and passage to another world, is holy and religious; but the fear of it, as a tribute due unto nature, is weak. Yet in religious meditations there is sometimes mixture of vanity and of superstition. You shall read in some of the friars' books of mortification, that a man should think with himself what the pain is, if he have but his finger's end pressed, or tortured, and thereby imagine what the pains of death are when the whole body is corrupted and dissolved; when many times death passeth with less pain than the torture of a limb—for the most vital parts are not the quickest of sense: and by him that spake only as a philosopher and natural man, it was well said, "Pompa mortis magis terret quam mors ipsa."<sup>1</sup> Groans, and convulsions, and a discoloured face, and friends weeping, and blacks,<sup>2</sup> and obsequies, and the like, show death terrible. It is worthy the observing, that there is no passion in the mind of man so weak, but it mates and masters the fear of death; and therefore death is no such terrible enemy when a man hath so many attendants about him, that can win the combat of him. Revenge triumphs over death; love slights it; honour aspireth to it, grief flieth to it; fear pre-occupateth it; nay, we read, after Otho<sup>3</sup> the emperor had slain himself, pity (which is the tenderest of affections) provoked many to die out of mere compassion to their sovereign, and as the truest sort of followers. Nay, Seneca adds, niceness and satiety: "Cogita quamdiu eadem feceris; mori velle, non tantum fortis, aut miser, sed etiam fastidiosus potest."<sup>4</sup> "A man would die, though he were neither valiant nor miserable, only upon a weariness to do the same thing so oft over and over." It is no less worthy to observe, how little alteration in good spirits the approaches of death make; for they appear to be the same men till the last instant. Augustus Cæsar died in a compliment: "Livia, conjugii nostri memor vive, et vale."<sup>5</sup> Tiberius in dissimulation, as Tacitus saith of him, "Jam Tiberium vires et corpus, non dissimulatio, deserebant."<sup>6</sup> . . . Galba with a sentence, "Feri, si ex re sit populi Romani,"<sup>7</sup> holding forth his neck: Septimus Severus in despatch, "Adeste si quid mihi restat agendum,"<sup>7</sup> and the like. Certainly the Stoics bestowed too much cost upon death, and by their great preparations made it appear more fearful. Better, saith he, "qui finem vitæ extremum inter munera ponat naturæ."<sup>8</sup> It is as natural to die as to be born; and to a little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other. He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood; who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good, doth avert the 10 dolours of death: but, above all, believe it, the sweetest canticle is, Nunc dimittis,<sup>9</sup> when a man hath obtained worthy ends and expectations. Death hath this also, that it openeth the gate to good fame, and extinguisheth 15 envy: "Extinctus amabitur idem."<sup>10</sup>

OF ADVERSITY

(From the same)

It was a high speech of Seneca (after the manner of the Stoics), that the "good things which belong to prosperity are to be wished, but the good things that belong to adversity 25 are to be admired"—"Bona rerum secundarum optabilia, adversarum mirabilia." Certainly, if miracles be the command over nature, they appear most in adversity. It is yet a higher speech of his than the other (much too high 30 for a heathen) "It is true greatness to have in one the frailty of a man, and the security of a God"—"Vere magnum habere fragilitatem hominis, securitatem Dei." This would have done better in poesy, where transcendencies<sup>1</sup> 35 are more allowed; and the poets, indeed, have been busy with it—for it is in effect the thing which is figured in that strange fiction of the ancient poets, which seemeth not to be without mystery;<sup>2</sup> nay, and to have some approach to the state of a Christian, "that Hercules, when he went to unbind Prometheus (by whom 40 human nature is represented), sailed the length of the great ocean in an earthen pot or pitcher, lively describing Christian resolution, that 45 saileth in the frail bark of the flesh through the waves of the world. But to speak in a mean,<sup>3</sup> the virtue of prosperity is temperance, the virtue of adversity is fortitude, which in morals is the more heroic virtue. Prosperity is the 50 blessing of the Old Testament, adversity is the blessing of the New, which carrieth the greater benediction, and the clearer revelation of God's favour. Yet even in the Old Testament, if you listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols; and the pencil 5 of the Holy Ghost hath laboured more in describing the afflictions of Job than the felicities of Solomon. Prosperity is not without many fears and distastes; and adversity is not without comforts and hopes. We see in needle- 10 works and embroideries, it is more pleasing to have a lively work upon a sad<sup>4</sup> and solemn ground, than to have a dark and melancholy work upon a lightsome ground: judge, therefore, of the pleasure of the heart by the pleasure 15 of the eye. Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant where they are incensed, or crushed; for prosperity doth best discover vice, but adversity doth best discover virtue.

OF WISDOM FOR A MAN'S SELF

(From the same)

An ant is a wise creature for itself, but it is 25 a shrewd<sup>1</sup> thing in an orchard or garden; and certainly men that are great lovers of themselves waste the public. Divide with reason between self-love and society; and be so true to thyself as thou be not false to others, especially to thy king and country. It is a poor 30 center of a man's actions, himself. It is right earth; for that only stands fast<sup>2</sup> upon his own center; whereas all things that have affinity with the heavens move upon the center of another, which they benefit. The referring of all 35 to a man's self is more tolerable in a sovereign prince, because themselves are not only themselves, but their good and evil is at the peril of the public fortune: but it is a desperate evil in a servant to a prince, or a citizen in a re- 40 public; for whatsoever affairs pass such a man's hands, he crooketh them to his own ends, which must needs be often eccentric, to the ends of his master or State: therefore, let 45 princes or States chuse such servants as have not this mark, except they mean their service should be made but the accessary. That which maketh the effect more pernicious is, that all proportion is lost. It were disproportion enough 50 for the servant's good to be preferred before the master's; but yet it is a greater extreme, when a little good of the servant shall carry things against a great good of the master's: and yet that is the case of bad officers, treas- 55 urers, ambassadors, generals, and other false

<sup>9</sup> "Now letteth thou thy servant depart in peace." St. Luke xi. 29.

and corrupt servants, which set a bias<sup>3</sup> upon their bowl, of their own petty ends and envies, to the overthrow of their master's great and important affairs. And for the most part, the good such servants receive is after the model of their own fortune, but the hurt they sell for that good is after the model of their master's fortune. And certainly it is the nature of extreme self-lovers, as they will set a house on fire and it were but to roast their eggs; and yet these men many times hold credit with their masters, because their study is but to please them, and profit themselves; and for either respect they will abandon the good of their affairs.

Wisdom for a man's self is, in many branches thereof, a depraved thing: it is the wisdom of rats, that will be sure to leave a house some time before its fall: it is the wisdom of the fox, that thrusts out the badger, who digged and made room for him: it is the wisdom of crocodiles, that shed tears when they would devour. But that which is specially to be noted is, that those which (as Cicero says of Pompey) are "sui amantes sine rivali"<sup>4</sup> are many times unfortunate: and whereas they have all their time sacrificed to themselves, they become in the end themselves sacrifices to the inconsistency of fortune, whose wings they thought by their self-wisdom to have pinioned.

OF RICHES

(From the same)

I cannot call riches better than the baggage<sup>5</sup> of virtue: the Roman word is better—impedimenta; for as the baggage is to an army, so is riches to virtue—it cannot be spared nor left behind, but it hindereth the march; yea, and the care of it sometimes loseth or disturbeth the victory. Of great riches there is no real use, except it be in the distribution; the rest is but conceit; so saith Solomon, "Where much is, there are many to consume it; and what hath the owner but the sight of it with his eyes?"<sup>6</sup> The personal fruition in any man cannot reach to feel great riches: there is a custody of them, or a power of dole, and a donative of them, or a fame of them, but no solid use to the owner. Do you not see what feigned prices are set upon little stones or rarities—and what works of ostentation are undertaken, because there might seem to be some use of great riches?

<sup>3</sup> In the game of bowls, the bowl (or ball) was not perfectly round, but disproportionately swelled out on one side to prevent it from running in a straight course; this irregularity in shape was called the bias. Sometimes the same end was gained by weighting one side of the bowl.

But then, you will say, they may be of use to buy men out of dangers or troubles; as Solomon saith, "Riches are as a stronghold in the imagination of the rich man;"<sup>7</sup> but this is excellently expressed, that it is in imagination, and not always in fact; for, certainly great riches have sold more men than they have bought out. Seek not proud riches, but such as thou mayest get justly, use soberly, distribute cheerfully, and leave contentedly: yet have no abstract or friarly contempt of them, but distinguish, as Cicero saith well of Rabirius Posthumus, "In studio rei amplificandæ, apparatus, non avaritiæ prædam, sed instrumentum bonitati quæri."<sup>8</sup> Harken also to Solomon, and beware of hasty gathering of riches: "Qui festinat ad divitias, non erit insons."<sup>9</sup> The poets feign that when Plutus (which is riches) is sent from Jupiter, he limps, and goes slowly, but when he is sent from Pluto, he runs, and is swift of foot; meaning, that riches gotten by good means and just labour pace slowly, but when they come by the death of others (as by the course of inheritance, testaments, and the like) they come tumbling upon a man: but it might be applied likewise to Pluto taking him for the devil: for when riches come from the Devil (as by fraud, and oppression, and unjust means) they come upon speed. The ways to enrich are many, and most of them foul: parsimony is one of the best, and yet it is not innocent, for it withholdeth men from works of liberality and charity. The improvement of the ground is the most natural obtaining of riches, for it is our great mother's blessing, the earth; but it is slow: and yet, where men of great wealth do stoop to husbandry, it multiplieth riches exceedingly. I knew a nobleman of England that had the greatest audits<sup>5</sup> of any man in my time,—a great grazier, a great sheep master, a great timber man, a great collier, a great corn master, a great lead man, and so of iron, and a number of the like points of husbandry; so as the earth seemed a sea to him in respect of the perpetual importation. It was truly observed by one, "that himself came very hardly to little riches, and very easily to great riches:" for when a man's stock is come to that, that he can expect the prime of markets,<sup>6</sup> and overcome those bargains, which for their greatness are few men's money, and the partner in the industries of younger men, he cannot but increase mainly.<sup>7</sup> The gains of ordinary trades and vocations are honest, and furthered by two things, chiefly, by diligence, and by a good name for good and fair dealing; but the gains of bargains are of a more doubtful nature, when men shall wait upon others' necessity,<sup>8</sup> broke by servants,<sup>9</sup> and instruments to draw them on; put off others cunningly that would be better chapmen,<sup>10</sup> and the like practices, which are crafty and naughty. As for the chopping of bargains,<sup>11</sup> when a man buys not to hold, but to sell over again, that commonly grindeth double, both upon the seller and upon the buyer. Sharings do greatly enrich, if the hands be well chosen that are trusted. Usury<sup>12</sup> is the certainest means of gain, though one of the worst, as that whereby a man doth eat his bread, "in sudore vultus alieni,"<sup>13</sup> and besides, doth plough upon Sundays; but yet certain though it be, it hath flaws; for that the scribes and brokers do value unsound men to serve their own turn. The fortune in being the first in an invention, or in a privilege, doth cause sometimes a wonderful overgrowth in riches; as it was with the first sugar man in the Canaries: therefore, if a man can play the true logician, to have as well judgment as invention, he may do great matters, especially if the times be fit. He that resteth upon gains certain, shall hardly grow to great riches; and he that puts all upon adventures, doth oftentimes break and come to poverty: it is good, therefore, to guard adventures with certainties that may uphold losses. Monopolies, and coemption of wares for re-sale, where they are not restrained, are great means to enrich; especially if the party have intelligence what things are like to come into request, and so store himself beforehand. Riches gotten by service, though it be of the best, rise; yet when they are gotten by flattery, feeding humours, and other servile conditions, they may be placed among the worst. As for "fishing for testaments and executorships," (as Tacitus saith of Seneca, "Testamenta et orbos tanquam indagine capi,")<sup>14</sup> it is yet worse, by how much men submit themselves to meaner persons than in service.

<sup>9</sup> "When men shall" transact business (broke) through agents, who are used as tools to draw on the buyer to give a high price.

Believe not much them that seem to despise riches, for they despise them that despair of them; and none worse when they come to them. Be not penny-wise; riches have wings, and sometimes they fly away of themselves, sometimes they must be set flying to bring in more. Men leave their riches either to their kindred or to the Public; and moderate portions prosper best in both. A great estate left to an heir, is as a lure to all the birds of prey round about to seize on him, if he be not the better established in years and judgment: likewise, glorious gifts and foundations are like sacrifices without salt;<sup>15</sup> and but the painted sepulchres of alms, which soon will putrify and corrupt inwardly. Therefore measure not thine advancements<sup>16</sup> by quantity, but frame them by measure; and defer not charities till death: for, certainly, if a man weigh it rightly, he that doth so is rather liberal of another man's than his own.

OF STUDIES

(From the same)

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. Their chief use for delight is in privateness, and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business; for expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots and marshalling of affairs, come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies, is sloth; to use them too much for ornament, is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules, is the humour of a scholar;<sup>1</sup> they perfect nature, and are perfected by experience—for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men condemn studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them, for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute, nor to believe and take for granted, nor to find talk and discourse, but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested: that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously;<sup>2</sup> and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy, and extracts made of them by others; but that would be only in the less important arguments, and the meaner sort of books; else distilled books are, like common distilled waters, flashy things. Reading maketh a full man, conference a ready man, and writing an exact man; and, therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, he had need have a present wit; and if he read little, he had need have much cunning, to seem to know that he doth not. Histories make men wise; poets witty; the mathematics subtle; natural philosophy deep; moral, grave; logic and rhetoric, able to contend: "Abeunt studia in mores"<sup>3</sup>—nay, there is no stond nor impediment in the wit, but may be wrought out by fit studies, like as diseases of the body may have appropriate exercises—bowling is good for the stone and reins, shooting for the lungs and breast, gentle walking for the stomach, riding for the head, and the like; so, if a man's wits be wandering, let him study the mathematics, for in demonstrations, if his wit be called away never so little, he must begin again; if his wit be not apt to distinguish or find differences, let him study the schoolmen, for they are "cymini sectores";<sup>4</sup> if he be not apt to beat over matters, and to call upon one thing to prove and illustrate another, let him study the lawyers' cases—so every defect of the mind may have a special receipt.

honour to Shakespeare, that in his writing, whatsoever he penned, he never blotted out a line. My answer hath been, "Would he had blotted a thousand," which they thought a malevolent speech. I had not told posterity this but for their ignorance, who chose that circumstance to commend their friend by wherein he most faulted; and to justify mine own candour, for I loved the man, and do honour his memory on this side idolatry as much as any. He was, indeed, honest, and of an open and free nature; had an excellent fancy, brave notions, and gentle expressions, wherein he flowed with that facility that sometime it was necessary he should be stopped. "Sufflamini adus erat,"<sup>3</sup> as Augustus said of Haterius. His wit was in his own power; would the rule of it had been so too. Many times he fell into those things, could not escape laughter, as when he said in the person of Cæsar, one speaking to him: "Cæsar, thou dost me wrong." He replied: "Cæsar did never wrong but with just cause;"<sup>4</sup> and such like, which were ridiculous. But he redeemed his vices with his virtues. There was ever more in him to be praised than to be pardoned.

De piis et probis.<sup>5</sup>—Good men are the stars, the planets of the ages wherein they live and illustrate<sup>6</sup> the times. God never let them be wanting to the world: as Abel, for an example of innocency, Enoch of purity, Noah of trust in God's mercies, Abraham of faith, and so of the rest. These, sensual men thought mad because they would not be partakers or practisers of their madness. But they, placed high on the top of all virtue, looked down on the stage of the world and contemned the play of fortune. For though the most be players, some must be spectators.

Amor nummi.<sup>7</sup>—Money never made any man rich, but his mind. He that can order himself to the law of Nature is not only without the sense but the fear of poverty. O, but to strike blind the people with our wealth and pomp is the thing! What a wretchedness is this, to thrust all our riches outward, and be beggars within; to contemplate nothing but the little, vile, and sordid things of the world; not the great, noble, and precious! We serve our avarice, and, not content with the good of the earth that is offered us, we search, and dig for the evil that is hidden. God offered us those things, and placed them at hand, and near us, that He knew were profitable for us, but the hurtful He laid deep and hid. Yet do we seek only the things whereby we may perish, and bring them forth, when God and Nature hath buried them. We covet superfluous things, when it were more honour for us if we could condemn necessary. What need hath Nature of silver dishes, multitudes of waiters, delicate pages, perfumed napkins? She requires meat only, and hunger is not ambitious. Can we think no wealth enough 10 but such a state for which a man may be brought into a præmunire,<sup>8</sup> begged,<sup>9</sup> proscribed, or poisoned? O! if a man could restrain the fury of his gullet and groin, and think how many fires, how many kitchens, cooks, pastures, and ploughed lands; what orchards, stews,<sup>10</sup> ponds and parks, coops and garners, he could spare; what velvets, tissues,<sup>11</sup> embroideries, laces, he could lack; and then how short and uncertain his life is; he were in a better way 20 to happiness than to live the emperor of these delights, and be the dictator of fashions. But we make ourselves slaves to our pleasures, and we serve fame and ambition, which is an equal slavery. Have not I seen the pomp of a whole 25 kingdom, and what a foreign king could bring hither also to make himself gazed and wondered at, laid forth, as it were, to the show, and vanish all away in a day? And shall that which could not fill the expectation of few hours, entertain and take up our whole lives, when even it appeared as superfluous to the possessors as to me that was a spectator? The bravery was shown, it was not possessed; while it boasted itself it perished. It is vile, and a poor thing to place our happiness on these desires. Say we wanted them all, famine ends famine.

De stultitia.<sup>12</sup>—What petty things they are we wonder at, like children that esteem every trifle, and prefer a fairing<sup>13</sup> before their fathers! What difference is between us and them but that we are dearer fools, coxcombs at a higher 15 rate? They are pleased with cockleshells, whistles, hobbyhorses, and such like; we with statues, marble pillars, pictures, gilded roofs, where underneath is lath and lime, perhaps loam. Yet we take pleasure in the lie, and are glad we can cozen ourselves. Nor is it only in our walls and ceilings, but all that we call happiness is mere painting and gilt, and all for money. What a thin membrane<sup>14</sup> of honour that is, and how hath all true reputation fallen, since money began to have any! Yet the great herd, the multitude, that in all other things are divided, in this alone conspire and agree—to love money. They wish for it, they embrace it, they adore it, while yet it is possessed with greater stir and torment than it is gotten. 30

THE SHEPHERD'S LIFE

(From The Purple Island, 1633)

CANTO I

Let others trust the seas, dare death and Hell,
Search either Ind', vaunt of their scars and wounds;
Let others their dear breath (nay, silence) sell
To fools, and (swol'n, not rich) stretch out their bounds, 160
By spoiling those that live, and wronging dead;
That they may drink in pearl, and couch their head
In soft, but sleepless down; in rich, but restless bed.
O, let them in their gold quaff dropsies down!
O, let them surfeits feast in silver bright! 165
Whilst sugar hires the taste the brain to drown,
And bribes of sauce corrupt false appetite,
His master's rest, health, heart, life, soul,
to sell;
Thus plenty, fulness, sickness, ring their knell.
Death weds, and beds them; first in grave, and then in Hell. 170
But ah! let me, under some Kentish hill,
Near rolling Medway, 'mong my shepherd peers,
With fearless merry-make, and piping still,
Securely pass my few and slow-pac'd years:
While yet the great Augustus of our nation,
Shuts up old Janus' in this long cessation,
Strength'ning our pleasing ease, and gives us sure vacation.

There may I, master of a little flock,
Feed my poor lambs, and often change their fare: 179
My lovely mate shall tend my sparing stock,
And nurse my little ones with pleasing care;
Whose love, and look, shall speak their father plain.
Health be my feast, Heaven hope, content
my gain;
So in my little house my lesser heart shall reign.

The beech shall yield a cool safe canopy, 185
While down I sit, and chant to th' echoing
wood:

Ah, singing might I live, and singing die!
So by fair Thames, or silver Medway's flood,

<sup>1</sup> The Roman god, the doors of whose temple at Rome were shut only in a time of universal peace. In 1642, less than ten years after this tribute was written, the Civil War began, and in 1649, Charles I, the "great Augustus," was beheaded.

The dying swan, when years her temples pierce,
In music's strains breathes out her life and verse, 190
And chanting her own dirge tides on her wat'ry hearse.

What, shall I then need seek a patron out;
Or beg a favour from a mistress' eyes,
To fence my song against the vulgar rout:
Or shine upon me with her geminies?<sup>2</sup>
What care I, if they praise my slender
song? 196
Or reckon I, if they do me right or wrong?
A shepherd's bliss nor stands, nor falls, to every tongue. . . .

CANTO XII

Thrice, oh, thrice happy shepherd's life and state!
When courts are happiness, unhappy pawns!
His cottage low, and safely humble gate, 10
Shuts out proud Fortune with her scorns and fawns:
No feared treason breaks his quiet sleep:
Singing all day, his flocks he learns to keep;
Himself as innocent as are his simple sheep.
No Serian worms<sup>3</sup> he knows, that with their thread 15
Draw out their silken lives:—nor silken
pride!
His lambs' warm fleece well fits his little need,
Not in that proud Sidonian tincture<sup>4</sup> dy'd:
No empty hopes, no courtly fears him fright;
Nor begging wants his middle fortune bite: 20
But sweet content exiles both misery and spite.

Instead of music, and base flattering tongues,
Which wait to first salute my lord's uprise;
The cheerful lark wakes him with early songs,
And birds' sweet whistling notes unlock his eyes. 25
In country plays is all the strife he uses;
Or sing, or dance, unto the rural Muses;
And but in music's sports, all differences refuses.

His certain life, that never can deceive him,
Is full of thousand sweets, and rich content: 30

The smooth-leav'd beeches, in the fields receive him
With coolest shades, till noon-tide's rage is spent:
His life is neither tost in boist'rous seas
Of troublous world, nor lost in slothful ease;
Pleas'd and full blest he lives, when he his God can please. 35

His bed of wool, yields safe and quiet sleeps,
While by his side his faithful spouse hath
place:
His little son into his bosom creeps,
The lively picture of his father's face:
Never his humble house or state torment
him; 40
Less he could like, if less his God had sent him;
And when he dies, green turfs, with grassy tomb, content him.

CHRIST'S VICTORY AND TRIUMPH,

1610

(Christ's Victory in Heaven)

What hath man done, that man shall not undo, 600
Since God to him is grown so near a-kin?
Did his foe slay him? he shall slay his foe:
Hath he lost all? he all again shall win:
Is sin his master? he shall master sin:
Too hardy soul, with sin the field to try: 605
The only way to conquer, was to fly:
But thus long death hath liv'd, and now death's self shall die.

He is a path, if any be misled;
He is a robe, if any naked be;
If any chance to hunger, he is bread; 610
If any be a bondman, he is free;
If any be but weak, how strong is he?
To dead men life he is, to sick men health:
To blind men sight, and to the needy wealth;
A pleasure without loss, a treasure without stealth. 615

Who can forget, never to be forgot,
The time, that all the world in slumber lies:
When, like the stars, the singing angels shot
To Earth, and Heav'n awak'd all his eyes,
To see another Sun at midnight rise 620
On Earth? was never sight of pareil<sup>1</sup> fame:
For God before, man like himself did frame,
But God himself now like a man became.

A child he was, and had not learn't to speak,
That with his word the world before did make:
His mother's arms him bore, he was so weak, 626
That with one hand the vaults of Heav'n could shake.

<sup>1</sup> Equal.

See how small room my infant Lord doth take,
Whom all the world is not enough to hold.
Who of his years, or of his age hath told? 630
Never such age so young, never a child so old.

THE AUTHOR'S RESOLUTION IN A SONNET

(From Fidelia, 1615)

Shall I, wasting in despaire
Dye, because a woman's fair?
Or make pale my cheeks with care
Cause anothers Rosie are?
Be she fairer than the Day
Or the flowry Meads in May,
If she think not well of me,
What care I how fair she be?

Shall my seely<sup>1</sup> heart be pin'd
Cause I see a woman kind? 10
Or a well disposed Nature
Joyned with a lovely feature?
Be she Meeker, Kinder than Turtle-dove or Pellican:
If she be not so to me,
What care I how kind she be? 15

Shall a woman's Vertues move
Me to perish for her Love?
Or her well deservings known
Make me quite forget mine own? 20
Be she with that Goodness blest
Which may merit name of best:
If she be not such to me,
What care I how Good she be?

Cause her Fortune seems too high
Shall I play the fool and die?
She that beares a Noble mind,
If not outward helps she find,
Thinks what with them he would do,
That without them dares her woo. 30
And unless that Minde I see
What care I how great she be?

Great, or Good, or Kind, or Faire
I will ne're the more despaire:
If she love me (this believe) 35
I will Die ere she shall grieve.
If she slight me when I woo,
I can scorn and let her go,
For if she be not for me
What care I for whom she be? 40

A CHRISTMAS CAROL

So now is come our joyful feast,
Let every man be jolly;
Each room with ivy leaves is drest,
And every post with holly.

<sup>1</sup> Used here in the sense of "simple," "artless," or "foolish."

Though some churls at our mirth repine, 5
Round your foreheads garlands twine,
Drown sorrow in a cup of wine,
And let us all be merry.

Now all our neighbours' chimnies smoke,
And Christmas blocks are burning; 10
Their ovens they with bak'd meats choke,
And all their spits are turning.
Without the door let sorrow lie,
And if for cold it hap could die,
We'll bury it in a Christmas pie; 15
And evermore be merry.

Now every lad is wondrous trim,
And no man minds his labour;
Our lasses have provided them
A bag-pipe and a tabor. 20
Young men and maids, and girls and boys
Give life to one another's joys;
And you anon shall by their noise
Perceive that they are merry.

Rank misers now do sparing shun, 25
Their hall of music soundeth;
And dogs thence with whole shoulders run,
So all things there aboundeth.
The country-folk themselves advance,
For Crowdy-Mutton's<sup>1</sup> come out of France;
And Jack shall pipe and Jyll shall dance, 30
And all the town be merry.

Ned Swash hath fetch'd his bands from pawn,
And all his best apparel;
Brisk Nell hath bought a ruff of lawn 35
With droppings of the barrel.
And those, that hardly all the year
Had bread to eat or rags to wear,
Will have both clothes and dainty fare,
And all the day be merry. . . . 40

The client now his suit forbears,
The prisoner's heart is eased;
The debtor drinks away his cares,
And for the time is pleasèd.
Though other's purses be more fat, 45
Why should we pine or grieve at that;
Hang sorrow, care will kill a cat,
And therefore let us be merry.

Now kings and queens poor sheep-cotes have,
And mate with every body; 50
The honest now may play the knave
And wise men play at noddy.<sup>2</sup>
Some youths will now a-mumming go,
Some others play at rowland-hoe;<sup>3</sup>
And twenty other gameboys<sup>4</sup> moe; 55
Because they will be merry.

Then wherefore in these merry days
Should we I pray be duller?
No, let us sing some roundlays
To make our mirth the fuller. 60

<sup>1</sup> Crowdy is an old name for fiddle, so some think a Crowdy-Mutton may mean a fiddler. Possibly it is the name of some game of the French peasants, which involved music and dancing.

<sup>2</sup> A game of cards resembling cribbage. As noddy also means fool, it may suggest play the fool.

And whilst thus inspir'd we sing,
And all the streets with echoes ring;
Woods, and hills, and every thing
Bear witness we are merry.

BRITANNIA'S PASTORALS, 1613-16

(Book I. Song V)

Now as an angler melancholy standing,
Upon a green bank yielding room for landing,
A wriggling yellow worm thrust on his hook, 640
Now in the midst he throws, then in a nook:
Here pulls his line, there throws it in again,
Mending his crook and bait, but all in vain,
He long stands viewing of the curled stream;
At last a hungry pike, or well-grown breame, 645
Snatch at the worm, and hasting fast away
He, knowing it a fish of stubborn sway,
Pulls up his rod, but soft; (as having skill)
Wherewith the hook fast holds the fish's gill.
Then all his line he freely yieldeth him, 650
Whilst furiously all up and down doth swim
Th' ensnared fish, here on the top doth scud,
There, underneath the banks, then in the mud;
And with his frantic fits so scares the shoal,
That each one takes his hide or starting hole; 655
By this the pike, clean wearied, underneath
A willow lies, and pants (if fishes breathe);
Wherewith the angler gently pulls him to him,
And, lest his haste might happen to undo him,
Lays down his rod, then takes his line in hand,
And by degrees getting the fish to land, 661
Walks to another pool: at length is winner
Of such a dish as serves him for his dinner:
So when the climber half the way had got,
Musing he stood, and busily 'gan plot, 665
How (since the mount did always steeper tend)

He might with steps secure his journey end. . . .
Then, as a nimble squirrel from the wood,
Ranging the hedges for his filbert-food,
Sits partly on a bough his brown nuts crack-

ing,
And from the shell the sweet white kernel
taking, 695

Till (with their crooks and bags) a sort of boys
(To share with him) come with so great a noise,
That he is forc'd to leave a nut nigh broke,
And for his life leap to a neighbor oak;
Thence to a beech, thence to a row of ashes; 700
Whilst thro' the quagmires and red water
plashes,

The boys run dabbling through thick and thin,
One tears his hose, another breaks his shin;
This, torn and tatter'd, hath with much ado 704
Got by the briars; and that hath lost his shoe;
This drops his band; that head-long falls f
haste;

Another cries behind for being last:
With sticks and stones, and many a sounding hollow,

The little fool, with no small sport, they follow,
 Whilst he, from tree to tree, from spray to spray, 710
 Gets to the wood, and hides him in his dray:
 Such shift made Riot, ere he could get up.
 And so from bough to bough he won the top,
 Though hind'rances from ever coming there,
 Were often thrust upon him by Despair. 715

MORS TUA

(From A Feast for Wormes, 1620)

Can he be fair that withers at a blast?
 Or he be strong that every breath can cast?
 Or he be wise that knows not how to live?
 Or he be rich that nothing hath to give?
 Can he be young, that's feeble, weak, and wan?
 So fair is man, that Death (a parting blast) 7
 Blasts his fair flower, and makes him earth at last;
 So strong is man, that with a gasping breath
 He totters, and bequeathes his strength to Death; 10
 So wise is man, that if with Death he strive,
 His wisdom cannot teach him how to live;
 So rich is man, that (all his debts being paid)
 His wealth's the winding-sheet wherein he's laid;
 So young is man, that, broke with care and sorrow, 15
 He's old enough today to die tomorrow:
 Why brag'st thou, then, thou worm of five foot long?
 Th' art neither fair, nor strong, nor wise, nor rich, nor young.

INVIDIOSA SENECTUS

(From Hieroglyphics of the Life of Man, 1638)

Envious old age obscures thy feeble light,
 And gives thee warning of approaching night.

St. John XII. 35

Yet a little while the light is with you.

The days grow old, the low-pitch'd lamp hath made
 No less than treble shade,
 And the descending damp doth now prepare 5
 To uncurl bright Titan's hair;
 Whose western wardrobe now begins to unfold
 Her purples, fring'd with gold,
 To clothe his ev'ning glory, when th' alarms
 Of rest shall call to rest in restless Thetis' arms. 10

Nature now calls to supper, to refresh
 The spirits of all flesh;
 The toiling ploughman drives his thirsty teams
 To taste the slipp'ry streams:

The droiling<sup>1</sup> swineherd knocks away,<sup>2</sup> and feasts 15

His hungry whining guests:
 The box-bill ouzel, and the dappled thrush,
 Like hungry rivals, meet at their beloved bush.

And now the cold autumnal dews are seen
 To cobweb ev'ry green; 20

And by the low-shorn rowens doth appear
 The fast-declining year:
 The sapless branches doff their summer suits,
 And wane their winter fruits;
 And stormy blasts have forc'd the quaking trees 25
 To wrap their trembling limbs in suits of mossy frieze.

Our wasted taper now has brought her light
 To the next door to-night;
 Her spriteless flame, grown great with snuff,
 doth turn 30
 Sad as her neighb'ring urn:
 Her slender inch, that yet unspent remains,
 Lights but to further pains;
 And, in a silent language, bids her guest
 Prepare his weary limbs to take eternal rest.

Now careful age hath pitch'd her painful plough 35
 Upon the furrow'd brow;
 And snowy blasts of discontented care
 Have blanch'd the falling hair:
 Suspicious envy, mix'd with jealous spite, 40
 Disturbs his weary night:
 He threatens youth with age; and now, alas!
 He owns not what he is, but vaunts the man he was.

Grey hairs, peruse thy days; and let thy past
 Read lectures to thy last:
 Those hasty wings that hurried thee away, 45
 Will give these days no day:
 The constant wheels of nature scorn to tire
 Until her works expire:
 That blast that nipp'd thy youth, will ruin thee;
 That hand that shook the branch, will quickly strike the tree. 50

EPIGRAMME 3

Art thou consum'd with soul-afflicting crosses?
 Disturb'd with grief? annoy'd with worldly losses?
 Hold up thy head: the taper, lifted high,
 Will brook the wind, when lower tapers die.

VERTUE

(From The Temple, 1631)

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
 The bridall of the earth and skie:
 The dew shall weep thy fall to-night;
 For thou must die.

<sup>2</sup> Knocks-off, stops work.

Sweet rose, whose hue angrie<sup>1</sup> and brave 5
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye,
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses, 10
A box where sweets compacted lie,
My musick shows ye have your closes,
And all must die.

Only a sweet and vertuous soul,
Like season'd timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal, 15
Then chiefly lives.

THE PULLEY

(From the same)

When God at first made man,
Having a glasse of blessings standing by,
"Let us," said He, "poure on him all we can;
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span." 5

So strength first made a way;
Then beautie flow'd, then wisdom, honour,
pleasure;
When almost all was out, God made a stay,
Perceiving that, alone of all His treasure,
Rest in the bottome lay. 10

"For if I should," said He,
"Bestow this jewell also on My creature,
He would adore My gifts in stead of Me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature:
So both should losers be. 15

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining restlesnesse:
Let him be rich and wearie, that at least,
If goodnesse leade him not, yet wearinesse
May tosse him to my breast." 20

THE ELIXIR<sup>1</sup>

(From the same)

Teach me, my God and King,
In all things Thee to see,
And what I do in anything
To do it as for Thee:

Not rudely, as a beast, 5
To runne into an action;
But still to make Thee prepossest,
And give it his perfection.

A man that looks on glasse, 10
On it may stay his eye;
Or if he pleaseth, through it passe,
And then the heav'n espie.

<sup>2</sup> An Elixir was in alchemy a substance supposed to possess the power of transmuting the baser metals into gold. The Great Elixir (or Philosopher's Stone) was also called the red tincture.

All may of Thee partake:
Nothing can be so mean,
Which with his tincture<sup>2</sup> "for Thy sake," 15
Will not grow bright and clean.

A servant with this clause
Makes drudgerie divine;
Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws,
Makes that and th' action fine. 20

This is the famous stone
That turneth all to gold;
For that which God doth touch and own
Cannot for lesse be told.<sup>3</sup>

THE COLLAR

(From the same)

I struck the board, and cry'd, "No more;
I will abroad."
What, shall I ever sigh and pine?
My lines and life are free; free as the road,
Loose as the winde, as large as store. 5
Shall I be still in suit?
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me blood and not restore
What I have lost with cordiall fruit?
Sure there was wine, 10
Before my sighs did drie it; there was corn
Before my tears did drown it;
Is the yeare onely lost to me?
Have I no bayes to crown it,
No flowers, no garlands gay? all blasted, 15
All wasted?

Not so, my heart; but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.
Recover all thy sigh-blown age
On double pleasures; leave thy cold dispute 20
Of what is fit and not; forsake thy cage,
Thy rope of sands
Which pettie thoughts have made; and made to thee

Good cable, to enforce and draw,
And be thy law, 25
While thou didst wink and wouldst not see.
Away! take heed;
I will abroad.

Call in thy death's-head there, tie up thy fears;
He that forbears 30
To suit and serve his need
Deserves his load.
But as I raved and grew more fierce and wilde
At every word,
Methought I heard one calling, "Childe";
And I reply'd, "My Lord." 35

<sup>2</sup> Tincture being here, the same as the Elixir, the sense is, that there is no action however mean which, imbued or purified by his (i. e. its) tincture for Thy sake, will not grow bright. To do a thing as for Thee is to transmute the action from base metal to fine gold, and the talisman for Thy sake is the magic tincture or Elixir which can effect the change.

<sup>3</sup> Counted. Cannot be counted less.

A DIRGE

(From The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses, 1659)

The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings:
Sceptre and crown 5
Must tumble down,
And in the dust be equal made
With the poor crooked scythe and spade.

Some men with swords may reap the field,
And plant fresh laurels where they kill; 10
But their strong nerves at last must yield;
They tame but one another still:
Early or late
They stoop to fate,
And must give up their murmuring breath, 15
When they, poor captives, creep to death.

The garlands wither on your brow,
Then boast no more your mighty deeds;
Upon Death's purple altar now
See, where the victor-victim bleeds: 20
Your heads must come
To the cold tomb,
Only the actions of the just Smell sweet and blossom in their dust.

William Habington

1605-1654

NOX NOCTI INDICAT SCIENTIAM<sup>1</sup>

When I survey the bright
Celestial sphere:
So rich with jewels hung, that night
Doth like an Ethiop bride appear;

My soul her wings doth spread, 5
And heaven-ward flies,
The Almighty's mysteries to read
In the large volume of the skies.

For the bright firmament
Shoots forth no flame 10
So silent, but is eloquent
In speaking the Creator's name.

No unregarded star
Contracts its light
Into so small a character, 15
Remov'd far from our human sight:

But if we steadfast look
We shall discern
In it, as in some holy book,
How man may heavenly knowledge learn. 20

<sup>1</sup> "Night to night sheweth knowledge." Psalm xix. 2.
Vulgate.

It tells the conqueror,
That far-stretched power,
Which his proud dangers traffick for,
Is but the triumph of an hour.

That from the farthest North, 25
Some nation may
Yet undiscovered issue forth,
And o'er his new-got conquest sway.

Some nation, yet shut in 30
With hills of ice,
May be let out to scourge his sin,
Till they shall equal him in vice.

And then they likewise shall
Their ruin have; 35
For as your selves your empires fall,
And every kingdom hath a grave.

Thus those celestial fires,
Though seeming mute,
The fallacy of our desires 40
And all the pride of life confute.

For they have watched since first
The world had birth;
And found sin in itself accurst,
And nothing permanent on earth.

Richard Crashaw

c. 1613-1649

AN EPITAPH UPON HUSBAND AND WIFE, WHO DIED AND WERE BURIED
TOGETHER

To these whom death again did wed,
This grave's the second marriage-bed.
For though the hand of Fate could force
'Twixt soul and body a divorce, 5
It could not sever man and wife,
Because they both lived but one life.
Peace, good reader, do not weep;
Peace, the lovers are asleep.
They, sweet turtles, folded lie 10
In the last knot that love could tie.
Let them sleep, let them sleep on,
Till the stormy night be gone,
And the eternal morrow dawn; 10
Then the curtains will be drawn,
And they wake into a light 10
Whose day shall never die in night.

WISHES TO HIS SUPPOSED MISTRESS

Whoe'er she be,
That not impossible she,
That shall command my heart and me:

Where'er she lie
Lock'd up from mortal eye, 5
In shady leaves of destiny:

Till that ripe birth
Of studied fate, stand forth,
And teach her fair steps to our earth:

Till that divine 10
Idea take a shrine
Of crystal flesh, through which to shine:

Meet you her, my Wishes,
Bespeak her to my blisses,
And be ye call'd my absent kisses. 15

I wish her beauty,
That owes not all its duty
To gaudy tire, or glist'ring shoe-tie.

Something more than 20
Taffata<sup>1</sup> or tissue can,
Or rampant feather, or rich fan.

More than the spoil
Of shop, or silkworm's toil,
Or a bought blush, or a set smile.

A face that's best 25
By its own beauty dress'd,
And can alone command the rest. . . .

A cheek, where youth
And blood, with pen of truth,
Write what the reader sweetly rueth. . . . 30

Eyes, that displace
The neighbour diamond, and out-face
That sunshine by their own sweet grace.

Tresses, that wear
Jewels, but to declare 35
How much themselves more precious are. . . .

A well-tamed heart,
For whose more noble smart
Love may be long choosing a dart.

Eyes, that bestow 40
Full quivers on love's bow,
Yet pay less arrows than they owe. . . .

Days, that need borrow
No part of their good morrow,
From a fore-spent night of sorrow. 45

Days, that in spite
Of darkness, by the light
Of a clear mind, are day all night. . . .

Life, that dares send
A challenge to his end, 50
And when it comes, say, Welcome friend. . . .

I wish her store
Of worth may leave her poor
Of wishes: and I wish—no more.

<sup>1</sup> Silk, in Crashaw's time applied to a soft, thin, silken fabric.

Now, if Time knows 55
That her, whose radiant brows
Weave them a garland of my vows;

Her, whose just bays
My future hopes can raise,
A trophy to her present praise; 60

Her, that dares be
What these lines wish to see:
I seek no further, it is she. . . .

THE RETREAT

(From Silex Scintillans, Part I., 1650)

Happy those early dayes, when I
Shin'd in my Angell-infancy!
Before I understood this place
Appointed for my second race,
Or taught my soul to fancy ought<sup>1</sup> 5

But a white, celestiall thought;
When yet I had not walkt above
A mile or two from my first Love,
And looking back, at that short space,
Could see a glimpse of his bright face; 10
When on some gilded Cloud or Flowre
My gazing soul would dwell an houre,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity;

Before I taught my tongue to wound 15
My conscience with a sinfull sound,
Or had the black art to dispence
A sev'rall sinne to ev'ry sense,
But felt through all this fleshly dresse
Bright Shooles of everlastingnesse. 20

O how I long to travell back,
And tread again that ancient track!
That I might once more reach that plaine,
Where first I left my glorious traine;
From whence th' inlightened spirit sees 25
That shady City of Palme trees.

But ah! my soul with too much stay
Is drunk, and staggers in the way!
Some men a forward motion love,
But I by backward steps would move; 30
And, when this dust falls to the urn,
In that state I came, return.

DEPARTED FRIENDS

(From the same, Part II., 1655)

They are all gone into the world of light!
And I alone sit ling'ring here!
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.

It glows and glitters in my cloudy brest 5
Like stars upon some gloomy grove,
Or those faint beams in which this hill is drest
After the Sun's remove.

<sup>1</sup> Aught.

I see them walking in an air of glory
 Whose light doth trample on my days; 10
 My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,
 Meer glimmerings and decays.

O holy Hope! and high Humility!
 High as the Heavens above;
 These are your walks, and you have shew'd them me 15
 To kindle my cold love.

Dear, beauteous Death; the Jewel of the Just!
 Shining nowhere but in the dark;
 What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust,
 Could man outlook that mark! 20

THE WORLD

(From the same, Part I)

1
 I saw Eternity the other night,
 Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
 All calm, as it was bright;
 And round beneath it, Time, in hours, days,
 years,

Driv'n by the spheres, 5
 Like a vast shadow mov'd, in which the world
 And all her train were hurl'd.
 The doting Lover in his quaintest strain
 Did there complain;
 Near him, his lute, his fancy, and his flights, 10
 Wit's four delights;
 With gloves, and knots the silly snares of pleasure,
 Yet his dear Treasure,
 All scatter'd lay, while he his eyes did pour
 Upon a flower. 15

2
 The darksome Statesman, hung with weights and woe,
 Like a thick midnight fog, mov'd there so slow,
 He did not stay, nor go;
 Condemning thoughts (like sad eclipses) scowl
 Upon his soul, 20
 And crowds of crying witnesses without Pursued him with one shout.
 Yet digged the Mole, and, lest his ways be
 found

Worked under ground,
 Where he did clutch his prey. But one did see
 That policy; 26
 Churches and altars fed him; perjuries
 Were gnats and flies;
 It rain'd about him blood and tears; but he Drank them as free. 30

3
 The fear full miser on a heap of rust
 Sate pining all his life there, did scarce trust
 His own hands with the dust,
 Yet would not place one piece above, but lives
 In fear of thieves. 35
 Thousands there were as frantic as himself,
 And hugg'd each one his pelf;

The down-right epicure plac'd heav'd in sense,<sup>1</sup>
 And scorn'd pretense;
 While others, slipped into a wide excess, 40
 Said little less;
 The weaker sort slight, trivial wares enslave,
 Who think them brave,
 And poor, despised truth sate counting by
 Their victory. 45

4

Yet some, who all this while did weep and sing,
 And sing and weep, soar'd up into the Ring;
 But most would use no wing.
 O fools, said I, thus to prefer dark night
 Before true light! 50
 To live in grots and caves, and hate the day
 Because it shows the way,
 The way, which from this dead and dark abode
 Leads up to God,
 A way where you might tread the Sun, and be
 More bright than he! 56
 But, as I did their madness so discuss,
 One whisper'd thus
This Ring the Bride-groom did for none provide,
But for his Bride. 60

THE APPROACH

I

That childish thoughts such joy inspire,
 Doth make my wonder and His glory higher:
 His bounty and my wealth more great,
 It shows His Kingdom and His work complete:
 In which there is not anything 5
 Not meet to be the joy of Cherubim.

II

He in our childhood with us walks,
 And with our thoughts mysteriously he talks;
 He often visiteth our minds,
 But cold acceptance in us ever finds: 10
 We send Him often grieved away;
 Else would He show us all His Kingdom's joy.

III

O Lord, I wonder at Thy Love,
 Which did my Infancy so early move:
 But more at that which did forbear, 15
 And move so long, tho' slighted many a year:
 But most of all, at last that Thou
 Thyself shouldst me convert I scarce know how.

IV

Thy Gracious motions oft in vain
 Assaulted me: my heart did hard remain 20
 Long time: I sent my God away, Grieved much that He could not impart His joy.
 I careless was, nor did regard
 The end for which He all those thoughts pre-par'd;

<sup>1</sup> Swollen, with the pleasures of sense.

V

But now with new and open eyes, 25
 I see beneath as if above the skies;
 And as I backward look again, See all His thoughts and mine most clear and plain.
 He did approach, He me did woo;
 I wonder that my God this thing would do. 30

VI

From nothing taken first I was;
 What wondrous things His glory brought to pass!
 Now in this world I Him behold,
 And me enveloped in more than gold;
 In deep abysses of delights, 35
 In present hidden precious benefits.

VII

Those thoughts His goodness long before
 Prepared as precious and celestial store;
 With curious art in me inlaid,
 That Childhood might itself alone be said 40
 My tutor, teacher, guide to be,
 Instructed then even by the Deity.

WONDER

I

How like an Angel came I down!
 How bright are all things here!
 When first among His works I did appear
 O how their Glory me did crown!
 The world resembled His Eternity, 5
 In which my soul did walk;
 And everything that I did see:
 Did with me talk.

II

The skies in their magnificence,
 The lively, lovely air; 10
 Oh how divine, how soft, how sweet, how fair!
 The stars did entertain my sense,
 And all the works of God, so bright and pure,
 So rich and great did seem,
 As if they ever must endure 15
 In my esteem.

III

A native health and innocence
 Within my bones did grow,
 And while my God did all His Glories show,
 I felt a vigour in my sense 20
 That was all Spirit. I within did flow
 With seas of life, like wine;
 I nothing in the world did know
 But 'twas divine.

IV

Harsh ragged objects were concealed, 25
 Oppressions, tears and cries,
 Sins, griefs, complaints, dissensions, weeping
 eyes
 Were hid, and only things revealed
 Which heavenly Spirits and the Angels prize. 30
 The state of Innocence
 And bliss, not trades and poverties,
 Did fill my sense.

V

The streets were paved with golden stones,
 The boys and girls were mine,
 Oh how did all their lovely faces shine! 35
 The sons of men were holy ones,
 In joy and beauty they appeared to me,
 And everything which here I found,
 While like an angel I did see,
 Adorned the ground. 40

VI

Rich diamond and pearl and gold
 In every place was seen;
 Rare splendours, yellow, blue, red, white and
 green,
 Mine eyes did everywhere behold.
 Great Wonders clothed with glory did appear, 45
 Amazement was my bliss,
 That and my wealth was everywhere;
 No joy to this!

VII

Cursed and devised proprieties,
 With envy, avarice 50
 And fraud, those fiends that spoil even Paradise,
 Flew from the splendour of mine eyes,
 And so did hedges, ditches, limits, bounds,
 I dreamed not aught of those,
 But wandered over all men's grounds, 55
 And found repose.

VIII

Proprieties themselves were mine
 And hedges ornaments,
 Walls, boxes, coffers, and their rich contents
 Did not divide my joys, but all combine. 60
 Clothes, ribbons, jewels, laces, I esteemed
 My joys by others worn:
 For me they all to wear them seemed
 When I was born.

ON A GIRDLE

(From Poems, 1645)

That which her slender waist confin'd,
 Shall now my joyful temples bind;
 No monarch but would give his crown,
 His arms might do what this has done.

It was my heaven's extremest sphere, 5
 The pale which held that lovely deer,<sup>1</sup>
 My joy, my grief, my hope, my love,
 Did all within this circle move.

A narrow compass, and yet there
 Dwelt all that's good, and all that's fair: 10
 Give me but what this riband bound,
 Take all the rest the sun goes round.

<sup>1</sup> This well-worn pun is characteristically Elizabethan.
Pale=that which encompasses (i.e., the girdle) as well as the fence of the deer-park.

SONG

(From the same)

Go, lovely Rose,
Tell her that wastes her time and me,
That now she knows
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be. 5

Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That had'st thou sprung
In deserts where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died. 10

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired. 15

Then die, that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee;
How small a part of time they share,
That are so wondrous sweet and fair. 20

ON THE FOREGOING DIVINE POEMS

(1686?)

When we for age could neither read nor write,
The subject made us able to indite.
The soul, with nobler resolutions deckt,
The body stooping, does herself erect:
No mortal parts are requisite to raise 5
Her, that unbody'd can her Maker praise.
The seas are quiet when the winds give o'er:
So, calm are we, when passions are no more:
For, then we know how vain it was to boast
Of fleeting things, so certain to be lost. 10

Clouds of affection from our younger eyes
Conceal that emptiness, which age describes,

The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lets in new light, thro' chinks, that time has made:

Stronger by weakness, wiser, men become, 15
As they draw near to their eternal home.

Leaving the old, both worlds at once they view,
That stand upon the threshold of the new.

John Milton

L'ALLEGRO

(1634)

Hence, loathèd Melancholy, O
Of Cerberus and blackest Midnight born &
In Stygian cave forlorn, &
'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy! &

Find out some uncouth<sup>1</sup> cell, c
Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings, &
And the night-raven sings; d
There, under ebon shades and low-browed rocks, e

As ragged as thy locks, l
In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell. f 10
But come, thou Goddess fair and free, g

In heaven yeled<sup>2</sup> Euphrosyne,
And by men heart-easing Mirth;
Whom lovely Venus, at a birth,
With two sister Graces more, 15
To ivy-crown'd Bacchus bore:

Or whether (as some sager sing)
The frolic wind that breathes the spring,
Zephyr, with Aurora playing,
As he met her once a-Maying, 20
There, on beds of violets blue,
And fresh-blown roses washed in dew,
Filled her with thee, a daughter fair,
So buxom, blithe, and debonaire.

Haste thee, Nymph, and bring with thee 25
Jest, and youthful Jollity,
Quips and cranks and wanton wiles,
Nods and becks and wreath'd smiles,
Such as hang on Hebe's cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek; 30
Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides.

Come, and trip it, as you go,
On the light fantastic toe;
And in thy right hand lead with thee 35
The mountain-nymph, sweet Liberty;
And, if I give thee honour due,
Mirth, admit me of thy crew,

To live with her, and live with thee,
In unrevoked pleasures free; 40
To hear the lark begin his flight,
And, singing, startle the dull night,
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise;

Then to come in spite of sorrow, 45
And at my window bid good-morrow,
Through the sweet-briar, or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine;

While the cock, with lively din,
Scatters the rear of darkness thin; 50
And to the stack, or the barn-door,
Stoutly struts his dames before:

Oft listening how the hounds and horn
Cheerly rouse the slumbering morn,
From the side of some hoar hill, 55
Through the high wood echoing shrill:

Some time walking, not unseen,
By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
Right against the eastern gate 60
Where the great Sun begins his state

Robed in flames and amber light,
The clouds in thousand liveries dight;
While the ploughman, near at hand,
Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
And the milkmaid singeth blithe, 65
And the mower whets his scythe,

<sup>1</sup> Uncouth means here unknown, strange, remote.<sup>2</sup> Named.

And every shepherd tells his tale<sup>3</sup>
Under the hawthorn in the dale.

Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures,

Whilst the landskip round it measures: 70
Russet lawns, and fallows gray,
Where the nibbling flocks do stray;
Mountains, on whose barren breast
The labouring clouds do often rest;
Meadows trim, with daisies pied, 75
Shallow brooks, and rivers wide;
Towers and battlements it sees
Bosomed high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure of neighbouring eyes. 80

Hard by a cottage chimney smokes
From betwixt two aged oaks,
Where Corydon and Thyrsis met,
Are at their savoury dinner set
Of herbs, and other country messes, 85
Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses;
And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis to bind the sheaves;
Or, if the earlier season lead,
To the tanned haycock in the mead. 90

Sometimes, with secure delight,
The upland hamlets will invite,
When the merry bells ring round,
And the jocund rebecks<sup>4</sup> sound
To many a youth and many a maid 95
Dancing in the checkered shade,
And young and old come forth to play
On a sunshine holyday,
Till the livelong daylight fail:

Then to the spicy nut-brown ale, 100
With stories told of many a feat,
How Faery Mab the junks<sup>5</sup> eat.
She was pinched and pulled, she said;
And he, by Friar's lantern led,
Tells how the drudging goblin<sup>6</sup> sweat 105
To earn his cream-bowl duly set,
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn
That ten day-labourers could not end;
Then lies him down the lubber<sup>7</sup> fiend, 110
And, stretched out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength,
And crop-full out of doors he flings,
Ere the first cock his matin rings.
Thus done the tales, to bed they creep, 115
By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.

Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men,
Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
In weeds of peace, high triumphs hold, 120

<sup>3</sup> This ambiguous expression has been frequently discussed; it may mean that every shepherd tells his tale of love; or that the shepherds tell stories to each other; or that each shepherd counts his sheep. Tell may mean either relate or count, as to "tell a story," or to "tell one's beads," or "to tell one's money." If this last interpretation is adopted tale = simply to count the sheep.

With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
Rain influence,<sup>8</sup> and judge the prize
Of wit or arms, while both contend
To win her grace whom all commend.
There let Hymen oft appear 125
In saffron robe, with taper clear,
And pomp, and feast, and revelry,
With mask and antique pageantry;
Such sights as youthful poets dream
On summer eyes by haunted stream. 130
Then to the well-trod stage anon,
If Jonson's learned sock be on,
Or sweetest Shakespeare, Fancy's child,
Warble his native wood-notes wild.
And ever, against eating cares, a 135
Lap me in soft Lydian<sup>9</sup> airs, a Married to immortal verse, b
Such as the meeting soul may pierce, c
In notes with many a winding bout c
Of linked sweetness long drawn out, c 140
With wanton heed and giddy cunning, d
The melting voice through mazes running, d
Untwisting all the chains that tie e
The hidden soul of harmony; e
That Orpheus' self may heave his head f 145
From golden slumber on a bed f
Of heaped Elysian flowers, and hear g
Such strains as would have won the ear g
Of Pluto to have quite set free
His half-regained Eurydice. 150
These delights if thou canst give,
Mirth, with thee I mean to live.

IL PENSEROSO

(1634)

Hence, vain deluding Joys,
The brood of Folly without father bred!
How little you bested,<sup>1</sup>
Or fill the fix'd mind with all your toys!
Dwell in some idle brain, 5
And fancies fond with gaudy shapes possess,
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sun-beams,
Or likest hovering dreams,
The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train. 10
But, hail! thou Goddess sage and holy,
Hail, divinest Melancholy!
Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit the sense of human sight,
And therefore to our weaker view 15
O'erlaid with black, staid Wisdom's hue:
Black, but such as in esteem
Prince Memnon's sister<sup>2</sup> might beseech,
Or that starred Ethiop<sup>3</sup> queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above 20

<sup>1</sup> Used here in its astrological sense. The ladies' eyes influence the contests, as the stars (according to astrology) influenced human events and destinies.

<sup>5</sup> Cassiope, who was starred, i. e., turned into the constellation Cassiopeia.

The Sea-Nymphs, and their powers offended.

Yet thou art higher far descended:

Thee bright-haired Vesta<sup>4</sup> long of yore

To solitary Saturn bore;

His daughter she; in Saturn's reign

Such mixture was not held a stain.

Off in glimmering bowers and glades

He met her, and in secret shades

Of woody Ida's inmost grove,

Whilst yet there was no fear of Jove.

Come, pensive Nun, devout and pure,

Sober, steadfast, and demure,

All in a robe of darkest grain,

Flowing with majestic train,

And sable stole of cypress lawn

Over thy decent shoulders drawn.

Come; but keep thy wonted state,

With even step, and musing gait,

And looks commercing with the skies,

Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:

There, held in holy passion still,

Forget thyself to marble, till

With a sad leaden downward cast

Thou fix them on the earth as fast.

And join with thee calm Peace and Quiet,

Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,

And hears the Muses in a ring

Aye round about Jove's altar sing;

And add to these retired Leisure,

That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;

But, first and chiefest, with thee bring

Him that yon soars on golden wing,

Guiding the fiery-wheel'd throne,

The Cherub Contemplation;

And the mute Silence hist<sup>5</sup> along,

'Less Philomel will deign a song,

In her sweetest saddest plight,

Smoothing the rugged brow of Night,

While Cynthia checks her dragon yoke

Gently o'er the accustomed oak.

Sweet bird, that shunn'st the noise of folly,

Most musical, most melancholy!

Thee, chauntress, oft the woods among

I woo, to hear thy even-song;

And, missing thee, I walk unseen

On the dry smooth-shaven green,

To behold the wandering moon,

Riding near her highest noon,

Like one that had been led astray

Through the heaven's wide pathless way,

And oft, as if her head she bowed,

Stooping through a fleecy cloud.

Oft, on a plat of rising ground,

I hear the far-off curfew sound,

Over some wide-watered shore,

Swinging slow with sullen roar;

Or, if the air will not permit,

Some still removed place will fit,

Where glowing embers through the room

Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,

Far from all resort of mirth,

Save the cricket on the hearth,

Or the bellman's drowsy charm

To bless the doors from nightly harm.

Or let my lamp, at midnight hour,

Be seen in some high lonely tower,

Where I may oft outwatch the Bear;<sup>6</sup>

With thrice great Hermes,<sup>7</sup> or unsphere

The spirit of Plato, to unfold

What worlds or what vast regions hold

The immortal mind that hath forsook

Her mansion in this fleshly nook;

And of those demons<sup>8</sup> that are found

In fire, air, flood, or underground,

Whose power hath a true consent<sup>9</sup>

With planet or with element.

Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy

In sceptred pall come sweeping by,

Presenting Thebes,<sup>10</sup> or Pelops' line,

Or the tale of Troy divine,

Or what (though rare) of later age

Ennobled hath the buskined stage.<sup>11</sup>

But, O sad Virgin! that thy power

Might raise Musæus<sup>12</sup> from his bower;

Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing

Such notes as, warbled to the string,

Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,

And made Hell grant what love did seek;

Or call up him that left half-told

The story of Cambuscan<sup>13</sup> bold,

Of Camball, and of Algarsife,

And who had Canace to wife,

That owned the virtuous ring and glass,

And of the wondrous horse of brass

On which the Tartar king did ride;

And if aught else great bards beside

In sage and solemn tunes have sung,

Of turneys, and of trophies hung,

Of forests, and enchantments drear,

Where more is meant than meets the ear.

Thus, Night, oft see me in thy pale career,

Till civil-suited Morn appear,

Not tricked and frownced, as she was wont

With the Attic boy<sup>14</sup> to hunt,

But kercheft in a comely cloud,

While rocking winds are piping loud,

Or ushered with a shower still,

When the gust hath blown his fill,

Ending on the rustling leaves,

With minute-drops from off the eaves.

And, when the sun begins to fling

His flaring beams, me, Goddess, bring

To arched walks of twilight groves,

And shadows brown, that Sylvan loves,

<sup>7</sup> Hermes Trismegistus (i. e., superlatively or thrice great), an Egyptian god to whom many mystical books were ascribed.

<sup>13</sup> Cambuscan (said to be a corruption of Cambus, or Genhis Khan): A Tartar king in Chaucer's unfinished Squire's Tale, who had various magical articles:—a ring, a mirror, a sword, and a brazen horse. Camball, Algarsife, and Canace, were his children.

<sup>14</sup> Cephalus, who (according to Greek legend) was carried away by Eos, the goddess of the Dawn, while he was hunting in the mountains.

Of pine, or monumental oak, 135
 Where the rude axe with heavèd stroke
 Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
 Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
 There, in close covert, by some brook,
 Where no profaner eye may look, 140
 Hide me from day's garish eye,
 While the bee with honied thigh,
 That at her flowry work doth sing,
 And the waters murmuring,
 With such consort<sup>15</sup> as they keep,
 Entice the dewy-feathered Sleep.
 And let some strange mysterious dream
 Wave at his wings, in airy stream
 Of lively portraiture displayed,
 Softly on my eyelids laid;
 And, as I wake, sweet music breathe
 Above, about, or underneath,
 Sent by some Spirit to mortals good,
 Or the unseen Genius of the wood.

But let my due feet never fail
 To walk the studious cloister's pale,
 And love the high embowed roof,
 With antique pillars massy-proof,
 And storied windows<sup>16</sup> richly dight,
 Casting a dim religious light.
 There let the pealing organ blow
 To the full-voiced quire below.
 In service high and anthems clear,
 As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
 Dissolve me into ecstasies, 165
 And bring all heaven before mine eyes.

And may at last my weary age
 Find out the peaceful hermitage,
 The hairy gown and mossy cell,
 Where I may sit and rightly spell
 Of every star that heaven doth shew,
 And every herb that sips the dew,
 Till old experience do attain
 To something like prophetic strain.

These pleasures, Melancholy, give;
 And I with thee will choose to live.

SONG. SWEET ECHO

(From Comus, acted 1634)

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st un- 230
 seen

Within thy airy shell,
 By slow Meander's<sup>1</sup> margent green,
 And in the violet-embroidered vale
 Where the love-lorn nightingale
 Nightly to thee her sad song mourneth well: 235
 Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair<sup>2</sup>
 That liketh thy Narcissus are?
 O, if thou have
 Hid them in some flowery cave,
 Tell me but where, 240

<sup>2</sup> The two brothers of the singer, from whom she has been accidentally separated.

Sweet Queen of Parley, Daughter of the Sphere!
 So may'st thou be translated to the skies,
 And give resounding grace to all heaven's harmonies.

SONG. SABRINA FAIR

(From the same)

Sabrina<sup>1</sup> fair, 859
 Listen where thou art sitting
 Under the glassy, cool, translucent wave,
 In twisted braids of lilies knitting
 The loose train of thy amber-dropping hair;
 Listen for dear honour's sake, 865
 Goddess of the silver lake,
 Listen and save!

Listen, and appear to us,
 In name of great Oceanus.
 155 By the earth-shaking Neptune's mace,
 And Tethys' grave majestic pace;
 By hoary Nereus' wrinkled look,
 And the Carpathian wizard's<sup>2</sup> hook;
 By scaly Triton's winding shell, 870
 And old soothsaying Glaucus' spell;
 By Leucothea's lovely hands, 875
 And her son that rules the strands;
 By Thetis' tinsel-slippered feet,
 And the songs of Sirens sweet;
 By dead Parthenope's dear tomb, 880
 And fair Ligea's golden comb,
 Wherewith she sits on diamond rocks
 Sleeking her soft alluring locks;
 By all the Nymphs that nightly dance
 Upon thy streams with wily glance; 885
 Rise, rise, and heave thy rosy head
 From thy coral-paven bed,
 And bridle in thy headlong wave,
 Till thou our summons answered have.

Listen and save!

(1638)

Yet once more,<sup>2</sup> O ye laurels, and once more,
 Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,
 I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,
 And with forced fingers rude
 Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.<sup>5</sup>
 Bitter constraint and sad occasion dear
 Compels me to disturb your season due;
 For Lycidas is dead, dead ere his prime,
 Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer.
 Who would not sing for Lycidas? He knew 10

<sup>2</sup> Proteus, a sea-god, who had the power of changing his shape. He had a hook (i. e. shepherd's crook) "because he was the shepherd of the sea-calves."

<sup>1</sup> Lycidas is a lament for the death of Edward King, a young man of much promise who had been a fellow-student of Milton at Cambridge some five years before. King was drowned while on his way to Ireland,—the ship striking a hidden rock off the Welsh coast and going down in a calm sea.

<sup>2</sup> Milton had probably written no poetry since Comus, produced three years earlier (1634).

Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.
He must not float upon his watery bier
Unwept, and welter to the parching wind,
Without the meed of some melodious tear.

Begin, then, Sisters of the sacred well 15
That from beneath the seat of Jove doth spring;
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
Hence with denial vain and coy excuse:

So may some gentle Muse
With lucky words<sup>3</sup> favour my destined urn, 20
And as he passes turn,
And bid fair peace be to my sable shroud!

For we were nursed<sup>4</sup> upon the self-same hill,
Fed the same flock, by fountain, shade, and rill;
Together both, ere the high lawns appeared 25
Under the opening eyelids of the Morn,
We drove a-field, and both together heard
What time the gray-fly winds her sultry horn, Battering our flocks with the fresh dews of
night,

Of till the star that rose at evening bright 30
Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.

Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute;
Tempered to the oaten flute,
Rough Satyrs danced, and Fauns with cloven heel

From the glad sound would not be absent long;
And old Damocetas loved to hear our song.

But, oh! the heavy change, now thou art
gone,

Now thou art gone and never must return!
Thee, Shepherd, thee the woods and desert caves,

With wild thyme and the gadding vine o'er-grown, 40

And all their echoes, mourn.

The willows, and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.

As killing as the canker to the rose, 45
Or taint-worm to the weanling herds that graze,
Or frost to flowers that their gay wardrobe wear
When first the white-thorn blows;

Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.

Where were ye, Nymphs, when the remorseless deep 50

Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?

For neither were ye playing on the steep<sup>5</sup>

Where your old bards, the famous Druids, lie,

Nor on the shaggy top of Mona<sup>6</sup> high,

Nor yet where Deva<sup>7</sup> spreads her wizard
stream. 55

Ay me! I fondly dream

<sup>3</sup> Words favorable to the repose of the departed. Such, according to the Roman rite, were the words sit tibi terra levis, uttered by the mourner as he sprinkled the earth three times over the dead.

<sup>7</sup> The Dee, down which King sailed on his way from Chester. As many memories of Arthur and of the old Druidic faith were associated with the "holy Dee," it is called the "wizard," i. e. the enchanted, or magic stream.

"Had ye been there," . . . for what could that have done?

What could the Muse herself<sup>8</sup> that Orpheus bore,

The Muse herself, for her enchanting son,
Whom universal nature did lament, 60

When, by the rout that made the hideous roar,

His gory visage down the stream was sent,
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore?

Alas! what boots it with incessant care
To tend the homely, slighted, shepherd's trade,

And strictly meditate the thankless Muse? 66
Were it not better done, as others use,

To sport with Amaryllis<sup>9</sup> in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neera's<sup>9</sup> hair?

Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise 70

(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights and live laborious days;

But the fair guerdon when we hope to find,
And think to burst out into sudden blaze,

Comes the blind Fury<sup>10</sup> with the abhorred
shears, 75

And slits the thin-spun life. "But not the praise,"

Phœbus replied, and touched my trembling ears:

"Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistening foil

Set off to the world, nor in broad rumor lies, 80
But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes

And perfect witness of all-judging Jove:
As he pronounces lastly on each deed,

Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed." 85
O fountain Arethuse,<sup>11</sup> and thou honoured
flood,

Smooth-sliding Mincius,<sup>11</sup> crowned with vocal reeds,

That strain I heard was of a higher mood.
But now my oat proceeds,

And listens to the Herald of the Sea,<sup>12</sup>
That came in Neptune's plea. 90

He asked the waves, and asked the felon winds,
What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?

And questioned every gust of rugged wings
That blows from off each bleak promontory.

They knew not of his story; 95
And sage Hippotades<sup>13</sup> their answer brings,

That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed:
The air was calm, and on the level brine

Sleek Panope<sup>14</sup> with all her sisters played.
It was that fatal and perfidious bark, 100

<sup>10</sup> Atropos, who cut the thread of life, was one of the Fates. Milton did not hesitate to add to or modify classic myths, when it suited his purpose.

Built in the eclipse,<sup>15</sup> and rigged with curses dark,

That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.

Next, Camus,<sup>16</sup> reverend sire, went footing slow,

His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge, 104

Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge

Like to that sanguine flower<sup>17</sup> inscribed with woe.

"Ah! who hath reft," quoth he, "my dearest pledge?"

Last came, and last did go,

The Pilot of the Galilean Lake;<sup>18</sup>

Two massy keys he bore of metals twain 110

(The golden opes, the iron shuts amain.)<sup>19</sup>

He shook his mitred locks, and stern bespake:—
"How well could I have spared for thee, young

swain,

Enow of such as, for their bellies' sake,

Creep, and intrude, and climb into the fold! 115

Of other care they little reckoning make

Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,

And shove away the worthy bidden guest.

Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold

A sheep-hook, or have learnt aught else the least 120

That to the faithful herdman's art belongs!

What recks it them? What need they? They are sped;<sup>20</sup>

And, when they list, their lean and flashy songs

Grate on their scrannel<sup>21</sup> pipes of wretched straw;

The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed, 125

But, swoln with wind and the rank mist they
draw,

Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread;

Besides what the grim wolf with privy paw,

Daily devours apace, and nothing said.

But that two-handed engine<sup>22</sup> at the door 130

Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more."

Return, Alpheus,<sup>23</sup> the dread voice is past

<sup>15</sup> Eclipses were considered by the ancients as out of the order of nature, and were supposed to exert a mysterious and disastrous influence.

<sup>16</sup> The god or genius of the Cam, the stream on which Cambridge is situated. "He comes attired in a mantle of the hairy river weed that floats on the Cam; his bonnet is of the sedge of that river, which exhibits peculiar markings, something like the di di (alas! alas!) which the Greek detected on the leaves of the hyacinth, in token of the sad death of the Spartan youth from whose blood the flower had sprung" (Masson).

<sup>22</sup> An obscure expression. Masson supposes that it referred to the two Houses of Parliament; Newton, to the "axe that is laid unto the root of the tree." St. Matt. iii, 10. The essential meaning is, that the end is at hand, and the avenger, with his weapon of destruction, is at the door.

<sup>23</sup> A youthful hunter, who, changed into a river, pursued the nymph Arethusa by a channel under the sea. He overtook her, and the pursuer and pursued were united in a fountain on an island off the coast of Sicily. Alpheus being thus related to Sicily, to invoke him is to invoke the "Sicilian Muse," the muse of pastoral poetry.

That shrunk thy streams; return Sicilian Muse
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues. 135
Ye valleys low, where the mild whispers use
Of shades, and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,

On whose fresh lap the swart star<sup>24</sup> sparsely looks,

Throw hither all your quaint enamelled eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honeyed
showers, 140

And purple all the ground with vernal flowers.

Bring the rathe<sup>25</sup> primrose that forsaken dies,

The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,

The white pink, and the pansy freaked<sup>26</sup> with jet,

The glowing violet, 145

The musk-rose, and the well-attired woodbine,

With cowlslips wan that hang the pensive
head,

And every flower that sad embroidery<sup>27</sup> wears;

Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,

And daffadillies fill their cups with tears, 150

To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies.

For so, to interpose a little ease,

Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise,<sup>28</sup>

Ay me! whilst thee the shores and sounding seas

Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled;

Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides, 156

Where thou perhaps under the welmning tide

Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;<sup>29</sup>

Or whether thou, to our moist vows denied,

Where the great Vision of the guarded mount<sup>31</sup>

Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold.

Look homeward, Angel, now, and melt with ruth:

And, O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth.

Weep no more, woeful shepherds, weep no
more, 165

For Lycidas, your sorrow, is not dead,

Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor.

So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,

And yet anon repairs his drooping head,

And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore 170

<sup>25</sup> Rathe=early; the positive, now out of use, of rather, earlier, sooner.

<sup>30</sup> Lands End in Cornwall was called Bellerium by the Romans. Bellerus here does not appear to be a real personage; the name was apparently coined by Milton from that of the promontory, with the idea of raising the implication that the region was named after some one so-called.

<sup>31</sup> St. Michael's Mount, a rocky islet near the coast of Cornwall, supposed to be guarded by the Archangel Michael. "The great vision" is St. Michael, seated on the ledge of rock called St. Michael's chair, and gazing far across the sea towards Namancos and Bayona's hold (the former being a town, the second a stronghold on the Spanish coast), i. e., looking in the direction of Spain.

Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
 So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
 Through the dear might of Him that walked the waves,
 Where, other groves and other streams along,
 With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves, 175
 And hears the unexpressive nuptial song,
 In the blest kingdoms meek of joy and love.
 There entertain him all the saints above,
 In solemn troops, and sweet societies,
 That sing, and singing in their glory move, 180
 And wipe the tears for ever from his eyes.
 Now, Lycidas, the shepherds weep no more;
 Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore,
 In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
 To all that wander in that perilous flood. 185

Thus sang the uncouth swain to the oaks and rills,
 While the still morn went out with sandals gray:
 He touched the tender stops of various quills,
 With eager thought warbling his Doric lay:<sup>32</sup>
 And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
 And now was dropt into the western bay. 191
 At last he rose, and twitched his mantle blue:
 To-morrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.

SONNETS

ON HIS HAVING ARRIVED AT THE AGE OF TWENTY-THREE

(1631)

How soon hath Time, the subtle thief of youth, Stolen on his wing my three-and-twentieth
 year!
 My hasting days fly on with full career,
 But my late spring no bud nor blossom
 shew'th.
 Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth 5
 That I to manhood am arrived so near;
 And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
 That some more timely-happy spirits endu'th.
 Yet, be it less or more, or soon or slow,
 It shall be still in strictest measure even 10
 To that same lot, however mean or high,
 Towards which Time leads me, and the will of Heaven,
 All is, if I have grace to use it so,
 As ever in my great Task-Master's eye.

ON THE LATE MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT (1655)

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
 Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
 Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
 When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones,
 Forget not: in thy book record their groans 5
 Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient

<sup>32</sup> So called because Lycidas follows the elegiac manner of Theocritus and Moschus, who wrote in Doric Greek.

Slain by the bloody Piedmontese, that rolled Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
 The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
 To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow 10
 O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
 The triple Tyrant; that from these may grow
 A hundredfold who, having learnt thy way,
 Early may fly the Babylonian woe.

ON HIS BLINDNESS

(From Poems, etc., 1673. Written c. 1655?)

When I consider how my light is spent Ere half my days in this dark world and wide,
 And that one talent which is death to hide Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent
 To serve therewith my Maker, and present 5
 My true account, lest He returning chide;
 "Doth God exact day-labour, light denied?"
 I fondly ask. But Patience, to prevent That murmur, soon replies, "God doth not need
 Either man's work or his own gifts. Who best 10
 Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best.
 His state
 Is kingly: thousands at his bidding speed,
 And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
 They also serve who only stand and wait."

TO CYRIACK SKINNER

(First printed in Phillips' Life of Milton, 1694.
 Written c. 1655)

Cyriack, this three years' day these eyes,
 though clear,
 To outward view, of blemish or of spot,
 Bereft of light, their seeing have forgot;
 Nor to their idle orbs doth sight appear
 Of sun, or moon, or star, throughout the year, 5
 Or man, or woman. Yet I argue not Against Heaven's hand or will, nor bate a jot
 Of heart or hope, but still bear up and steer Right onward. What supports me, dost thou ask?
 The conscience, friend, to have lost them over-plied 10
 In Liberty's defence, my noble task,
 Of which all Europe rings from side to side.
 This thought might lead me through the world's vain mask,
 Content, though blind, had I no better guide.

XXI

TO CYRIACK SKINNER

Cyriack, whose grandsire on the royal bench
 Of British Themis, with no mean applause, Pronounced, and in his volumes taught, our laws,
 Which others at their bar so often wrench,

To-day deep thoughts resolve with me to drench 5
 In mirth that after no repenting draws;
 Let Euclid rest, and Archimedes pause,
 And what the Swede intend, and what the French.
 To toward life learn thou betimes, and know Toward solid good what leads the nearest
 way; 10
 For other things mild Heaven a time ordains,
 And disapproves that care, though wise in show,
 That with superfluous burden loads the day,
 And, when God sends a cheerful hour, refrains.

PARADISE LOST

Book I

Of Man's first disobedience, and the fruit
 Of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste
 Brought death into the world, and all our woe,
 With loss of Eden, till one greater Man
 Restore us, and regain the blissful seat, 5
 Sing, heavenly Muse, that, on the secret top
 Of Oreb,<sup>1</sup> or of Sinai, didst inspire
 That shepherd<sup>2</sup> who first taught the chosen seed
 In the beginning how the heavens and earth
 Rose out of Chaos: or, if Sion hill 10 Delight thee more, and Siloa's<sup>3</sup> brook that flowed
 Fast by the oracle of God, I thence Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song.
 That with no middle flight intends to soar
 Above the Aonian mount, while it pursues 15
 Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme.
 And chiefly Thou, O Spirit, that dost prefer
 Before all temples the upright heart and pure, Instruct me, for Thou know'st; Thou from the first
 Wast present, and, with mighty wings out-spread, 20
 Dove-like sat'st brooding on the vast Abyss,
 And mad'st it pregnant: what in me is dark
 Illumine, what is low raise and support;
 That, to the height of this great argument
 I may assert Eternal Providence, 25
 And justify the ways of God to men.

Say first—for Heaven hides nothing from thy view,
 Nor the deep tract of Hell—say first what cause
 Moved our grand Parents, in that happy state,
 Favour'd of Heaven so highly, to fall off 30
 From their Creator, and transgress his will
 For one restraint, lords of the World besides.
 Who first seduced them to that foul revolt?
 Th' infernal serpent; he it was whose guile,
 Stirred up with envy and revenge, deceived 35
 The mother of mankind, what time his pride
 Had cast him out from Heaven, with all his host
 Of rebel Angels, by whose aid, aspiring

To set himself in glory above his peers,
 He trusted to have equalled the Most High, 40
 If he opposed, and, with ambitious aim
 Against the throne and monarchy of God, Raised impious war in Heaven and battle proud,
 With vain attempt. Him the Almighty Power
 Hurl'd headlong flaming from the ethereal 45
 sky,
 With hideous ruin and combustion, down
 To bottomless perdition, there to dwell
 In adamantine chains and penal fire,
 Who durst defy the Omnipotent to arms.
 Nine times the space that measures day and night 50
 To mortal men, he, with his horrid crew,
 Lay vanquished, rolling in the fiery gulf,
 Confounded, though immortal. But his doom Reserved him to more wrath; for now the thought
 Both of lost happiness and lasting pain 55
 Torments him: round he throws his baleful
 eyes,
 That witnessed<sup>4</sup> huge affliction and dismay,
 Mixed with obdurate pride and steadfast hate.
 At once, as far as Angel's ken, he views
 The dismal situation waste and wild. 60
 A dungeon horrible, on all sides round,
 As one great furnace flamed; yet from those flames
 No light; but rather darkness visible
 Served only to discover sights of woe, Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace 65
 And rest can never dwell, hope never comes
 That comes to all, but torture without end
 Still urges, and a fiery deluge, fed
 With ever-burning sulphur unconsumed.
 Such place Eternal Justice had prepared 70
 For those rebellious; here their prison ordain'd
 In utter darkness, and their portion set,
 As far removed from God and light of Heaven,
 As from the centre thrice to the utmost pole.<sup>5</sup>
 O how unlike the place from whence they fell! 75
 There the companions of his fall, o'erwhelmed
 With floods and whirlwinds of tempestuous fire,
 He soon discerns; and, weltering by his side
 One next himself in power, and next in crime,
 Long after known in Palestine, and named 81
 Beelzebub. To whom the Arch-Enemy,
 And thence in Heaven called Satan,<sup>6</sup> with bold
 words
 Breaking the horrid silence, thus began:—
 "If thou beest he—but Oh how fallen! how changed
 From him!—who, in the happy realms of light, Cloth'd with transcendent brightness, didst 86
 outshine

Myriads, though bright—If he whom mutual league,
United thoughts and counsels, equal hope
And hazard in the glorious enterprise,
Joined with me once, now misery hath joined 90
In equal ruin; into what pit thou seest
From what height fallen; so much the stronger proved
He with his thunder: and till then who knew
The force of those dire arms? Yet not for those,
Nor what the potent Victor in his rage 95
Can else inflict, do I repent, or change, Though changed in outward lustre, that fixed
mind,
And high disdain from sense of injured merit,
That with the Mightiest raised me to contend,
And to the fierce contention brought along 100
Innumerable force of Spirits armed,
That durst dislike his reign, and, me preferring,
His utmost power with adverse power opposed
In dubious battle on the plains of Heaven,
And shook his throne. What though the field be lost? 105
All is not lost—the unconquerable will,
And study of revenge, immortal hate,
And courage never to submit or yield:
And what is else not to be overcome?
That glory never shall his wrath or might 110
Extort from me. To bow and sue for grace
With suppliant knee, and deify his power
Who, from the terror of his arm, so late
Doubted his empire—that were low indeed;
That were an ignominy and shame beneath 115
This downfall; since, by fate, the strength of Gods,
And this empyreal substance, cannot fail;
Since, through experience of this great event,
In arms not worse, in foresight much advanced,
We may with more successful hope resolve 120
To wage by force or guile eternal war,
Irreconcilable to our grand Foe,
Who now triumphs, and in the excess of joy
Sole reigning holds the tyranny of Heaven.”
So spake the apostate Angel, though in pain, 125
Vaunting aloud, but racked with deep despair;
And him thus answered soon his bold com-
peer:—
“O Prince, O chief of many-thronè Powers,
That led the embattled Seraphim to war
Under thy conduct, and, in dreadful deeds 130
Fearless, endangered Heaven’s perpetual King,
And put to proof his high supremacy,
Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or fate!
Too well I see and rue the dire event
That, with sad overthrow, and foul defeat, 135
Hath lost us Heaven, and all this mighty host
In horrible destruction laid thus low,
As far as Gods and Heavenly Essences
Can perish: for the mind and spirit remain
Invincible, and vigour soon returns, 140
Though all our glory extinct, and happy state
Here swallowed up in endless misery.
But what if He our Conqueror (whom I now
Of force believe Almighty, since no less Than such could have o’erpower’d such force as ours) 145

Have left us in this our spirit and strength, entire,
Strongly to suffer and support our pains,
That we may so suffice his vengeful ire,
Or do him mightier service as his thralls
By right of war, whate’er his business be, 150
Here in the heart of Hell to work in fire,
Or do his errands in the gloomy Deep?
What can it then avail, though yet we feel Strength undiminished, or eternal being
To undergo eternal punishment?” 155
Whereto with speedy words the Arch-Fiend replied:—
“Fallen Cherub! to be weak is miserable,
Doing or suffering: but of this be sure—
To do aught good, never will be our task,
But ever to do ill our sole delight, 160
As being the contrary to His high will Whom we resist. If then his providence
Out of our evil seek to bring forth good,
Our labour must be to pervert that end,
And out of good still to find means of evil; 165
Which oft-times may succeed, so as perhaps Shall grieve him, if I fail not, and disturb
His inmost counsels from their destined aim.
But see! the angry Victor hath recalled
His ministers of vengeance and pursuit 170
Back to the gates of Heaven; the sulphurous hail,
Shot after us in storm, o’erblown, hath laid
The fiery surge that from the precipice
Of Heaven received us falling; and the thunder,
Winged with red lightning and impetuous rage,
Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases now
To bellow through the vast and boundless deep. 177
Let us not slip the occasion, whether scorn.
Or satiate fury yield it from our Foe.
Seest thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild,
The seat of desolation, void of light, 181
Save what the glimmering of these livid flames Casts pale and dreadful? Thither let us tend
From off the tossing of these fiery waves;
There rest, if any rest can harbour there; 185
And, re-assembling our afflicted powers,
Consult how we may henceforth most offend
Our enemy, our own loss how repair,
How overcome this dire calamity,
What reinforcement we may gain from hope, 190
If not, what resolution from despair.”
Thus Satan, talking to his nearest mate,
With head uplift the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed; his other parts besides
Prone on the flood, extended long and large, 195
Lay floating many a rood; in bulk as huge
As when the fables name, of monstrous size,
Titanian<sup>7</sup> or Earth-born, that warred on Jove,
Briareus,<sup>8</sup> or Typhon,<sup>9</sup> whom the den
By ancient Tarsus held, or that sea-beast 200

<sup>7</sup> The Titans, in Greek mythology, were the children of heaven and Earth. Of gigantic size, the Titans typify strength and lawlessness.

<sup>9</sup> A giant brought forth by the Earth to contend with the Gods. Overcome by Jupiter, he was placed beneath Ætna, or according to others under the “serbonian bog.”

Leviathan, which God of all his works
 Created hugest that swim the ocean stream.
 Him, haply slumbering on the Norway foam,
 The pilot of some small night-foundered skiff,
 Deeming some island, oft, as seamen tell, 205
 With fixed anchor in his scaly rind,
 Moors by his side under the lee, while night
 Invests the sea, and wishèd morn delays.
 So stretched out huge in length the Arch-Fiend lay, 209
 Chained on the burning lake; nor ever thence
 Had risen, or heaved his head, but that the will
 And high permission of all-ruling Heaven
 Left him at large to his own dark designs,
 That with reiterated crimes he might
 Heap on himself damnation, while he sought 215
 Evil to others, and enraged might see
 How all his malice served but to bring forth
 Infinite goodness, grace, and mercy, shown
 On Man by him seduced, but on himself 219
 Treble confusion, wrath, and vengeance poured.
 Forthwith upright he rears from off the pool
 His mighty stature; on each hand the flames,
 Driv'n backward, slope their pointing spires, and rolled
 In billows, leave i' the midst a horrid vale.
 Then with expanded wings he steers his flight
 Aloft, incumbent on the dusky air, 226
 That felt unusual weight; till on dry land
 He lights—if it were land that ever burned
 With solid, as the lake with liquid fire, 229
 And such appeared in hue: as when the force
 Of subterranean wind transports a hill
 Torn from Pelorus,<sup>10</sup> or the shattered side
 Of thundering Ætna, whose combustible
 And fuelled entrails, thence conceiving fire, 234
 Sublimed<sup>11</sup> with mineral fury, aid the winds,
 And leave a singèd bottom all involved
 With stench and smoke. Such resting found the sole
 Of unblest feet. Him follow'd his next mate;
 Both glorying to have scaped the Stygian flood
 As gods, and by their own recovered strength,
 Not by the sufferance of supernal power. 241
 "Is this the region, this the soil, the clime,"
 Said then the lost Archangel, "this the seat
 That we must change for Heaven?—this mournful gloom
 For that celestial light? Be it so, since he 245
 Who now is sovran can dispose and bid
 What shall be right: farthest from Him is best,
 Whom reason hath equalled, force hath made supreme
 Above his equals—Farewell, happy fields,
 Where joy for ever dwells! Hail horrors! hail Infernal World! and thou, profoundest Hell, 251
 Receive thy new possessor—one who brings
 A mind not to be changed by place or time.
 The mind is its own place, and in itself
 Can make a Heaven of Hell, a Hell of Heaven.
 What matter where, if I be still the same, 256
 And what I should be, all but less than he

<sup>11</sup> Sublimed, i. e. either uplifted, or changed into vapor, by the fury (violent inter-action) of the combustible minerals, which are the fuelled entrails of the volcano.

Whom thunder hath made greater? Here at least
 We shall be free: the Almighty hath not built
 Here for his envy, will not drive us hence: 260
 Here we may reign secure; and, in my choice,
 To reign is worth ambition, though in Hell:
 Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heaven.
 But wherefore let we then our faithful friends,
 The associates and co-partners of our loss, 265
 Lie thus astonished on the oblivious pool,
 And call them not to share with us their part
 In this unhappy mansion, or once more
 With rallied arms to try what may be yet
 Regained in Heaven, or what more lost in Hell?"
 So Satan spake; and him Beëlzebub 271
 Thus answered:—"Leader of those armies
 bright
 Which, but the Omnipotent, none could have foiled!
 If once they hear that voice, their liveliest pledge
 Of hope in fears and dangers—heard so oft 275
 In worst extremes, and on the perilous edge
 Of battle, when it raged, in all assaults
 Their surest signal—they will soon resume
 New courage and revive, though now they lie
 Grovelling and prostrate on yon lake of fire, 280
 As we erewhile, astounded and amazed
 No wonder, fallen such a pernicious height!"
 He scarce had ceased, when the superior Fiend
 Was moving toward the shore; his ponderous shield,
 Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round, 285
 Behind him cast. The broad circumference
 Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
 Through optic glass the Tuscan artist<sup>12</sup> views
 At evening, from the top of Fesolè,<sup>13</sup>
 Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands, 290
 Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.
 His spear—to equal which the tallest pine
 Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
 Of some great ammiral<sup>14</sup> were but a wand—
 He walked with, to support uneasy steps 295
 Over the burning marle, not like those steps
 On Heaven's azure; and the torrid clime
 Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire.
 Nathless he so endured, till on the beach
 Of that inflamed sea he stood, and called 300
 His legions—Angel Forms, who lay entranced,
 Thick as autumnal leaves, that strow the brooks
 In Vallombrosa,<sup>15</sup> where the Etrurian shades,
 High over-arched embower; or scattered sedge
 Afloat, when with fierce winds Orion armed 305 Hath vexed the Red-Sea coast, whose waves o'er threw
 Busiris<sup>16</sup> and his Memphian chivalry,
 While with perfidious hatred they pursued
 The sojourners of Goshen, who beheld
 From the safe shore their floating carcasses 310

And broken chariot-wheels. So thick bestrown,
 Abject and lost, lay these, covering the flood,
 Under amazement of their hideous change.
 He called so loud that all the hollow deep
 Of Hell resounded:—"Princes, Potentates, 315
 Warriors, the Flower of Heaven—once yours;
 now lost,

If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal Spirits! Or have ye chosen this place
 After the toil of battle to repose
 Your wearied virtue, for the ease you find 320
 To slumber here, as in the vales of heaven?
 Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
 To adore the Conqueror, who now beholds
 Cherub and Seraph rolling in the flood
 With scattered arms and ensigns, till anon 325
 His swift pursuers from Heaven-gates discern
 The advantage, and descending, tread us down
 Thus drooping, or with linked thunderbolts
 Transfix us to the bottom of this gulfer!—
 Awake, arise, or be for ever fallen!" 330

They heard, and were abashed, and up they sprung

Upon the wing, as when men wont to watch,
 On duty sleeping found by whom they dread,
 Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake.

Nor did they not perceive the evil plight 335
 In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel;
 Yet to their General's voice they soon obeyed
 Innumerable. As when the potent rod
 Of Amram's son,<sup>17</sup> in Egypt's evil day,
 Waved round the coast, up-called a pitchy cloud
 Of locusts, warping on the eastern wind, 341
 That o'er the realm of impious Pharaoh hung
 Like Night, and darkened all the land of Nile;
 So numberless were those bad Angels seen
 Hovering on wing under the cope of Hell, 345
 'Twixt upper, nether, and surrounding fires;
 Till, as a signal given, th' uplifted spear
 Of their great Sultan waving to direct
 Their course, in even balance down they light
 On the firm brimstone, and fill all the plain: 350
 A multitude like which the populous North
 Poured never from her frozen loins, to pass
 Rhene<sup>18</sup> or the Danaw,<sup>19</sup> when her barbarous sons

Came like a deluge on the South, and spread
 Beneath Gibraltar to the Lybian sands. 355
 Forthwith from every squadron and each band,
 The heads and leaders thither haste where stood

Their great Commander—godlike Shapes, and Forms

Excelling human; princely Dignities; 359
 And Powers that erst in Heaven sat on thrones,
 Though of their names in Heavenly records now
 Be no memorial, blotted out and rased
 By their rebellion from the Books of Life.
 Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve Got them new names, till, wandering o'er the earth, 365

Through God's high sufferance for the trial of man,

By falsities and lies the greatest part
 Of mankind they corrupted to forsake

<sup>17</sup> Moses. Exod. x. 12-15. <sup>18</sup> Rhine. <sup>19</sup> Danube.

God their Creator, and the invisible
 Glory of Him that made them to transform 370
 Oft to the image of a brute, adorned
 With gay religions full of pomp and gold,
 And devils to adore for deities:

Then were they known to men by various names,
 And various idols through the heathen world.

Say, Muse, their names then known, who first, who last, 376

Roused from the slumber on that fiery couch,
 At their great Emperor's call, as next in worth,
 Came singly where he stood on the bare strand,
 While the promiscuous crowd stood yet aloof.

The chief were those who, from the pit of Hell 381

Roaming to seek their prey on Earth, durst fix
 Their seats, long after, next the seat of God,
 Their altars by His altar, gods adored
 Among the nations round, and durst abide 385

Jehovah thundering out of Sion, throned
 Between the Cherubim; yea, often placed

Within His sanctuary itself their shrines,
 Abominations; and with cursed things

His holy rites and solemn feasts profaned, 390
 And with their darkness durst affront his light.

First, Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood

Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears;
 Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels
 loud,

Their children's cries unheard that passed through fire 395

To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite
 Worship'd in Rabba<sup>20</sup> and her watery plain,

In Argob and in Basan, to the stream
 Of utmost Arnon. Nor content with such

Audacious neighbourhood, the wisest heart 400
 Of Solomon he led by fraud to build

His temple right against the temple of God
 On that opprobrious hill,<sup>21</sup> and made his grove

The pleasant valley of Hinnom,<sup>22</sup> Tophet thence

And black Gehenna called, the type of Hell.
 Next, Chemos,<sup>23</sup> the obscene dread of Moab's

sons, 406

From Arar to Nebo, and the wild
 Of southmost Abarim: in Hesebon

And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
 The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines, 410

And Eleale to the Asphaltic<sup>24</sup> pool:
 Peor his other name, when he enticed

Israel in Sittim,<sup>25</sup> on their march from Nile,
 To do him wanton rites, which cost them woe.

Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarged 415
 Even to that hill of scandal, by the grove

Of Moloch homicide, lust hard by hate;
<sup>20</sup> "City of Waters," capital of the land of the Ammor-ites.

<sup>21</sup> The Mount of Olives. I Kings, xi. 7.

 Jerusalem, which, after it had been defiled by the sacrificial worship of Moloch, was converted into a repulsive place where the refuse of the city was cast and burnt.

 as Moloch by the Ammonites. He is spoken of as Baal Peor (Numb. xxv. 3) i. e. the Baal who was worshipped at Mt. Peor, in Moab.

<sup>25</sup> A valley in the land of Moab. Numb. xxv.

Till good Josiah<sup>26</sup> drove them thence to Hell.
With these came they, who, from the bordering
    floor

Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts      420
Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names
Of Baalim<sup>27</sup> and Ashloroth—those male,
These feminine: For Spirits, when they please,
Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
And uncompounded is their essence pure,      425
Not tied or manacled with joint or limb,
Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
Like cumbrous flesh; but, in what shape they choose,

Dilated or condensed, bright or obscure,
Can execute their aery purposes,      430
And works of love or enmity fulfil.

For those the race of Israel oft forsook
Their Living Strength, and unfrequented left
His righteous altar, bowing lowly down

To bestial gods; for which their heads as low      435
Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
Of despicable foes. With these in troop,
Came Astoreth, whom the Phœnicians called

Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns;
To whose bright image nightly by the moon      440
Sidonian virgins paid their vows and songs:

In Sion also not unsung, where stood
Her temple on the offensive mountain, built
By that uxorious king whose heart, though large,

Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell      445
To idols foul. Thammuz<sup>28</sup> came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate

In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis from his native rock      450
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded: the love-tale

Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led,      455
His eye survey'd the dark idolatries

Of alienated Judah. Next came one
Who mourned in earnest, when the captive ark
Maim'd his brute image, head and hands lopt off

In his own temple, on the grunsel edge,<sup>29</sup>      460
Where he fell flat, and shamed his worshippers:
Dagon<sup>30</sup> his name, sea-monster, upward man
And downward fish; yet had his temple high

Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,      465
And Accaron, and Gaza's frontier bounds.

Him follow'd Rimmon,<sup>31</sup> whose delightful seat

Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
Of Abbana and Pharpar, lucid streams.
He also against the house of God was bold:      470

A leper once he lost, and gained a king—
Ahaz, his sottish conqueror, whom he drew
God's altar to disparage and displace

For one of Syrian mode, whereon to burn
His odious offerings, and adore the gods      475
Whom he had vanquished. After these, appeared

A crew who, under names of old renown—
Osiris, Isis, Orus, and their train—

With monstrous shapes and sorceries, abused
Fanatic Egypt and her priests to seek      480
Their wandering gods disguised in brutish

forms
Rather than human. Nor did Israel scape
The infection, when their borrowed gold composed

The calf in Oreb; and the rebel king<sup>32</sup>
Doubled that sin in Bethel and in Dan,      485
Likening his Maker to the grazed ox—

Jehovah, who in one night, when he passed
From Egypt marching, equall'd with one stroke

Both her first-born and all her bleating gods.
Belial<sup>33</sup> came last; than whom a Spirit more lewd      490

Fell not from Heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself. To him no temple stood,
Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he

In temples and at altars, when the priest
Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons, who filled      495
With lust and violence the house of God?

In courts and palaces he also reigns,
And in luxurious cities, where the noise
Of riot ascends above their loftiest towers,

And injury and outrage; and when night      500 Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons

Of Belial, flown<sup>34</sup> with insolence and wine.
Witness the streets of Sodom, and that night
In Gibeah, when the hospitable door

Exposed a matron, to avoid worse rape.      505
These were the prime in order and in might:
The rest were long to tell; though far renowned

The Ionian gods—of Javan's issue<sup>35</sup> held Gods, yet confessed later than Heaven and

Earth,
Their boasted parents;—Titan, Heaven's first-
    born,      510

With his enormous brood, and birthright seized
By younger Saturn; he from mightier Jove,
His own and Rhea's son, like measure found;

So Jove usurping reigned. These, first in Crete

And Ida known, thence on the snowy top      515
Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,

<sup>27</sup> Baalim—Ashloroth, the Hebrew plurals of Baal (the sun god) and Astoreth (the moon-goddess). Milton means that with the gods before named, came other gods of the sun and moon, worshipped under various names from the Euphrates on the East to the brook Sihor. (Joshua, xv. 4) that divided Egypt from Syria.

<sup>28</sup> The Oriental original of the Greek Adonis. Thammuz (or Tammuz) was killed by a wild boar, and every year, when the stream Adonis (which flows from Lebanon, the scene of his death) was colored by the red washings of its upper banks, the waters were supposed to be tinged with his blood.

Their highest heaven; or on the Delphian cliff,
 Or in Dodona, and through all the bounds
 Of Doric land; or who with Saturn old
 Fled over Adria<sup>36</sup> to the Hesperian<sup>37</sup> fields, 520
 And o'er the Celtic roam'd the utmost Isles.

All these and more came flocking; but with looks Downcast and damp; yet such wherein appeared
 Obscure some glimpse of joy, to have found their Chief
 Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost 525

In loss itself; which on his countenance cast
 Like doubtful hue. But he, his wonted pride
 Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised

Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears: 530
 Then straight commands that, at the warlike
 sound

Of trumpets loud and clarions, be upreared
 His mighty standard: that proud honour claimed

Azazel as his right, a Cherub tall:
 Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled 535

Th' imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
 Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind,
 With gems and golden lustre rich emblazed,
 Seraphic arms and trophies; all the while
 Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds: 540
 At which the universal host up-sent

A shout, that tore Hell's concave, and beyond
 Frighted the reign of Chaos and old Night.
 All in a moment through the gloom were seen
 Ten thousand banners rise into the air, 545
 With orient colours waving: with them rose
 A forest huge of spears; and thronging helms
 Appeared, and serried shields in thick array
 Of depth immeasurable. Anon they move

In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood<sup>38</sup> 550
 Of flutes and soft recorders,<sup>39</sup>—such as raised
 To height of noblest temper, heroes old
 Adorning to battle, and instead of rage Deliberate valour breathed, firm and unmoved

With dread of death to flight or foul retreat; 555
 Nor wanting power to mitigate and swage
 With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chace
 Anguish and doubt and fear and sorrow and pain

From mortal or immortal minds. Thus they,
 Breathing united force, with fixed thought, 560
 Moved on in silence to soft pipes, that charmed

Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil. And now
 Advanced in view they stand—a horrid front
 Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
 Of warriors old, with ordered spear and shield,
 Awaiting what command their mighty Chief 566
 Had to impose. He through the armed files
 Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse
 The whole battalion views,—their order due,
 Their visages and stature as of gods; 570
 Their number last he sums. And now his heart

Distends with pride, and, hardening in his strength,

Glories: for never since created Man
 Met such embodied force as, named with these,
 Could merit more than that small infantry<sup>40</sup> 575
 Warred on by cranes—though all the giant
 brood

Of Phlegra<sup>41</sup> with the heroic race were joined
 That fought at Thebes and Ilium, on each side
 Mixed with auxilial gods; and what resounds
 In fable or romance of Uther's son,<sup>42</sup> 580
 Begirt with British and Armoric knights;
 And all who since, baptized or infidel,
 Jousted in Aspramont, or Montalban,
 Damasco, or Morocco, or Trebisond,
 Or whom Biserta<sup>43</sup> sent from Afric shore 585

When Charlemain with all his peerage, fell
 By Fontarabbia. Thus far these beyond
 Compare of mortal prowess, yet observed
 Their dread Commander. He, above the rest

In shape and gesture proudly eminent, 590
 Stood like a tower. His form had yet not lost
 All its original brightness, nor appeared
 Less than Archangel ruined, and the excess
 Of glory obscured: as when the sun new-risen,
 Looks through the horizontal misty air 595
 Shorn of his beams, or, from behind the moon,
 In dim eclipse, disastrous twilight sheds

On half the nations, and with fear of change
 Perplexes monarchs. Darkened so, yet shone
 Above them all the Archangel: but his face 600
 Deep scars of thunder had intrenched, and care
 Sat on his faded cheek, but under brows
 Of dauntless courage, and considerate pride
 Waiting revenge. Cruel his eye, but cast
 Signs of remorse and passion, to behold 605

The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss), condemned
 For ever now to have their lot in pain—
 Millions of Spirits for his fault amerced
 Of Heaven, and from eternal splendours flung
 For his revolt—yet faithful how they stood, 611
 Their glory withered; as when Heaven's fire
 Hath scathed the forest oaks or mountain pines,
 With singèd top their stately growth, though
 bare,

Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared

<sup>38</sup> In Dorian music the scale differed from that in use among the Lydians and others, this distinctive scale (or arrangement of tones and half tones in the octave) was called the Dorian mood, i. e. mode, or system. Doric music was invigorating and martial in character.

To speak; whereat their double ranks they bend 616
From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
With all his peers: attention held them mute.
Thrice he assayed, and thrice, in spite of scorn,
Tears, such as Angels weep, burst forth: at last Words interwove with sighs, found out their
way:— 621

“O myriads of immortal Spirits! O Powers Matchless, but with the Almighty!—and that strife

Was not inglorious, though the event was dire,
As this place testifies, and this dire change
Hateful to utter. But what power of mind, 626
Foreseeing or presaging, from the depth
Of knowledge past or present, could have feared

How such united force of gods, how such
As stood like these, could ever know repulse?
For who can yet believe, though after loss, 631
That all these puissant legions, whose exile
Hath emptied Heaven, shall fail to re-ascend,
Self-raised, and re-possess their native seat?

For me, be witness all the host of Heaven, 635
If counsels different, or dangers shunned
By me, have lost our hopes. But he who reigns Monarch in Heaven, till then as one secure
Sat on his throne, upheld by old repute,
Consent or custom, and his regal state 640
Put forth at full, but still his strength concealed:

Which tempted our attempt, and wrought our fall.

Henceforth his might we know, and know our
own,

So as not either to provoke, or dread
New war provoked; our better part remains 645
To work in close design, by fraud or guile,
What force effected not; that he no less
At length from us may find, Who overcomes

By force hath overcome but half his foe.
Space may produce new Worlds; whereof so rife
There went a fame in Heaven that He ere long Intended to create, and therein plant 652

A generation whom his choice regard
Should favour equal to the Sons of Heaven;
Thither, if but to pry, shall be perhaps 655
Our first eruption—thither or elsewhere:

For this infernal pit shall never hold
Celestial Spirits in bondage, nor the Abyss
Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts
Full counsel must mature. Peace is despaired;
For who can think submission? War, then, 661
war

Open or understood, must be resolved.”

He spake; and, to confirm his words, out-flew Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs

Of mighty Cherubim; the sudden blaze 665
Far round illumined Hell. Highly they raged Against the Highest, and fierce with grasped arms

Clashed on their sounding shields the din of
war,

Hurling defiance toward the vault of Heaven.

There stood a hill not far, whose grisly top

Belched fire and rolling smoke; the rest entire Shone with a glossy scurf—undoubted sign 672
That in his womb was hid metallic ore,
The work of sulphur. Thither, winged with speed,

A numerous brigade hastened: as when bands
Of pioneers, with spade and pickaxe armed, 676
Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
Or cast a rampart. Mammon led them on—
Mammon, the least erected spirit that fell From Heaven; for even in Heaven his looks and thoughts 680

Were always downward bent, admiring more
The riches of Heaven's pavement, trodden gold,
Than aught divine or holy else enjoyed
In vision beatific. By him first
Men also, and by his suggestion taught, 685
Ransacked the Centre, and with impious
hands

Rifled the bowels of their mother earth
For treasures better hid. Soon had his crew
Opened into the hill a spacious wound,
And digged out ribs of gold. Let none admire<sup>44</sup>
That riches grow in Hell; that soil may best 691 Deserve the precious bane. And here let those Who boast in mortal things, and wondering tell
Of Babel, and the works of Memphian kings,
Learn how their greatest monuments of fame,
And strength, and art, are easily outdone 696
By Spirits reprobate, and in an hour
What in an age they, with incessant toil
And hands innumerable, scarce perform.
Nigh on the plain, in many cells prepared, 700
That underneath had veins of liquid fire
Sluiced from the lake, a second multitude
With wondrous art founded the massy ore, Severing each kind, and scummed the bullion-
dross;

A third as soon had formed within the ground
A various mould, and from the boiling cells 706
By strange conveyance filled each hollow nook:
As in an organ, from one blast of wind,
To many a row of pipes the sound-board breathes.

Anon out of the earth a fabric huge 710
Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet—
Built like a temple, where pilasters round
Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid
With golden architrave; nor did there want
Cornice or frieze, with bossy sculptures graven;
The roof was fretted gold. Not Babylon 717
Nor great Alcairo, such magnificence
Equalled in all their glories, to enshrine
Belus or Serapis their gods, or seat 720
Their kings, when Egypt with Assyria strove
In wealth and luxury. The ascending pile Stood fixed her stately height; and straight the doors,

Opening their brazen folds, discover, wide
Within, her ample spaces o'er the smooth 725
And level pavement; from the archèd roof
Pendent by subtle magic, many a row
Of starry lamps and blazing cressets, fed
With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light

“Wonder.

As from a sky. The hasty multitude 730
 Admiring entered; and the work some praise,
 And some the architect. His hand was known
 In Heaven by many a towered structure high,
 Where sceptred Angels held their residence,
 And sat as Princes, whom the supreme King 735
 Exalted to such power, and gave to rule,
 Each in his hierarchy, the Orders bright.
 Nor was his name unheard or unadored
 In ancient Greece; and in the Ausonian land<sup>45</sup>
 Men called him Mulciber,<sup>46</sup> and how he fell
 From Heaven, they fabled, thrown by angry
 Jove 741
 Sheer o'er the crystal battlements: from morn
 To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
 A summer's day, and with the setting sun
 Dropt from the zenith, like a falling star, 745
 On Lemnos, the Ægean isle. Thus they relate,
 Erring; for he with this rebellious rout,
 Fell long before; nor aught availed him now
 To have built in Heaven high towers; nor did he scape
 By all his engines, but was headlong sent, 750
 With his industrious crew, to build in Hell.
 Meanwhile, the wingèd Heralds, by command
 Of sovereign power, with awful ceremony
 And trumpet's sound, throughout the host proclaim
 A solemn council forthwith to be held 755
 At Pandemonium,<sup>47</sup> the high capital
 Of Satan and his peers. Their summons called
 From every band and squared regiment
 By place or choice the worthiest: they anon
 With hundreds and with thousands trooping came, 760
 Attended. All access was thronged; the gates
 And porches wide, but chief the spacious hall
 Though like a covered field, where champions bold
 Wont ride in armed, and at the Soldan's<sup>48</sup> chair,
 Defied the best of Panim<sup>49</sup> chivalry 765
 To mortal combat, or career with lance),
 Thick swarmed, both on the ground and in the air
 Brushed with the hiss of rustling wings. As bees
 In spring-time, when the Sun with Taurus rides,
 Pour forth their populous youth about the hive in clusters; they among fresh dews and flowers fly to and fro, or on the smoothèd plank, 772
 The suburb of their straw-built citadel,
 New rubbed with balm, expatiate and confer
 Their state-affairs: so thick the airy crowd 775
 Swarmed and were straitened; till, the signal given,
 Behold a wonder! They but now who seemed in bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons,
 Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room
 Throng numberless—like that pygmean race<sup>50</sup>

Beyond the Indian mount; or fairy elves, 781
 Whose midnight revels, by a forest-side
 Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
 Or dreams he sees, while over-head the Moon
 Sits arbitress, and nearer to the Earth 785 Wheels her pale course; they, on their mirth and dance
 Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
 At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds.
 Thus incorporeal Spirits to smallest forms Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large, 790
 Though without number still, amidst the hall
 Of that infernal court. But far within,
 And in their own dimensions, like themselves,
 The great Seraphic Lords and Cherubim
 In close recess and secret conclave sat, 795
 A thousand demi-gods on golden seats,
 Frequent and full. After short silence then,
 And summons read, the great consult began.

From Book III

Hail, holy Light! offspring of Heaven first-born!
 Or of the Eternal coeternal beam
 May I express thee unblamed? since God is
 light,
 And never but in unapproachèd light
 Dwelt from eternity—dwelt then in thee, 5
 Bright effluence of bright essence increate!
 Or hear'st thou<sup>1</sup> rather pure Ethereal stream,
 Whose fountain who shall tell? Before the Sun,
 Before the Heavens, thou wert, and at the voice
 Of God, as with a mantle, didst invest 10
 The rising World of waters dark and deep,
 Won from the void and formless Infinite.
 Thee I revisit now with bolder wing,
 Escaped the Stygian pool, though long detained
 In that obscure sojourn, while in my flight,
 Through utter and through middle Darkness borne, 16
 With other notes than to the Orphean lyre
 I sung of Chaos and eternal Night,
 Taught by the Heavenly Muse to venture down
 The dark descent, and up to re-ascend, 20
 Though hard and rare. Thee I revisit safe,
 And feel thy sovereign vital lamp; but thou
 Revisit'st not these eyes, that roll in vain
 To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
 So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs, 25
 Or dim suffusion veiled. Yet not the more
 Cease I to wander where the Muses haunt Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
 Smit with the love of sacred song; but chief
 Thee, Sion, and the flowery brooks beneath,
 That wash thy hallowed feet, and warbling flow,
 Nightly I visit; nor sometimes forget 32
 Those other two equalled with me in fate,
 So were I equalled with them in renown,
 Blind Thamyras<sup>2</sup> and blind Mæonides,<sup>3</sup> 35

<sup>46</sup> The softener, i. e. Vulcan.

<sup>47</sup> The abode of all the Demons, as the Pantheon is the abode of all the gods.

And Tiresias<sup>4</sup> and Phineus<sup>4</sup> prophets old:
 Then feed on thoughts that voluntary move
 Harmonious numbers; as the wakeful bird
 Sings darkling, and in shadiest covert hid,
 Tunes her nocturnal note. Thus with the year
 Seasons return; but not to me returns 41
 Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
 Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
 Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
 But cloud instead and ever-during dark 45
 Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
 Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair,
 Presented with a universal blank
 Of Nature's works, to me expunged and rased,
 And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out. 50
 So much the rather thou, Celestial Light, Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
 Irradiate; there plant eyes; all mist from thence Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
 Of things invisible to mortal sight. 55

From Book VII

Descend from Heaven, Urania,<sup>1</sup> by that name
 If rightly thou art called, whose voice divine
 Following, above the Olympian hill I soar,
 Above the flight of Pegasean wing!
 The meaning, not the name, I call; for thou 5
 Nor of the Muses nine, nor on the top
 Of old Olympus dwell'st; but heavenly-born,
 Before the hills appeared or fountain flowed,
 Thou with Eternal Wisdom didst converse, 10
 Wisdom thy sister, and with her didst play
 In presence of the Almighty Father, pleased
 With thy celestial song. Up led by thee,
 Into the Heaven of Heavens I have presumed,
 An earthly guest, and drawn empyreal air,
 Thy tempering. With like safety guided down,
 Return me to my native element; 16
 Lest, from this flying steed unreined (as once Bellerophon, though from a lower clime)
 Dismounted, on the Aleian field I fall,
 Erroneous there to wander and forlorn. 20
 Half yet remains unsung, but narrower bound
 Within the visible Diurnal Sphere.
 Standing on Earth, not rapt above the pole,
 More safe I sing with mortal voice, unchanged
 To hoarse or mute, though fallen on evil 25
 days,
 On evil days though fallen, and evil tongues,
 In darkness, and with dangers compassed
 round,
 And solitude; yet not alone, while thou
 Visit'st my slumbers nightly, or when Morn
 Purples the East. Still govern thou my song, 30
 Urania, and fit audience find, though few,
 But drive far off the barbarous dissonance
 Of Bacchus and his revellers, the race
 Of that wild rout that tore the Thracian bard<sup>2</sup>
 In Rhodope, where woods and rocks had ears 35
 To rapture, till the savage clamour drowned

Both harp and voice; nor could the Muse defend
 Her son. So fail not thou who thee implores;
 For thou art heavenly, she an empty dream.

From Book IX

No more of talk where God or Angel Guest
 With Man, as with his friend, familiar used
 To sit indulgent, and with him partake
 Rural repast, permitting him the while Venial discourse unblamed. I now mus-
 change
 Those notes to tragic—foul distrust, and breach
 Disloyal, on the part of man, revolt
 And disobedience; on the part of Heaven,
 Now alienated, distance and distaste,
 Anger and just rebuke, and judgment given, 1
 That brought into this World a world of woe
 Sin and her shadow Death, and Misery,
 Death's harbinger. Sad task! yet argument
 Not less but more heroic than the wrath
 Of stern Achilles on his foe pursued 1
 Thrice fugitive about Troy wall; or rage
 Of Turnus for Lavinia disespoused;
 Or Neptune's ire, or Juno's, that so long
 Perplexed the Greek, and Cytherea's son:
 If answerable style I can obtain 2
 Of my celestial Patroness, who deigns
 Her nightly visitation unimplored,
 And dictates to me slumbering, or inspires 2
 Easy my unpremeditated verse,
 Since first this subject for heroic song 2
 Pleased me, long choosing and beginning late
 Not sedulous by nature to indite
 Wars, hitherto the only argument
 Heroic deemed, chief mastery to dissect 3
 With long and tedious havoc fabled knights
 In battles feigned (the better fortitude
 Of patience and heroic martyrdom
 Unsung), or to describe races and games,
 Or tilting furniture, emblazoned shields,
 Impresses quaint, caparisons and steeds, 3
 Bases and tinsel trappings, gorgeous knights
 At joust and tournament; then marshalled feast
 Served up in hall with sewers and seneshals
 The skill of artifice or office mean;
 Not that which justly gives heroic name 4
 To person or to poem! Me, of these Nor skilled nor studious, higher argument
 Remains, sufficient of itself to raise
 That name, unless an age too late, or cold
 Climate, or years, damp my intended wing 45
 Depressed; and much they may if all be mine,
 Not hers who brings it nightly to my ear.

THE WISH

(From The Mistress, 1647)

Well then, I now do plainly see
 This busy world and I shall ne'er agree;
 The very honey of all earthly joy
 Does, of all meats, the soonest cloy;

And they, methinks, deserve my pity 5
 Who for it can endure the stings,
 The crowd, the buzz, and murmurings
 Of this great hive, the city!

Ah, yet, ere I descend to the grave,
 May I a small house and large garden have; 10
 And a few friends, and many books, both true,
 Both wise, and both delightful too!
 And since Love ne'er will from me flee,—
 A mistress moderately fair,
 And good as guardian-angels are, 15
 Only beloved, and loving me!

O fountains! when in you shall I
 Myself eased of unpeaceful thoughts espy?
 O fields! O woods! when, when shall I be made
 The happy tenant of your shade? 20
 Here's the spring-head of pleasure's flood!
 Here's wealthy Nature's treasury,
 Where all the riches lie, that she
 Has coined and stamped for good.

Pride and ambition here 25
 Only in far-fetched metaphors appear;
 Here naught but winds can hurtful murmurs scatter,
 And naught but echo flatter.
 The gods when they descended hither
 From heaven did always choose their way; 30
 And therefore we may boldly say
 That 'tis the way too thither.

How happy here should I
 And one dear She live, and embracing die!
 She who is all the world, and can exclude 35
 In deserts solitude.
 I should have then this only fear:
 Lest men, when they my pleasures see,
 Should hither throng to live like me,
 And so make a city here. 40

THE GRASSHOPPER

(From Miscellanies, 1650)

Happy Insect, what can be
 In happiness compar'd to thee?
 Fed with nourishment divine,
 The dewy morning's gentle wine!
 Nature waits upon thee still, 5
 And thy verdant cup does fill.
 'Tis fill'd where ever thou dost tread,
 Nature selfe's thy Ganimed.<sup>1</sup>
 Thou dost drink, and dance, and sing;
 Happier than the happiest King! 10
 All the fields which thou dost see,
 All the plants belong to thee,
 All that summer hours produce,
 Fertile made with early juice.
 Man for thee does sow and plow; 15
 Farmer he and land-lord thou!
 Thou doest innocently joy;
 Nor does thy luxury destroy;
 The shepherd gladly heareth thee,
 More harmonious than he. 20

<sup>1</sup> Ganyমেদে, the cup-bearer of Zeus.

These country hindes with gladness hear,
 Prophet of the ripened year!
 These Phœbus loves, and does inspire;
 Phœbus is himself thy sire.
 To thee of all things upon earth, 25
 Life is no longer than thy mirth,
 Happy insect, happy thou,
 Dost neither age, nor winter know,
 But when thou'st drunk, and danced, and
 sung,
 Thy fill, the flowery leaves among 30 (Voluptuous, and wise with all, Epicurean animal!)
 Sated with thy summer feast,
 Thou retir'st to endless rest.

BREAD AND LIBERTY

(From Essay Of Liberty)

For the few hours of life allotted me,
 Give me (great God) but bread and liberty.
 I'll beg no more: if more thou'rt pleas'd to give,
 I'll thankfully that overplus receive: 5
 If beyond this no more be freely sent,
 I'll thank for this, and go away content.

THE GARDEN

(Written c. 1650, published first in first collected edition of Marvell's Poems, 1681)

How vainly men themselves amaze,
 To win the palm, the oak, or bays,
 And their incessant labours see
 Crowned from some single herb, or tree,
 Whose short and narrow-verged shade, 5
 Does prudently their toils upbraid,
 While all the flowers and trees do close,
 To weave the garlands of repose!

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
 And Innocence, thy sister dear? 10
 Mistaken long, I sought you then
 In busy companies of men.
 Your sacred plants, if here below,
 Only among the plants will grow;
 Society is all but rude 15
 To this delicious solitude.

No white nor red was ever seen
 So amorous as this lovely green.
 Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
 Cut in these trees their mistress' name, 20
 Little, alas! they know or heed,
 How far these beauties her exceed!
 Fair trees! where'er your barks I wound,
 No name shall but your own be found.

When we have run our passion's heat, 25
 Love hither makes his best retreat.
 The gods, who mortal beauty chase,
 Still in a tree did end their race;

Apollo hunted Daphne so,
Only that she might laurel grow;
And Pan did after Syrinx speed,
Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

What wondrous life is this I lead!
Ripe apples drop about my head;
The luscious clusters of a vine
Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
The nectarine, and curious<sup>1</sup> peach,
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass.

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasure less,
Withdraws into its happiness;—
The mind, that ocean where each kind
Does straight its own resemblance find;
Yet it creates, transcending these,
Far other worlds, and other seas,
Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest<sup>2</sup> aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There, like a bird, it sits and sings,
Then whets and claps its silver wings,
And, till prepared for longer flight,
Waves in its plume the various light.

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure and sweet,
What other help could yet be meet!
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two paradises are in one,
To live in paradise alone.

How well the skilful gardener drew
Of flowers, and herbs, this dial new,
Where, from above, the milder sun
Does through a fragrant zodiac run,
And, as it works, the industrious bee
Computes its time as well as we!
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers?

BERMUDAS

Where the remote Bermudas ride,
In the ocean's bosom unspied,
From a small boat that rowed along,
The listening winds received this song.

"What should we do but sing his praise, 5
That led us through the watery maze,
Unto an isle so long unknown,
And yet far kinder than our own?
Where he the huge sea-monster wracks,<sup>1</sup>
That lift the deep upon their backs, 10

He lands us on a grassy stage,
Safe from the storms and prelate's rage.
He gave us this eternal spring,
Which here enamels everything,
And sends the fowls to us in care,
On daily visits through the air;
He hangs in shades the orange bright,
Like golden lamps in a green night,
And does in the pomegranates close,
Jewels more rich than Ormus<sup>2</sup> shows;
He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
And throws the melons at our feet,
But apples plants of such a price,
No tree could ever bear them twice;
With cedars chosen by his hand,
From Lebanon, he stores the land,
And makes the hollow seas, that roar,
Proclaim the ambergrease on shore;
He cast (of which we rather boast)
The Gospel's pearl upon our coast,
And in these rocks for us did frame
A temple where to sound his name.

"Oh! let our voice his praise exalt,
'Till it arrive at heaven's vault,
Which, then (perhaps) rebounding, may Echo beyond the Mexique Bay."

Thus sung they in the English boat,
A holy and a cheerful note,
And all the way, to guide their chime,
With falling oars they kept the time.

TO HIS COY MISTRESS

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness, lady, were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
Thou by Indian Ganges' side
Should'st rubies find: I by the tide
Of Humber would complain. I would Love you ten years before the flood,
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews;
My vegetable love should grow
Vaster than empires and more slow;
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze;
Two hundred to adore each breast,
But thirty thousand to the rest;
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart.
For, lady, you deserve this state,
Nor would I love at lower rate.

But at my back I always hear Time's winged chariot hurrying near,
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found,
Nor, in thy marble vault shall sound
My echoing song: then worms shall try
That long preserved virginity,

Cf. "this muddy vesture of decay." (Mcht. of Ven. V., 1).

<sup>1</sup> Wracks, destroys.

And your quaint honour turn to dust,
And into ashes all my lust: 30
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.

Now therefore while the youthful hue
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,
And while thy willing soul transpires 35
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may,
And now, like amorous birds of prey
Rather at once our time devour,
Than languish in his slow-chap'd<sup>1</sup> power. 40
Let us roll all our strength and all
Our sweetness up into one ball,
And tear our pleasures with rough strife,
Thorough the iron gates of life;
Thus, though we cannot make our sun 45
Stand still, yet we will make him run.

DISDAIN RETURNED

(Printed, without concluding stanza, in Porter's Madrigalles and Ayres, 1632)

He that loves a rosy cheek,
Or a coral lip admires;
Or from star-like eyes doth seek
Fuel to maintain his fires, 5
As old Time makes these decay,
So his flames must waste away.

But a smooth and steadfast mind,
Gentle thoughts and calm desires,
Hearts with equal love combined,
Kindle never-dying fires; 10
Where these are not, I despise
Lovely cheeks or lips or eyes.

No tears, Celia, now shall win,
My resolved heart to return;
I have searched that soul within 15
And find naught but pride and scorn;
I have learned thy arts, and now
Can disdain as much as thou!

ARGUMENT TO HESPERIDES

(From Hesperides, 1648)

I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers,
Of April, May, of June and July-flowers;
I sing of May-poles, hock-carts,<sup>1</sup> wassails,<sup>2</sup> wakes,<sup>3</sup>
Of bride-grooms, brides, and of their bridal-cakes;

<sup>1</sup> Slow-jawed. (Chap. or chop = a jaw.) Rather let us devour time at once, than be eaten by his slow jaws.

<sup>2</sup> The last carts to return from the fields at harvest-home.

<sup>3</sup> It was a rural custom to drink the health of, or to wassail, the fruit trees on Christmas eve.

<sup>4</sup> Originally festivals held in celebration of the dedication of a church.

I write of youth, of love, and have access 5
By these to sing of cleanly wantonness;
I sing of dews, of rains, and, piece by piece
Of balm, of oil, of spice and ambergris;
I sing of times trans-shifting, and I write
How roses first came red and lilies white; 10
I write of groves, of twilights, and I sing
The Court of Mab, and of the fairy king;
I write of hell; I sing (and ever shall)
Of heaven, and hope to have it after all.

CORINNA'S GOING A-MAYING

(From the same)

Get up, get up for shame, the blooming morn
Upon her wings presents the god unshorn.
See how Aurora throws her fair
Fresh-quilted colours through the air:
Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see 5
The dew bespangling herb and tree.

Each flower has wept and bow'd toward the east
Above an hour since: yet you have not dress'd;
Nay! not so much as out of bed?
When all the birds have matins said 10
And sung their thankful hymns, 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
Whenas a thousand virgins on this day
Spring, sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.

Rise and put on your foliage, and be seen 15
To come forth, like the spring-time, fresh and
green,
And sweet as Flora. Take no care
For jewels for your gown or hair;
Fear not; the leaves will strew
Gems in abundance upon you: 20
Besides, the childhood of the day has kept,
Against you come, some orient pearls unwept;
Come and receive them while the light
Hangs on the dew-locks of the night:
And Titan on the eastern hill 25
Retires himself, or else stands still Till you come forth. Wash, dress, be brief in praying:
Few beads are best when once we go a-Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and, coming, mark
How each field turns a street, each street a park 30
Made green and trimm'd with trees; see how
Devotion gives each house a bough
Or branch: each porch, each door ere this
An ark, a tabernacle is,
Made up of white-thorn neatly interwove; 35
As if here were those cooler shades of love.
Can such delights be in the street
And open fields and we not see 't?
Come, we'll abroad; and let's obey
The proclamation made for May; 40
And sin no more, as we have done, by stay-
ing;
But, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

There's not a budding boy or girl this day
 But is got up, and gone to bring in May.
 A deal of youth, ere this, is come 45
 Back, and with white-thorn laden home.
 Some have dispatched their cakes and cream,
 Before that we have left to dream:
 And some have wept, and woo'd, and plighted
 troth,
 And chose their priest, ere we can cast off
 sloth: 50
 Many a green-gown has been given;
 Many a kiss, both odd and even:
 Many a glance, too, has been sent
 From out the eye, love's firmament;
 Many a jest told of the keys betraying 55
 This night, and locks pick'd, yet we're not a-Maying.

Come, let us go while we are in our prime;
 And take the harmless folly of the time.
 We shall grow old apace, and die
 Before we know our liberty. 60
 Our life is short, and our days run
 As fast away as does the sun:
 And, as a vapour or a drop of rain
 Once lost, can ne'er be found again,
 So when you or I are made 65
 A fable, song, or fleeting shade,
 All love, all liking, all delight
 Lies drowned with us in endless night.
 Then while time serves, and we are but decay-
 ing,
 Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying. 70

TO PRIMROSES FILLED WITH MORN- ING DEW

(From the same)

Why do ye weep, sweet babes? can tears
 Speak grief in you,
 Who were but born
 Just as the modest morn
 Teem'd her refreshing dew? 5
 Alas! you have not known that shower
 That mars a flower,
 Nor felt th' unkind
 Breath of a blasting wind,
 Nor are ye worn with years, 10
 Or warp'd as we,
 Who think it strange to see
 Such pretty flowers, like to orphans young,
 To speak by tears, before ye have a tongue.

Speak, whim'ring younglings, and make known 15

The reason why
 Ye droop and weep;
 Is it for want of sleep?
 Or childish lullaby?
 Or that ye have not seen as yet 20
 The violet?
 Or brought a kiss
 From that sweetheart to this?
 No, no, this sorrow shown
 By your tears shed 25
 Would have this lecture read:

That things of greatest, so of meanest worth,
 Conceiv'd with grief are, and with tears brought forth.

TO THE VIRGINS, TO MAKE MUCH OF TIME

(From the same)

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
 Old time is still a-flying:
 And this same flower that smiles to-day
 To-morrow will be dying.
 The glorious lamp of heaven, the Sun, 5
 The higher he's a-getting,
 The sooner will his race be run,
 And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best which is the first,
 When youth and blood are warmer; 10
 But being spent, the worse, and worst
 Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time,
 And while ye may go marry:
 For having lost but once your prime 15
 You may forever tarry.

TO DAFFODILS

(From the same)

Fair daffodils, we weep to see
 You haste away so soon;
 As yet the early-rising sun
 Has not attain'd his noon. 5
 Stay, stay,
 Until the hasting day
 Has run
 But to the evensong;
 And, having prayed together, we 10
 Will go with you along.
 We have short time to stay, as you,
 We have as short a spring;
 As quick a growth to meet decay,
 As you, or anything. 15
 We die,
 As your hours do, and dry
 Away,
 Like to the summer's rain;
 Or as the pearls of morning's dew, 20
 Ne'er to be found again.

THE HAG

(From the same)

The hag is astride
 This night for to ride,
 The devil and she together;
 Through thick and through thin, 5
 Now out and then in,
 Though ne'er so foul be the weather.
 A thorn or a burr
 She takes for a spur,
 With a lash of a bramble she rides now;

Through brakes and through briars, 10
O'er ditches and mires,
She follows the spirit that guides now.

No beast for his food
Dare now range the wood,
But hush'd in his lair he lies lurking; 15
While mischiefs, by these,
On land and on seas,
At noon of night are a-working.

The storm will arise
And trouble the skies; 20
This night, and more for the wonder,
The ghost from the tomb
Affrighted shall come,
Call'd out by the clap of the thunder.

A THANKSGIVING TO GOD, FOR HIS HOUSE

Lord, thou hast given me a cell,
Wherein to dwell;
A little house, whose humble roof
Is weather proof; 5
Under the spars of which I lie
Both soft and dry;
Where thou, my chamber for to ward,
Hast set a guard
Of harmless thoughts, to watch and keep Me, while I sleep. 10
Low is my porch, as is my fate;
Both void of state;
And yet the threshold of my door
Is worn by th' poor,
Who thither come, and freely get 15
Good words, or meat.
Like as my parlour, so my hall
And kitchen's small;
A little buttery, and therein 20
A little bin,
Which keeps my little loaf of bread
Unchipt, unfead;<sup>1</sup>
Some brittle sticks of thorn or briar
Make me a fire, 25
Close by whose living coal I sit,
And glow like it.
Lord, I confess too, when I dine,
The pulse is thine
And all those other bits that be 30
There placed by thee;
The worts,<sup>2</sup> the purslane,<sup>3</sup> and the mess
Of water-cress,
Which of thy kindness thou hast sent;
And my content 35
Makes those, and my beloved beet,
To be more sweet.
'Tis thou that crown'st my glittering hearth
With guiltless mirth,
And giv'st me wassail bowls to drink, 40
Spiced to the brink.
Lord, 'tis thy plenty-dropping hand
That soils my land,

And giv'st me, for my bushel sown,
Twice ten for one;
Thou mak'st my teeming hen to lay 41
Her egg each day;
Besides, my healthful ewes to bear
Me twins each year;
The while the conduits of my kine
Run cream for wine; 50
All these, and better, thou dost send Me, to this end,—
That I should render for my part,
A thankful heart;
Which, fired with incense, I resign, 55
As wholly thine;
—But the acceptance, that must be,
My Christ, by Thee.

HIS GRANGE, OR PRIVATE WEALTH

Though clock,
To tell how night draws hence, I've none,
A cock
I have to sing how day draws on: 5
I have
A maid, my Prue,<sup>1</sup> by good luck sent,
'To save
That little, Fates me gave or lent.
A hen 10
I keep, which, creaking day by day,
'Tells when
She goes her long white egg to lay:
A goose
I have, which, with a jealous ear,
Lets loose 15
Her tongue, to tell what danger's near.
A lamb
I keep, tame, with my morsels fed,
Whose dam
An orphan left him, lately dead: 20
A cat
I keep, that plays about my house,
Grown fat
With eating many a miching<sup>2</sup> mouse:
To these 25
A Trasy<sup>3</sup> I do keep, whereby
I please
The more my rural privacy:
Which are:
But toys, to give my heart some ease:— 30
Where care
None is, slight things do lightly please

ORSAMES' SONG

(From Aglaura, acted 1637)

Why so pale and wan, fond lover?
Prithee, why so pale?
Will, when looking well can't move her,
Looking ill prevail?
Prithee, why so pale? 5

<sup>2</sup> Vegetables, such as cabbage, turnips, etc. <sup>3</sup> Salad.

Why so dull and mute, young sinner?
 Prithee, why so mute?
 Will, when speaking well can't win her,
 Saying nothing do't?
 Prithee, why so mute? 10

Quit, quit, for shame, this will not move:
 This cannot take her.
 If of herself she will not love,
 Nothing can make her:
 The devil take her! 15

TO LUCASTA, ON GOING TO THE WARS

(From Lucasta, 1649)

Tell me not, sweet, I am unkind,
 That from the nunnery
 Of thy chaste breast and quiet mind
 To war and arms I fly.

True, a new mistress now I chase, 5
 The first foe in the field,
 And with a stronger faith embrace
 A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such 10
 As you, too, shall adore,—
 I could not love thee, dear, so much,
 Loved I not honour more.

TO ALTHEA FROM PRISON<sup>1</sup>

(From the same)

When Love with unconfined wings
 Hovers within my gates,
 And my divine Althea brings
 To whisper at the grates;
 When I lie tangled in her hair,
 And fettered to her eye,
 The birds that wanton in the air
 Know no such liberty.

When flowing cups run swiftly round
 With no allaying Thames,
 Our careless heads with roses bound,
 Our hearts with loyal flames;
 When thirsty grief in wine we steep
 When healths and draughts go free,
 Fishes that tipple in the deep
 Know no such liberty.

When, like committed linnets, I
 With shriller throat shall sing
 The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
 And glories of my King;
 When I shall voice aloud, how good
 He is, how great should be,
 Enlarged winds that curl the flood
 Know no such liberty.

<sup>1</sup> Composed in 1642 during the poet's confinement in the Gatehouse at Westminster, for his advocacy of the royal cause.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
 Nor iron bars a cage;
 Minds innocent and quiet take
 That for an hermitage;
 If I have freedom in my love,
 And in my soul am free,
 Angels alone, that soar above,
 Enjoy such liberty.

BURTON TELLS WHY HE WRITES UNDER THE NAME OF DEMOCRITUS JUNIOR

(From the Anatomy of Melancholy, 1621)

Democritus,<sup>1</sup> as he is described by Hippocrates,<sup>2</sup> and Laertius,<sup>3</sup> was a little wearish<sup>4</sup> old man, very melancholy by nature, averse from company in his latter days, and much given to solitariness, a famous Philosopher in his age, coevus with Socrates, wholly addicted to his studies at the last, and to a private life, writ many excellent works, a great Divine, according to the divinity of those times, an expert Physician, a Politician, an excellent Mathematician, as Diacosmus and the rest of his works do witness. He was much delighted with the studies of Husbandry, saith Columella,<sup>5</sup> and often I find him cited by Constantinus and others, treating of that subject. He knew the natures, differences of all beasts, plants, fishes, birds; and, as some say, could understand the tunes and voices of them. In a word, he was omnifariam doctus, a general scholar, a great student; and to the intent he might better contemplate, I find it related by some, that he put out his eyes, and was in his old age voluntarily blind, yet saw more than all Greece besides, and writ of every subject, Nihil in toto 15 opificio naturæ de quo non scripsit.<sup>6</sup> A man of an excellent wit, profound conceit; and to attain knowledge the better in his younger

<sup>1</sup> Democritus (c. 460-c. 357 B. C.) was a Greek philosopher, traveller, and author. He is supposed to have gained his title, "The Laughing Philosopher," from the humorous delight he took in watching the follies of other men. Burton called himself Democritus Junior, because he believed that he resembled the elder Democritus in disposition;—at least in some particulars. Hence, in describing "The Laughing Philosopher," Burton is also giving us a glimpse into the peculiarities of his own character and humors.

<sup>5</sup> A Roman writer on agriculture, who was born in Spain about the beginning of the Christian era.

<sup>6</sup> There was nothing in the entire workings of nature that he did not write about.

years, he travelled to Egypt and Athens, to confer with learned men, admired of some, despised of others. After a wandering life, he settled at Abdera, a town in Thrace, and was sent for thither to be their Law-maker, Recorder or Town-clerk as some will; or as others, he was there bred and born. Howsoever it was, there he lived at last in a garden in the suburbs, wholly betaking himself to his studies, and a private life, saving that sometimes he would walk down to the haven, and laugh heartily at such variety of ridiculous objects, which there he saw.<sup>7</sup> Such a one was Democritus.

But in the mean time, how doth this concern me, or upon what reference do I usurp his habit? I confess that indeed to compare myself to him for aught I have yet said, were both impudency and arrogancy, I do not presume to make any parallel. Antistat mihi millibus trecentis, parvus sum, nullus sum, altum nec spiro, nec spero.<sup>8</sup> Yet thus much I will say of myself, and that I hope without all suspicion of pride, or self conceit, I have lived a silent, sedentary, solitary, private life, mihi and musis<sup>9</sup> in the University as long almost as Xenocrates in Athens, ad senectam fere,<sup>10</sup> to learn wisdom as he did, penned up most part in my study. For I have been brought up a student in the most flourishing College of Europe, augustissimo collegio, and can brag with Jovius,<sup>11</sup> almost, in ea luce domicilii Vaticani, totius orbis celeberrimi, per 37 annos multa opportunaque didici,<sup>12</sup> for 30 years I have continued (having the use of as good Libraries as ever he had) a scholar, and would be therefore loth, either by living as a drone, to be an unprofitable or unworthy a Member of so learned and noble a society, or to write that which should be any way dishonourable to such a royal and ample foundation. Something I have done, though by my profession a Divine, yet turbine raptus ingenii,<sup>13</sup> as he said, out of a running wit, an unconstant, unsettled mind, I had a great desire (not able to attain to a superficial skill in any), to have some smattering in all, to be aliquis in omnibus, nullus in singulis,<sup>14</sup> which

Plato commends, out of him Lipsius<sup>15</sup> approves and furthers, as fit to be imprinted in all curious wits, not be a slave of one science, or dwell altogether in one subject as most do, but to rove abroad, centum puer artium,<sup>16</sup> to have an oar in every man's boat, to taste of every dish, and sip of every cup, which saith Montaigne, was well performed by Aristotle and his<sup>17</sup> learned countryman Adrian Turnebus. This roving humour (though not with like success) I have ever had, and like a ranging spaniel, that barks at every bird he sees, leaving his game, I have followed all, saving that which I should, and may justly complain, and truly, qui ubique est, nusquam est,<sup>18</sup> which Gesner<sup>19</sup> did in modesty, that I have read many books, but to little purpose, for want of good method, I have confusedly tumbled over divers authors in our Libraries, with small profit for want of art, order, memory, judgement. I never travelled but in Map or Card, in which my unconfined thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especially delighted with the study of Cosmography. Saturn was the lord of my geniture,<sup>20</sup> culminating, etc., and Mars principal significator of manners, in partile conjunction with mine Ascendant; both fortunate in their houses, etc. I am not poor, I am not rich; nihil est, nihil deest,<sup>21</sup> I have little, I want nothing; all my treasure is in Minerva's tower. Greater preferment as I could never get, so am I not in debt for it, I have a competency (Laus Deo) from my noble and munificent Patrons, though I live still a Collegiate student, as Democritus in his garden, and lead a monastick life, ipse mihi theatrum,<sup>22</sup> sequestered from those tumults and troubles of the world, et tanquam in specula positus,<sup>23</sup> (as he said) in some high place above you all, like Stoicus Sapiens, omnia secula, praeclerita presentiaque videns, uno velut intuitu,<sup>24</sup> I hear and see what is done abroad, how

<sup>19</sup> Konrad von Gesner (1516–1565), a Swiss naturalist and scholar, who was professor first of Greek and afterwards of physics.

<sup>20</sup> According to the old pseudo-science of Astrology, the character and destiny of a person was determined by the position of the planets at the time of his birth. In Burton's time even learned men still believed in the influence of the stars on human affairs. Burton tells us that he was born when Saturn and Mars were in partile (exact) conjunction. One born under the influence of Saturn was supposed to have a saturnine (grave, or gloomy) disposition.

REMEDIES AGAINST DISCONTENTS

(From the same)

Discontents and grievances are either general or particular; general are wars, plagues, dearths, famine, fires, inundations, unseasonable weather, epidemical diseases, which afflict whole Kingdoms, Territories, Cities: or peculiar to private men, as cares, crosses, losses, death of friends, poverty, want, sickness, orbities,<sup>1</sup> injuries, abuses, etc. generally all discontent, homines quatimur fortune salo:<sup>2</sup> no condition free; quisque suos patimur manes.<sup>3</sup> Even in the midst of our mirth and jollity, there is some grudging, some complaint; as he saith, our whole life is a glucupicion, a bitter sweet passion, honey and gall mixt together, we are all miserable and discontent; who can deny it? If all, and that it be a common calamity, an inevitable necessity, all distressed, then as Cardan<sup>4</sup> infers, who art thou that hopest to go free? Why dost thou not grieve thou art a mortal man, and not governor of the world? Ferre quam sortem patiuntur omnes, Nemo recuset! If it be common to all, why should one man be more disquieted than another? If thou alone wert distressed, it were indeed more irksome, and less to be indured; but, when the calamity is common, comfort thyself with this, thou hast more fellows, Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris,<sup>5</sup> 'tis not thy sole case, and why shouldst thou be so impatient? I, but, alas! we are more miserable than others; what shall we do? Besides private miseries, we live in perpetual fear, and danger of common enemies: we have Bellona's whips, and pitiful outcries, for Epithalamiums; for pleasant Musick, that fearful noise of Ordinance, Drums, and warlike Trumpets, still sounding in our ears: instead of nuptial Torches we have firing of Towns and Cities: for triumphs lamentations; for joy, tears. So it is, and so it was, and ever will be. He that refuseth to see and hear, to suffer this, is not fit to live in this world, and knows not the common condition of all men to whom, so long as they live, with a reciprocal course, joys and sorrows are annexed, and succeed one another. It is inevitable, it may not be avoided, and why then should'st thou be so much troubled? Grave nihil est homini quod fert necessitas,<sup>6</sup> as Tully deems out of an old Poet, that which is necessary cannot be grievous. If it be so, then comfort thyself in this, that, whether thou wilt or no, it must be endured: make a virtue of necessity, and conform thyself to undergo it. Si longa est, levius est; si gravis est, brevis est; if it be long, 'tis light; if grievous, it cannot last; it will away with time will wear it out, custom will ease it, oblivion is a common medicine for all losses, injuries, griefs, and detriments whatsoever, and when they are once past, this commodity comes of infelicity, it makes the rest of our life sweeter unto us: atque haec olim meminisse juvabit,<sup>8</sup> the privation and want of a thing many times makes it more pleasant and delightsome than before it was. We must not think, the happiest of us all, to escape here without some misfortunes,

Whatsoever is under the Moon is subject to corruption, alteration; and, so long as thou livest upon the earth, look not for other. Thou shalt not here find peaceable and cheerful days, quiet times, but rather clouds, storms, calumnies; such is our fate. . . .

Yea, but thou thinkest thou art more miserable than the rest, other men are happy in respect of thee, their miseries are but flea-bittings to thine, thou alone art unhappy, none so bad as thyself. Yet if, as Socrates said, all the men in the world should come and bring their grievances together, of body, mind, fortune, sores, ulcers, madness, epilepsies, agues, and all those common calamities of beggary, want, servitude, imprisonment, and lay them on a heap to be equally divided, wouldst thou share alike, and take thy portion, or be as thou art? Without question thou wouldst be as thou art. If some Jupiter should say, to give us all content,

<sup>8</sup> And moreover it will delight us to remember these things in time to come.

<sup>9</sup> All the way along there is no true pleasure. Some trouble intrudes upon our joys.

"Jam faciam, quod vultis; eris tu, qui modo miles,
Mercator; tu, consultus modo, rusticus; hinc vos,
Vos hinc mutatis discedite partibus; eia!
Quid statis? nolint."

Well, be 't so then: you, master soldier,
Shall be a merchant; you, sir lawyer,
A country gentleman; go you to this,
That side you; why stand ye? It's well as 'tis.

Every man knows his own, but not others' defects and miseries; and 'tis the nature of all men still to reflect upon themselves, their own misfortunes, not to examine or consider other men's, not to confer themselves with others: to recount their miseries, but not their good gifts, fortunes, benefits, which they have, to ruminate on their adversity, but not once to think on their prosperity, not what they have, but what they want: to look still on them that go before, but not on those infinite numbers that come after. Whereas many a man would think himself in heaven, a petty Prince, if he had but the least part of that fortune which thou so much reapest at, abhorrest, and accountest a most vile and wretched estate. How many thousands want that which thou hast! how many myriads of poor slaves, captives, of such as work day and night in coal-pits, tin-mines, with sore toil to maintain a poor living, of such as labour in body and mind, live in extreme anguish, and pain, all which thou art free from! O fortunatos nimium bona si sua norint!<sup>10</sup> Thou art most happy if thou couldst be content, and acknowledge thy happiness. . . .

Be content and rest satisfied, for thou art well in respect of others; be thankful for that thou hast, that God hath done for thee; he hath not made thee a monster, a beast, a base creature, as he might, but a man, a Christian, such a man; consider aright of it, thou art full well as thou art. . . .

Our life is but short, a very dream, and while we look about, immortalitas adest, eternity is at hand: our life is a pilgrimage on earth, which wise men pass with great alacrity. If thou be in woe, sorrow, want, distress, in pain, or sickness, think of that of our Apostle, God chastiseth them whom He loveth. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Psal. 126, 6. As the furnace proveth the potter's vessel, so doth temptation try men's thoughts, Eccl. 27, 5; 'tis for thy good, periisses nisi periisses: hadst thou not been so visited, thou hadst been utterly undone; as men are tried in adversity, so men are tried in adversity, . . .

We are sent as so many soldiers into this world, to strive with it, the flesh, the devil; our life is a warfare, and who knows it not? Non est ad astra mollis e terris via:<sup>11</sup> and therefore, peradventure, this world here is made troublesome unto us, that, as Gregory notes, we should not be delighted by the way, and forget whither we are going. . . .

Go on then merrily to heaven. If the way be troublesome, and you in misery, in many grievances, on the other side you have many pleasant sports, objects, sweet smells, delightful tastes, musick, meats, herbs, flowers, etc. to recreate your senses. Or put case thou art now forsaken of the world, dejected, contemned, yet comfort thyself, as it was said to Hagar in the wilderness, God sees thee, he takes notice of thee: there is a God above that can vindicate thy cause, that can relieve thee. And surely Seneca thinks he takes delight in seeing thee. The gods are well pleased when they see great men contending with adversity, as we are to see men fight, or a man with a beast. But these are toys in respect. Behold, saith he, a spectacle worthy of God: a good man contented with his estate. A tyrant is the best sacrifice to Jupiter, as the ancients held, and his best object a contented mind. For thy part then rest satisfied, cast all thy care on him, thy burden on him, rely on him, trust on him, and he shall nourish thee, care for thee, give thee thine heart's desire; say with David, God is our hope and strength, in troubles ready to be found, Psal. 46, 1. For they that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Sion, which cannot be removed, Psal. 125, 1, 2. As the mountains are about Jerusalem, so is the Lord about his people, henceforth and forever.

A FAIR AND HAPPY MILKMAID

(From Characters, 1614)

A fair and happy milkmaid is a country wench that is so far from making herself beautiful by art, that one look of hers is able to put all face-physic out of countenance. She knows a fair look is but a dumb orator, to commend virtue, therefore minds it not. All her excellencies stand in her so silently, as if they had stolen upon her without her knowledge. The lining of her apparel which is herself, is far better than outsides of tissue; for though she be not arrayed in the spoil of the silk-worm, she is decked in innocency, a far better wearing. She doth not, with lying long abed, spoil both her complexion and conditions: nature hath taught her, too immoderate sleep is rust to the soul: she rises, therefore with chancicleer, her Dame's cock, and at night makes the lamb her curfew. The golden ears of corn fall and kiss her feet when she reaps them, as if they wished to be bound and led prisoners by the same hand that felled them. Her breath is her own, which scents all the year long of June, like a new-made haycock. She makes her hand hard with labour, and her heart soft with pity; and when winters evenings fall early (sitting at her merry wheel) she sings a defiance to the giddy wheel of fortune. She doth all things with so sweet a grace, it seems ignorance will not suffer her to do ill, being her mind is to do well. She bestows her year's wages at next fair, and in choosing her garments counts no bravery i' the world like decency. The garden and bee-hive are all her physick and chirurgery, and she lives the longer for it. She dares go alone and unfold sheep in the night, and fears no manner of ill because she means none; yet to say truth, she is never alone, for she is still accompanied with old songs, honest thoughts, and prayers, but short ones, yet they have their efficacy, in that they are not palled with ensuing idle cogitations. Thus lives she, and all her care is she may die in the Spring time, to have store of flowers stuck upon her winding sheet.

WAR

In the nature of man, we find three principal causes of quarrel. First, competition; secondly, diffidence;<sup>2</sup> thirdly, glory. The first maketh men invade for gain, the second for safety, and the third for reputation. The first use violence, to make themselves masters of other men's persons, wives, children, and cattle; the second, to defend them; the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, a different opinion, and any other sign of undervalue, either direct in their persons, or by reflection in their kindred, their friends, their nation, their profession, or their name.

Hereby it is manifest that during the time 5 men live without a common power to keep them all in awe, they are in that condition which is called war; and such a war, as is of every man, against every man. For "war" consisteth not in battle only, or in the act of fighting; but in a tract of time wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known: and therefore the notion of "time" is to be considered in the nature of war, as it is in the nature of weather. For as the nature of foul 15 weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together; so the nature of war consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is "peace."

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of war, where every man is enemy to every man, the same is consequent to the time wherein men live without other security than 25 what their own strength and their own invention shall furnish them withal. In such condition there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain, and consequently no culture of the earth; no navigation, nor use of the commodities that may be imported by sea; no commodious building; no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force; no knowledge of the face of the earth; no account of time; no arts; no letters; 35 no society; and, which is worst of all, continual fear and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short.

It may seem strange to some man that has 40 not well weighed these things, that Nature should dissociate and render men apt to invade and destroy one another; and he may therefore, not trusting to this inference, made from the passions, desire perhaps to have the same confirmed by experience. Let him therefore consider with himself, when taking a journey, he arms himself, and seeks to go well accompanied; when going to sleep, he locks his doors; when even in his house, he locks his chest; and this when he knows there be laws, and public officers, armed to revenge all injuries shall be done him; what opinion he has of his fellow subjects when he rides armed; of his fellow-citizens when he locks his doors; and of his 55 children and servants when he locks his chests. Does he not there as much accuse mankind by his actions, as I do by my words? But neither of us accuse man's nature in it. The desires and other passions of man are in themselves no sin. No more are the actions that proceed from those passions, till they know a law that forbids them; which till laws be made they cannot know, nor can any law be made till they have agreed upon the person that shall make it.

It may peradventure be thought there was never such a time nor condition of war as this; and I believe it was never generally so over all the world, but there are many places where they live so now. For the savage people in 10 many places in America, except the government of small families, the concord whereof dependeth upon natural lust, have no government at all, and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before. Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be where there were no common power to fear by the manner of life which men that have formerly lived under a peaceful government, used to degenerate into a civil war.

But though there had never been any time wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another; yet in all times kings and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies 25 and in the state and posture of gladiators; having their weapons pointing, and their eyes fixed on one another; that is, their forts, garrisons, and guns upon the frontiers of their kingdoms; and continual spies upon their 30 neighbours; which is a posture of war. But because they uphold thereby the industry of their subjects, there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the liberty of particular men.

To this war of every man, against every man, this also is consequent—that nothing can be unjust. The notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, have there no place. Where there is no common power, there is no 40 law; where no law, no injustice. Force and fraud are in war the two cardinal virtues. Justice and injustice are none of the faculties neither of the body nor mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the 45 world, as well as his senses and passions. They are qualities that relate to men in society, not in solitude. It is consequent also to the same condition, that there be no propriety, no dominion, no “mine” and “thine” distinct; but only 50 that to be every man’s that he can get, and for so long as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition which man by mere nature is actually placed in; though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the passions, 55 partly in his reason.

The passions that incline men to peace, are fear of death; desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living; and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggesteth convenient articles of peace, upon which men may be drawn to agreement.

HAWKING, HUNTING, AND FISHING<sup>1</sup>

(From The Complete Angler, fifth ed. 1676)

PISCATOR. You are well overtaken, gentlemen, a good morning to you both; I have stretched my legs up Tottenham Hill to overtake you, hoping your business may occasion you towards Ware, whither I am going this fine, fresh May morning.

VENATOR. Sir, I, for my part, shall almost 20 answer your hopes; for my purpose is to drink my morning’s draught at the Thatched House in Hoddesden; and I think not to rest till I come thither, where I have appointed a friend or two to meet me: but for this gentleman that 25 you see with me, I know not how far he intends his journey; he came so lately into my company, that I have scarce had time to ask him the question.

AUCEPS. Sir, I shall by your favour, bear 30 you company as far as Theobald’s; and there leave you, for then I turn up to a friend’s house who mews a hawk for me,<sup>2</sup> which I now long to see.

VEN. Sir, we are all so happy as to have a 35 fine, fresh, cool morning, and I hope we shall each be the happier in the other’s company. And, gentlemen, that I may not lose yours, I shall either abate or amend my pace to enjoy it; knowing that, as the Italians say, “Good company in a journey makes the way to seem the shorter.”

AUC. It may do so, Sir, with the help of good discourse, which, methinks we may promise from you that both look and speak so cheerfully; and, for my part, I promise you as an invitation to it, that I will be as free and openhearted as discretion will allow me to be with strangers.

VEN. And, Sir, I promise the like.

PISC. I am right glad to hear your answers:

<sup>1</sup> This conversation is between Piscator (the fisherman), Venator (the hunter), and Auceps (the fowler, or bird-catcher). These representatives of three kinds of sport, met near Tottenham, a town some five miles north of London. They then appear to have taken the main road toward Ware, a town on the river Lea, some fifteen or twenty miles north of Tottenham. The Thatched House on the Ware road, lay directly in their route: Theobald’s was a magnificent country-seat, about six miles north of Tottenham.

and in confidence you speak the truth, I shall put on a boldness to ask you, Sir, whether business or pleasure caused you to be so early up, and walk so fast; for this other gentleman hath declared he is going to see a hawk that a friend mews for him.

VEN. Sir, mine is a mixture of both, a little business and more pleasure: for I intend this day to do all my business, and then bestow another day or two in hunting the otter, which, a friend, that I go to meet, tells me, is much pleasanter than any other chase whatsoever: howsoever I mean to try it; for to-morrow morning we shall meet a pack of otter-dogs of noble Mr. Sadler's,<sup>3</sup> upon Amwell Hill,<sup>4</sup> who will be there so early, that they intend to prevent<sup>5</sup> the sun rising.

Pisc. Sir, my fortune has answered my desires; and my purpose is to bestow a day or two in helping to destroy some of those villainous vermin; for I hate them perfectly, because they love fish so well, or rather, because they destroy so much; indeed, so much, that, in my judgment all men that keep otter-dogs ought to have pensions from the King to encourage them to destroy the very breed of those base otters, they do so much mischief.

VEN. But what say you to the foxes of the nation? Would not you as willingly have them destroyed? for doubtless they do as much mischief as otters do.

Pisc. Oh, Sir, if they do, it is not so much to me and my fraternity as those base vermin the otters do.

Auc. Why, Sir, I pray, of what fraternity are you, that you are so angry with the poor otters?

Pisc. I am, Sir, a Brother of the Angle, and therefore an enemy to the otter: for you are to note that we Anglers all love one another, and therefore do I hate the otter both for my own and for their sakes who are of my brotherhood.

VEN. And I am a lover of hounds; I have followed many a pack of dogs many a mile, and heard many merry huntsmen make sport and scoff at anglers.

Auc. And I profess myself a Falconer, and have heard many grave, serious men pity them, 'tis such a heavy, contemptible, dull recreation.

Pisc. You know, gentlemen 'tis an easy thing to scoff at any art or recreation: a little wit, mixed with ill-nature, confidence, and malice, will do it; but though they often venture boldly, yet they are often caught even in their own trap, according to that of Lucian, the father of the family of scoffers.

"Lucian, well skill'd in scoffing, this hath writ: Friend, that's your folly which you think your wit: This you vent oft, void both of wit and fear, Meaning another, when yourself you jeer."

If to this you add what Solomon says of scoffers, that, "they are an abomination to mankind," (Prov. xxiv. 9), let him that thinks fit, scoff on, and be a scoffer still; but I account them enemies to me, and to all that love virtue and Angling.

And for you that have heard many grave, serious men pity Anglers; let me tell you, Sir, there be many men that are by others taken to be serious and grave men, which we condemn and pity. Men that are taken to be grave, because nature hath made them of a sour complexion, money-getting men, men that spend all their time, first in getting, and next in anxious care to keep it; men that are condemned to be rich, and then always busy or discontented: for these poor-rich-men, we Anglers pity them perfectly, and stand in no need to borrow their thoughts to think ourselves so happy. No, no. Sir, we enjoy a contentedness above the reach of such dispositions, and as the learned and ingenious Montaigne says like himself freely, "When my cat and I entertain each other with mutual apish tricks, as playing with a garter, who knows but that I make my cat more sport than she makes me? Shall I conclude her to be simple, that has her time to begin or refuse to play as freely as I myself have? Nay, who knows but that it is a defect of my not understanding her language (for doubtless cats talk and reason with one another) that we agree no better? And who knows but that she pities me for being no wiser than to play with her, and laughs and censures my folly for making sport for her, when we two play together?"

Thus freely speaks Montaigne concerning cats; and I hope I may take as great a liberty to blame any man, and laugh at him too, let him be never so grave, that hath not heard what Anglers can say in the justification of their art and recreation; which I may again tell you is so full of pleasure, that we need not borrow their thoughts to think ourselves happy.

VEN. Sir, you have almost amazed me; for though I am no scoffer, yet I have, I pray let me speak it without offence, always looked upon Anglers as more patient and more simple men than I fear I shall find you to be.

Pisc. Sir, I hope you will not judge my earnestness to be impatience: and for my simplicity, if by that you mean a harmlessness, or that simplicity which was usually found in the primitive Christians, who were, as most

Anglers are, quiet men, and followers of peace, men that were so simply-wise as not to sell their consciences to buy riches, and with them vexation and a fear to die; if you mean such simple men as lived in those times when there were fewer lawyers; when men might have had a lordship safely conveyed to them in a piece of parchment no bigger than your hand, though several sheets will not do it safely in this wiser age; I say, Sir, if you take us Anglers to be such simple men as I have spoken of, then myself and those of my profession will be glad to be so understood: but if by simplicity you meant to express a general defect in those that profess and practise the excellent art of Angling I hope in time to disabuse you, and make the contrary appear so evidently, that, if you will but have patience to hear me, I shall remove all the anticipations that discourse, or time, or prejudice, have possessed you with against that laudable and ancient art; for I know it is worthy the knowledge and practice of a wise man.

But, gentlemen, though I be able to do this, I am not so unmannerly as to engross all the discourse to myself; and therefore, you two having declared yourselves, the one to be a lover of hawks, the other of hounds, I shall be most glad to hear what you can say in the commendation of that recreation which each of you love and practise; and having heard what you can say, I shall be glad to exercise your attention with what I can say concerning my own recreation and art of Angling, and by this means we shall make the way to seem the shorter: and if you like my motion, I would have Mr. Falconer to begin.

AUC. Your motion is consented to with all my heart; and, to testify it, I will begin as you have desired me.

And first for the element that I used to trade in, which is the air, an element of more worth than weight, an element that doubtless exceeds both the earth and water; for though I sometimes deal in both, yet the air is most properly mine, I and my hawks use that most, and it yields us most recreation; it stops not the high soaring of my noble, generous falcon; in it she ascends to such an height, as the dull eyes of beasts and fish are not able to reach to; their bodies are too gross for such high elevations: in the air my troops of hawks soar up on high, and when they are lost in the sight of men, then they attend upon and converse with the gods; therefore I think my eagle is so justly styled Jove's servant in ordinary: and that very falcon, that I am now going to see, deserves no meaner a title, for she usually in her flight endangers herself, like the son of Dædalus, to have her wings scorched by the sun's heat, she flies so near it, but her mettle makes her careless of danger; for she then needs nothing, but makes her nimble pinions cut the fluid air, and so makes her high way over the steepest mountains and deepest rivers, and in her glorious career looks with contempt upon those high steeples and magnificent palaces which we adore and wonder at; from which height I can make her to descend by a word from my mouth (which she both knows and obeys), to accept of meat from my hand, to own me for her master, to go home with me and be willing the next day to afford me the like recreation.

And more; this element of air which I profess to trade in, the worth of it is such, and it is of such necessity, that no creature whatsoever, not only those numerous creatures that feed on the face of the earth, but those various creatures that have their dwelling within the waters,—every creature that hath life in its nostrils stands in need of my element. The waters cannot preserve the fish without air, witness the not breaking of ice in an extreme frost: the reason is, for that if the inspiring and expiring organ of any animal be stopped, it suddenly yields to nature, and dies. Thus necessary is air to the existence both of fish and beasts, nay, even to man himself; that air, or breath of life with which God at first inspired mankind (Gen. ii. 7), he, if he wants it, dies presently, becomes a sad object to all that loved and beheld him, and in an instant turns to putrefaction.

Nay, more, the very birds of the air, those that be not hawks, are both so many and so useful and pleasant to mankind, that I must not let them pass without some observations: they both feed and refresh him: feed him with their choice bodies, and refresh him with their heavenly voices. I will not undertake to mention the several kinds of fowl by which this is done; and his curious palate pleased by day, and which with their very excrements<sup>s</sup> afford him a soft lodging at night. These I will pass by, but not those little nimble musicians of the air, that warble forth their curious ditties, with which nature hath furnished them to the shame of art.

As first, the lark, when she means to rejoice, to cheer herself and those that hear her, she then quits the earth, and sings as she ascends higher into the air; and, having ended her heavenly employment, grows then mute and sad to think she must descend to the dull earth, which she would not touch but for necessity.

How do the blackbird and thrassel<sup>7</sup> with their melodious voices bid welcome to the cheerful spring, and in their fixed mouths warble forth such ditties as no art or instrument can reach to!

Nay, the smaller birds also do the like in their particular seasons, as namely the laverock,<sup>8</sup> the titlark, the little linnet, and the honest robin, that loves mankind both alive and dead.

But the nightingale, another of my airy 10 creatures, breathes such sweet loud music out of her little instrumental throat, that it might make mankind to think miracles are not ceased. He that at midnight, when the very labourer sleeps securely, should hear, as I have 15 very often, the clear airs, the sweet descants, the natural rising and falling, the doubling and redoubling of her voice, might well be lifted above earth, and say, "Lord, what music hast thou provided for the saints in 20 heaven, when thou affordest bad men such music on earth!" . . .

VEN. Well, Sir, and I will now take my turn, and will first begin with a commendation of the earth, as you have done most excellently of 25 the air; the earth being that element upon which I drive my pleasant, wholesome, hungry trade. The earth is a solid, settled element; an element most universally beneficial both to man and beast: to men who have their several recreations upon it, as horse-races, hunting, sweet smells, pleasant walks: the earth feeds 30 man, and all those several beasts that both feed him and afford him recreation. What pleasure doth man take in hunting the stately stag, the generous buck, the wild-boar, the cunning otter, the crafty fox, and the fearful hare! And if I may descend to a lower game, what pleasure is it sometimes with gins to 35 betray the very vermin of the earth! as namely, the fitchet,<sup>9</sup> the fulimart, the ferret, the polecat, the mouldwarp,<sup>10</sup> and the like creatures that live upon the face and within the bowels of the earth! How doth the earth bring forth 40 herbs, flowers, and fruits, both for physic and the pleasure of mankind! and above all, to me at least, the fruitful vine, of which when I drink moderately it clears my brain, cheers my heart, and sharpens my wit. How could Cleopatra have feasted Mark Antony with 50 eight wild-boars roasted whole at one supper, and other meat suitable, if the earth had not been a bountiful mother? But to pass by the mighty elephant, which the earth breeds and nourisheth, and descend to the least of creatures, how doth the earth afford us a doctrinal example in the little emmet, who in the summer provides and lays up her winter provision, and 5 teaches man to do the like! The earth feeds and carries those horses that carry us. If I would be prodigal of my time and your patience, what might not I say in commendation of the earth? that puts limits to the proud and raging sea, and by that means preserves both man and beast, that it destroys them not, as we see it daily doth those that venture upon the sea, and are there shipwrecked, drowned, and left to feed haddocks; when we that are so 15 wise as to keep ourselves on earth, walk, and talk, and live, and eat, and drink, and go a hunting: of which recreation I will say a little, and then leave Mr. Piscator to the commendation of Angling.

Hunting is a game for Princes and noble persons; it hath been highly prized in all ages; it was one of the qualifications that Xenophon bestowed on his Cyrus, that he was a hunter of wild beasts. Hunting trains up the younger 20 nobility to the use of manly exercises in their riper age. What more manly exercise than hunting the wild-boar, the stag, the buck, the fox, or the hare! How doth it preserve health, and increase strength and activity!

And for the dogs that we use, who can commend their excellency to that height which they deserve? How perfect is the hound at smelling, who never leaves or forsakes his first scent, but follows it through so many 35 changes and varieties of other scents, even over and in the water, and into the earth! What music doth a pack of dogs then make to any man, whose heart and ears are so happy as to be set to the tune of such instruments! How will a right greyhound fix his eye on the best 40 buck in a herd, single him out, and follow him, and him only, through a whole herd of rascal<sup>11</sup> game, and still know and then kill him! For my hounds, I know the language of them, and they know the language and meaning of one another, as perfectly as we know the voices of those with whom we discourse daily.

I might enlarge myself in the commendation of hunting, and of the noble hound especially, 50 as also of the docibleness of dogs in general; and I might make many observations of land-creatures, that for composition, order, figure, and constitution, approach nearest to the completeness and understanding of man; especially of those creatures which Moses in the 55 law permitted to the Jews, (Lev. ix. 2-8), which have cloven hoofs and chew the cud,

<sup>9</sup> The fitchet, or fitchew, the fulimart (fumart, or foul-mart), and the polecat closely resemble each other, all belong to the same family as the martens, weasels, otters, and badgers.

which I shall forbear to name, because I will not be so uncivil to Mr. Piscator, as not to allow him a time for the commendation of angling, which he calls an art; but doubtless 'tis an easy one: and, Mr. Auceps, I doubt we shall hear a watery discourse of it, but I hope 'twill not be a long one.

AUC. And I hope so too, though I fear it will.

PISC. Gentlemen, let not prejudice pre-possess you. I confess my discourse is like to prove suitable to my recreation, calm and quiet; we seldom take the name of God into our mouths, but it is either to praise Him or pray to Him; if others use it vainly in the midst of their recreations, so vainly as if they meant to conjure, I must tell you it is neither our fault nor our custom; we protest against it. But pray remember, I accuse nobody; for as I would not make "a watery discourse," so I would not put too much vinegar into it; nor would I raise the reputation of my own art by the diminution of another's. And so much for the prologue to what I meant to say.

And now for the water, the element that I trade in. The water is the eldest daughter of the creation, the element upon which the Spirit of God did first move (Gen. i. 2), the element which God commanded to bring forth living creatures abundantly; and without which those that inhabit the land, even all creatures that have breath in their nostrils, must suddenly return to putrefaction. Moses, the great law giver, and chief philosopher, skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians, who was called the friend of God, and knew the mind of the Almighty, names this element the first in the creation; this is the element upon which the Spirit of God did first move, and is the chief ingredient in the creation: many philosophers have made it to comprehend all the other elements, and most allow it the chiefest in the mixture<sup>12</sup> of all living creatures.

There be that profess to believe that all bodies are made of water, and may be reduced back again to water only; they endeavour to demonstrate it thus:—

Take a willow, or any like speedy-growing plant, newly rooted in a box or barrel full of earth, weigh them all together exactly when the trees begin to grow, and then weigh all together after the tree is increased from its first rooting to weigh an hundred pound weight more than when it was first rooted and weighed; and you shall find this augment of the tree to be without the diminution of one drachm weight of the earth. Hence they infer this increase of wood to be from water of rain, or from dew, and not to be from any other element. And they affirm, they can reduce this wood back again to water; and they affirm, also, the same may be done in any animal or vegetable. And this I take to be a fair testimony of the excellency of my element of water.

The water is more productive than the earth.

Nay, the earth hath no fruitfulness without showers or dews; for all the herbs, and flowers and fruits, are produced and thrive by the water; and the very minerals are fed by streams that run underground, whose natural course carries them to the tops of many high mountains, as we see by several springs breaking forth on the tops of the highest hills; and this is also witnessed by the daily trial and testimony of several miners.

Nay, the increase of those creatures that are bred and fed in the water are not only more and more miraculous, but more advantageous to man, not only for the lengthening of his life, but for the preventing of sickness; 'tis observed by the most learned physicians, that the casting off of Lent and other fish days, which hath not only given the lie to so many learned, pious, wise founders of colleges, for which we should be ashamed, hath doubtless been the chief cause of those many putrid, shaking, intermitting agues, unto which this nation of ours is now more subject than those wiser countries that feed on herbs, salads, and plenty of fish; of which it is observed in story, that the greatest part of the world now do. And it may be fit to remember that Moses (Lev. xi. 9, Deut. xiv. 9) appointed fish to be the chief diet for the best commonwealth that ever yet was.

And it is observable, not only that there are fish, as namely, the whale, three times as big as the mighty elephant, that is so fierce in battle; but that the mightiest feasts have been of fish. The Romans in the height of their glory have made fish the mistress of all their entertainments; they have had music to usher in their sturgeons, lampreys,<sup>13</sup> and mullets, which they would purchase at rates rather to be wondered at than believed. He that shall view the writings of Macrobius,<sup>14</sup> or Varro,<sup>15</sup> may be confirmed and informed of this, and of the incredible value of their fish and fish-ponds.

SELECTION FROM THE LIFE OF HOOKER

(From Walton's Lives, 1665)

I return to Mr. Hooker in his college,<sup>1</sup> where he continued his studies with all quietness, for the space of three years; about which time he entered into sacred orders, being then made deacon and priest, and, not long after, was appointed to preach at St. Paul's Cross.

In order to which Sermon, to London he came, and immediately to the Shunamite's house;<sup>2</sup> which is a house so called, for that, besides the stipend paid the preacher, there is provision made also for his lodging and diet for two days before, and one day after his sermon. This house was then kept by John Churchman, sometime a draper of good note in Watling Street, upon whom poverty had at last come like an armed man, and brought him into a necessitous condition; which, though it be a punishment, is not always an argument of God's disfavor; for he was a virtuous man. I shall not yet give the like testimony of his wife, but leave the reader to judge by what follows. But to this house Mr. Hooker came so wet, so weary, and weatherbeaten, that he was never known to express more passion, than against a friend that dissuaded him from footing it to London, and for finding him no easier a horse,—supposing the horse trotted when he did not;—and at this time also, such a faintness and fear possessed him, that he would not be persuaded two days' rest and quietness, or any other means could be used to make him preach his Sunday's sermon: but a warm bed, and rest, and drink proper for a cold, given him by Mrs. Churchman, and her diligent attendance added unto it, enabled him to perform the office of the day, which was in or about the year 1581.

And in this first public appearance to the world, he was not so happy as to be free from exceptions against a point of doctrine delivered in his sermon; which was, "That in God there were two wills; an antecedent and a consequent will; his first will that all mankind should be saved; but his second will was, that those only should be saved that did live answerable to that degree of grace which he had offered or afforded them."

5 But the justifying of this doctrine did not prove of so bad consequence, as the kindness of Mrs. Churchman's curing him of his late distemper and cold; for that was so gratefully apprehended by Mr. Hooker, that he thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said: so the good man came to be persuaded by her, "that he was a man of tender constitution; and that it was best for him to have a wife, that might prove a nurse to him; such a one as might both prolong his life, and make it more comfortable; and such a one she could and would provide for him if he thought fit to marry." And he, not considering that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light;" but, like a true Nathanael, fearing no guile, because he meant none, did give her such a power as Eleazar was trusted with,—you may read it in the book of Genesis,—when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac; for even so he trusted her to choose for him, promising upon a fair summons to return to London, and accept her choice; and he did so in that, or about the year following. Now, the wife provided for him was her daughter Joan, who brought him neither beauty nor portion: and for her conditions, they were too like that wife's, which is by Solomon compared to a dripping house; so that the good man had no reason to "rejoice in the wife of his youth;" but too just cause to say with the holy prophet, "Woe is me, that I am constrained to have my habitation in the tents of Kedar."

This choice of Mr. Hooker's—if it were his choice—may be wondered at; but let us consider that the Prophet Ezekiel says, "There is a wheel within a wheel;" a secret sacred wheel of Providence,—most visible in marriages,—guided by His hand that "allows not the race to the swift" nor "bread to the wise," nor good wives to good men: and he that can bring good out of evil—for mortals are blind to this reason—only knows why this blessing was denied to patient Job, to meek Moses, and to our as meek and patient Mr. Hooker. But so it was; and let the reader cease to wonder, for affliction is a divine diet; which though it be not pleasing to mankind, yet Almighty God hath often, very often, imposed it as good, though bitter physic to those children whose souls are dearest to him.

And by this marriage the good man was drawn from the tranquility of his college; from the garden of piety, of pleasure, of peace, and a sweet conversation, into the thorny wilderness of a busy world; into those corroding cares that attend a married priest, and a country parsonage; which was Drayton-beauchamp in Buckinghamshire, not far from Aylesbury, and in the diocese of Lincoln; to which he was presented by John Cheney, Esq.,—then patron of it—the 9th of December, 1584, where he behaved himself so as to give no occasion of evil, but as St. Paul adviseth a minister of God—"in much patience, in afflictions, in anguish, in necessities, in poverty" and no doubt "in long suffering;" yet troubling no man with his discontents and wants.

About three years later (having taken holy orders in 1581) he received the appointment to preach in London to which Walton here refers.

And in this condition he continued about a year; in which time his two pupils, Edwin Sandys<sup>3</sup> and George Cranmer, took a journey to see their tutor; where they found him with a book in his hand,—it was the Odes of Horace,—he being then like humble and innocent Abel, tending his small allotment of sheep in a common field, which he told his pupils he was forced to do then, for his servant was gone home to dine, and assist his wife to do some necessary household business. But when his servant returned and released him, then his two pupils attended him unto his house, where their best entertainment was his quiet company, which was presently denied them; for Richard was called to rock the cradle; and the rest of their welcome was so like this, that they stayed but till next morning, which was time enough to discover and pity their tutor's condition; and they having in that time rejoiced in the remembrance, and then paraphrased<sup>4</sup> on the many innocent recreations of their younger days, and other like diversions, and thereby given him as much present comfort as they were able, they were forced to leave him to the company of his wife Joan, and seek themselves a quieter lodging for next night. But at their parting from him, Mr. Cranmer said, "Good tutor, I am sorry your lot is fallen in no better ground, as to your parsonage; and more sorry that your wife proves not a more comfortable companion, after you have wearied yourself in your restless studies." To whom the good man replied, "My dear George, if saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to repine at what my wise Creator hath appointed for me; but labour—as indeed I do daily—to submit mine to his will, and possess my soul in patience and peace."

(From Microcosmographie, 1628)

A Critic is one that has spelled over a great many of books, and his observation is the orthography. He is the surgeon of old authors, and heals the wounds of dust and ignorance. He converses much in fragments and Desunt multa's,<sup>2</sup> and if he piece it up with two lines, he is more proud of that book than the author. He runs over all sciences to peruse their syntaxes, and thinks all learning comprised in learning Latin. He tastes styles, as some descreeter palates do wine; and tells you which is genuine, which soplicated and bastard. His own phrase is a miscellany of old words, deceased long before the Cæsars, and entombed by Varro, and the modernest man he follows is Plautus.<sup>3</sup> He writes omneis at length, and quicquid, and his gerund is most incomformable.<sup>4</sup> He is a troublesome vexer of the dead, which after so long sparing must rise up to the judgment of his castigations. He is one that makes all books sell dearer, while he swells them into folios with his comments.

DEATH AND IMMORTALITY

(From Hydriotaphia: Urn Burial, 1658)

Now since these dead bones<sup>1</sup> have already out-lastcd the living ones of Methuselah, and in a yard underground, and thin walls of clay, out-worn all the strong and specious buildings above it; and quietly rested under the drums

<sup>1</sup> John Earle, a learned and witty man and a successful writer, was Chaplain to Charles II in exile, and after the Restoration became successively Bishop of Worcester and of Salisbury. The nature of the Microsmographie, his chief work, is suggested in its sub-title—A Piece of the World Discovered in Essays and Characters. The numerous character studies of the seventeenth century "form a link between the 'humors' of the old comedy on the one hand and the familiar essay and novel of the eighteenth century on the other." Among these "character-writers," Earle holds a foremost place.

<sup>3</sup> Plautus, one of the masters of Latin comedy, died 181 B. C. Hence he lived some time before the learned scholar and writer Varro, who died about 25 B. C. and before the Augustan Age of Latin literature,—the age of Vergil, Horace, and their great contemporaries.

<sup>1</sup> This essay was suggested by the discovery of "between forty and fifty urns" in a field of Old Walsingham, Norfolk, containing human bones, with boxes, combs, and other articles. In a preceding chapter, Browne contends that "these were the urns of Romans."

and tramlings of three conquests:<sup>2</sup> what prince can promise such diuturnity unto his relics, or might not gladly say,

Sic ego componi versus in ossa velim?<sup>3</sup>

Time which antiquates antiquities, and hath an art to make dust of all things, hath yet spared these minor monuments. In vain we hope to be known by open and visible conservatories,<sup>4</sup> when to be unknown was the means of their continuation, and obscurity their protection. If they died by violent hands, and were thrust into their urns, these bones become considerable, and some old philosophers would honour them, whose souls they conceived most pure, which were thus snatched from their bodies, and to retain a stronger propension unto them;<sup>5</sup> whereas they weariedly left a languishing corpse, and with faint desires of re-union. If they fell by long and aged decay, yet wrapt up in the bundle of time, they fall into indistinction, and make but one blot with infants. If we begin to die when we live, and long life be but a prolongation of death, our life is a sad composition; we live with death, and die not in a moment. How many pulses made up the life of Methuselah, were work for Archimedes: common counters sum up the life of Moses his man.<sup>6</sup> Our days become considerable, like petty sums, by minute accumulations; where numerous fractions make up but small round numbers; and our days of a span long, make not one little finger.<sup>7</sup>

If the nearness of our last necessity brought a nearer conformity into it, there was a happiness in hoary hairs, and no calamity in half senses. But the long habit of living indisposeth us for dying; when avarice makes us the sport of death, when even David grew politickly cruel, and Solomon could hardly be said to be the wisest of men. But many are too early old, and before the date of age. Adversity stretcheth our days, misery makes Alemena's nights,<sup>8</sup> and time hath no wings unto it. But the most tedious being is that which can unwish itself, content to be nothing or never to have been, which was beyond the mal-content of Job, who cursed not the day of his life, but his nativity; content to have so far been, as to have a title to future being, although he had lived here but in an hidden state of life, and as it were, an abortion.

What song the Syrens sang, or what name Achilles assumed when he hid himself among women, though puzzling questions, are no beyond all conjecture. What time the persons of these ossuaries<sup>9</sup> entered the famous nations of the dead, and slept with princes and counsellors, might admit a wide solution. But who were the proprietaries of these bones, or what bodies these ashes made up, were a question above antiquarism; not to be resolved by man, nor easily perhaps by spirits, except we consult the provincial guardians,<sup>10</sup> or tutelary observers. Had they made as good provision for their names, as they have done for their relics, they had not so grossly erred in the art of perpetuation. But to subsist in bones, and be but pyramidally extant, is a fallacy in duration. Vain ashes which in the oblivion of names, persons, times, and sexes, have found unto themselves a fruitless continuation, and only arise unto late posterity, as emblems of mortal vanities, antidotes against pride, vain-glory, and madding vices. Pagan vain-glories which thought the world might last forever, had encouragement for ambition; and finding no atropos<sup>11</sup> unto the immortality of their names, were never damp't with the necessity of oblivion. Even old ambitions had the advantage of ours, in the attempts of their vain-glories, who acting early, and before the probable meridian of time, have by this time found great accomplishment of their designs, whereby the ancient heroes have already out-lasted their monuments, and mechanical preservations. But in this latter scene of time, we cannot expect such mummies unto our memories, when ambition may fear the prophecy of Elias,<sup>12</sup> and Charles the Fifth can never hope to live within two Methuselabs of Hector.

<sup>12</sup> i. e., of the prophet Elijah, called Elias in the New Testament. The prophecy was, that the world was to last but six thousand years. The world would thus come to an end in 2000 A. D. Should this prophecy be fulfilled, Charles V., who died in 1558, could not possibly be remembered more than 442 years, while Hector (assuming his death to have taken place about 1100 or 1200 B. C.) had been already remembered some 2700 or 2800 years when Browne wrote. Therefore in 1658, the date of Browne's essay, Hector's fame had already exceeded the greatest possible duration of that of Charles V. by over two thousand years, or by more than double the length of Methuselah's life (two Methuselabs), which would be only 1938 years. According to a passage in the Talmud, the tradition of this prophecy was handed down "by the house" (i. e. the disciples or school) of Elijah.

<sup>6</sup> i. e., Moses's man. The average length of man's life as estimated by Moses (Pslm. xc. 10) is but seventy or eighty years, hence while it would take a great mathematician (an Archimedes) to calculate the number of pulses, or heart-beats in the life of Methuselah, ordinary reckoners can readily sum up the short span of man's life according to Moses's computation.

<sup>8</sup> In the story of Alemena, Jupiter delays the rising of Phoebus, and makes one night as long as three.

And therefore, restless inquietude for the diuturnity of our memories unto present consideration seems a vanity almost out of date, and superannuated piece of folly. We cannot hope to live so long in our names, as some have done in their persons. One face of Janus<sup>13</sup> holds no proportion unto the other. 'Tis too late to be ambitious. The great mutations of the world are acted, or time may be too short for our designs. To extend our memories by monuments, whose death we daily pray for, and whose duration we cannot hope, without injury to our expectations in the advent of the last day, were a contradiction to our beliefs. We whose generations are ordained in this setting part of time, are providentially taken off from such imaginations; and, being necessitated to eye the remaining particle of futurity, are naturally constituted unto thoughts of the next world, and cannot excusably decline the consideration of that duration, which maketh pyramids pillars of snow, and all that's past a moment.

Circles and right lines limit and close all bodies, and the mortal right lined circle<sup>14</sup> must conclude and shut up all. There is no antidote against the opium of time, which temporally considereth all things: our fathers find their graves in our short memories, and sadly tell us how we may be buried in our survivors. Grave-stones tell truth scarce forty years. Generations pass while some trees stand, and old families last not three oaks. To be read by bare inscriptions like many in Gruter,<sup>15</sup> to hope for eternity by enigmatical epithets or first letters of our names, to be studied by antiquaries, who we were, and have new names given us like many of the mummies, are cold consolations unto the students of perpetuity, even by everlasting languages.

To be content that times to come should only know there was such a man, not caring whether they know more of him, was a frigid ambition in Cardan,<sup>16</sup> disparaging his horoscopol inclina-

<sup>13</sup> Janus, the Roman god of beginnings, and hence especially associated with gates and other places of entrance. He was represented with two faces, looking in different directions, possibly because at the moment of beginning we naturally look backward to what is ended and forward to what is to come. Browne (adopting this interpretation) declares that the face of Janus which looks forward to the future, is out of all proportion to the face which looks towards the past; i. e. that the world's past will greatly exceed its future, the larger part of the six thousand years being already spent.

<sup>14</sup> I. e., the Greek letter theta,  $\Theta$ , the symbol of death. Among the Greeks, when a man's fate was decided by vote, those in favor of his death marked their ballots with the letter  $\Theta$ , that being the first letter of the word θάνατος or death. The fatal letter thus came to be a sign of death, and as such is found on Roman grave-stones.

tion and judgment of himself. Who cares to subsist like Hippocrates's patients, or Achilles's horses in Homer, under naked nominations, without deserts and noble acts, which are the balsam of our memories, the entelechia<sup>17</sup> and soul of our subsistences? To be nameless in worthy deeds, exceeds an infamous history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name, than Herodias with one. And who had not rather have been the good thief, than Pilate?

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the temple of Diana, he is almost lost that built it. Time hath spared the epitaph of Adrian's horse,<sup>18</sup> confounded that of himself. In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad have equal durations, and Thersites is like to live as long as Agamemnon. Who knows whether the best of men be known, or whether there be not more remarkable persons forgot, than any that stand remembered in the known account of time? Without the favour of the everlasting register, the first man had been as unknown as the last, and Methusaleh's long life had been his only chronicle.

Oblivion is not to be hired. The greater part must be content to be as though they had not been, to be found in the register of God, not in the record of man. Twenty-seven names make up the first story before the flood, and the recorded names ever since contain not one living century. The number of the dead long exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the equinox? Every hour adds unto that current arithmetick, which scarce stands one moment. And since death must be the Lucina<sup>19</sup> of life, and even Pagans could doubt, the 16th century. The reference is to a sentence in his autobiography, which may be translated as follows: "I wish to be known because I am, I do not require that I should be known as I am."

<sup>17</sup> Entelechy, the complete realization, or full expression of a thing. Here, our noble acts are regarded as the entelechia, the perfect, or essential, part of our subsistence, or remembrance upon earth.

<sup>18</sup> The historian Dion Cassius, after commenting on the delight which the Emperor Hadrian (Adrian) took in hunting, adds: "What he [Hadrian] did for a horse called Baristhenes, which he commonly used for hunting, may let us see how far the excess of this passion carried him, since when he died he raised him a monument in the form of a pillar, on which he engraved his epitaph." Hadrian was buried in a splendid mausoleum on the bank of the Tiber. There is an inscription to him in the interior of the tomb, which was not explored until 1825, so that his epitaph was not eventually confounded by time, as was the case when Browne wrote.

whether thus to live were to die; since our longest sun sets at right descensions,<sup>20</sup> and makes but winter arches, and therefore it cannot be long before we lie down in darkness, and have our light in ashes;<sup>21</sup> since the brother of death daily haunts us with dying mementos, and time that grows old in itself, bids us hope no long duration;—diuturnity is a dream and folly of expectation.

Darkness and light divide the course of time, and oblivion shares with memory a great part even of our living beings; we slightly remember our felicities, and the smartest strokes of affliction leave but short smart upon us. Sense endureth no extremities, and sorrows destroy us or themselves. To weep into stones are fables. Afflictions induce callosities; miseries are slippery, or fall like snow upon us, which notwithstanding is no unhappy stupidity. To be ignorant of evils to come, and forgetful of evils past, is a merciful provision in nature, whereby we digest the mixture of our few and evil days, and, our delivered senses not relapsing into cutting remembrances, our sorrows are not kept raw by the edge of repetitions. A great part of antiquity contented their hopes of subsistency with a transmigration of their souls,—a good way to continue their memories, while, having the advantage of plural successions, they could not but act something remarkable in such variety of beings, and enjoying the fame of their passed selves, make accumulation of glory unto their last durations. Others, rather than be lost in the uncomfortable night of nothing, were content to recede into the common being, and make one particle of the public soul of all things, which was no more than to return into their unknown and divine original again. Egyptian ingenuity was more unsatisfied, contriving their bodies in sweet consistencies,<sup>22</sup> to attend the return of their souls. But all was vanity, feeding the wind, and folly. The Egyptian mummies, which Cambyes or time hath spared, avarice now consumeth. Mummy is become merchandise,<sup>23</sup> Mizraim cures wounds, and Pharaoh is sold for balsams.

In vain do individuals hope for immortality, or any patent from oblivion, in preservations below the moon: men have been deceived even in their flatteries, above the sun, and studied conceits to perpetuate their names in heaven. The various cosmography of that part hath already varied the names of contrived constellations; Nimrod is lost in Orion, and Osyris in the dog-star. While we look for incorruption in the heavens, we find they are but like the earth;—durable in their main bodies, alterable in their parts; whereof, beside comets and new stars, perspectives<sup>24</sup> begin to tell tales, and the spots that wander about the sun, with Phaeton's favour would make clear conviction.

There is nothing strictly immortal, but immortality. Whatever hath no beginning, may be confident of no end;—which is the peculiar of that necessary essence that cannot destroy itself;—and the highest strain of omnipotency to be so powerfully constituted as not to suffer even from the power of itself: all others have a dependent being and within the reach of destruction. But the sufficiency of Christian immortality frustrates all earthly glory, and the quality of either state after death, makes a folly of posthumous memory. God who can only destroy our souls, and hath assured our resurrection, either of our bodies or names hath directly promised no duration. Wherein there is so much of chance, that the boldest expectants have found unhappy frustration; and to hold long subsistence, seems but a scape in oblivion. But man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave, solemnising nativities and deaths with equal lustre, notwithstanding ceremonies of bravery in the infamy<sup>25</sup> of his nature.

Life is a pure flame, and we live by an invisible sun within us. A small fire sufficeth for life, great flames seemed too little after death, while men vainly affected precious pyres, and to burn like Sardanapalus; but the wisdom of funeral laws found the folly of prodigal blazes, and reduced undoing fires unto the rule of sober obsequies, wherein few could be so mean as not to provide wood, pitch, a mourner, and an urn.

Five languages secured not the epitaph of Gordianus.<sup>26</sup> The man of God<sup>27</sup> lives longer without a tomb than any by one, invisibly interred by angels, and adjudged to obscurity, though not without some marks directing human discovery. Enoch and Elias, without either tomb or burial, in an anomalous state of being, are the great examples of perpetuity, in their long and living memory, in strict account being still on this side death, and having a late part yet to act upon this stage of earth. If in the decreitory term of the world we shall not all die but be changed, according to received translation, the last day will make but few graves; at least quick resurrections will anticipate lasting sepultures. Some graves will be opened before they be quite closed, and Lazarus be no wonder. When many that fear to die, shall groan that they can die but once, the dismal state is the second and living death, when life puts despair on the damned; when men shall wish the coverings of mountains, not of monuments, and annihilation shall be courted.

While some have studied monuments, others have studiously declined them, and some have 20 been so vainly boisterous, that they durst not acknowledge their graves; wherein Alaricus<sup>28</sup> seems most subtle, who had a river turned to hide his bones at the bottom. Even Sylla that thought himself safe in his urn, could not prevent revenging tongues, and stones thrown at his monument. Happy are they whom privacy makes innocent, who deal so with men in this world, that they are not afraid to meet them in the next; who, when they die, make no com- 30 motion among the dead, and are not touched with that poetical taunt of Isaiah.<sup>29</sup> Pyramids, arches, obelisks, were but the irregularities of vain-glory, and wild enormities of ancient magnanimity. But the most magnanimous 35 resolution rests in the Christian religion, which trampleth upon pride, and sits on the neck of ambition, humbly pursuing that infallible perpetuity, unto which all others must diminish their diameters, and be poorly seen in angles of 40 contingency.<sup>30</sup>

Pious spirits who passed their days in raptures of futurity, made little more of this world, than the world that was before it, while they lay obscure in the chaos of pre-ordination, 45 and night of their fore-beings. And if any have been so happy as truly to understand Christian annihilation, ecstasies, exolution,<sup>31</sup> liquefaction, transformation, the kiss of the spouse, gustation of God, and ingress into the divine shadow, they have already had an handsome anticipation of heaven; the glory of the world is 5 surely over, and the earth in ashes unto them.

To subsist in lasting monuments, to live in their productions, to exist in their names<sup>32</sup> and predicament of chimæras, was large satisfaction unto old expectations, and made one part of their Elysiums. But all this is nothing in the metaphysics of true belief. To live indeed, is to be again ourselves, which being not only an hope, but an evidence in noble believers, 'tis all one to lie in St. Innocent's churchyard,<sup>33</sup> as in the sands of Egypt. Ready to be any thing, in the ecstasy of being ever, and as content with six foot as the moles of Adrianus.<sup>34</sup>

FAITH

(From Religio Medici, 1642)

As for those wingy mysteries in divinity, and airy subtleties in religion, which have unhinged the brains of better heads, they never stretched the pia mater of mine. Methinks there be not impossibilities enough in religion for an active faith: the deepest mysteries ours contains have not only been illustrated, but maintained, by syllogism and the rule of reason. I love to lose myself in a mystery; to pursue my reason to an O altitudo!<sup>1</sup> 'Tis my solitary recreation to pose my apprehension with those involved enigmas and riddles of the Trinity—incarnation and resurrection. I can answer all the objections of Satan and my rebellious reason with that odd resolution I learned of Tertullian, Certum est quia impossibile est.<sup>2</sup> I desire to exercise my faith in the difficultest point; for, to credit ordinary and visible objects, is not faith, but persuasion.

<sup>31</sup> Exolution (Lat. ex-solvo, to unloose, liberate, etc.) seems to suggest a state in which the soul is released, or purified; the gross and earthly elements which clog it being melted or dissolved. The word liquefaction follows up this thought. The word transformation apparently indicates that the preliminary stages of aspiration and purification have done their work, as it is followed by expressions depicting the active joys of the liberated soul. The order of the words in the series is not fortuitous, but indicates a spiritual progress.

<sup>32</sup> i. e., to live in the mere memory of their names on earth (whether on monuments, or kept alive through their productions), to live, if only in the predicament, or state, of those impossible monsters (chimæras) who exist but as fables, this was a large satisfaction, etc.

GOD'S WISDOM AND ETERNITY

(From the same)

In my solitary and retired imagination (neque enim cum porticus aut me lectulus accepit, desum mihi)<sup>1</sup> I remember I am not alone; and therefore forget not to contemplate him and his attributes, who is ever with me, especially those two mighty ones, his wisdom and eternity. With the one I recreate, with the other I confound, my understanding; for who can speak of eternity without a solecism, or think thereof without an ecstasy?

Time we may comprehend; 'tis but five days older than ourselves, and hath the same horizon with the world; but to retire so far back as to apprehend a beginning,—to give such an infinite start forwards as to conceive an end,—in an essence that we affirm hath neither the one nor the other, it puts my reason to St. Paul's sanctuary; my philosophy dares not say the angels can do it. God hath not made a creature that can comprehend him; 'tis a privilege of his nature: "I am that I am" was his own definition unto Moses;<sup>2</sup> and 'twas a short one to confound mortality, that durst question God, or ask him what he was. Indeed, he only is; all others have and shall be; but, in eternity, there is no distinction of tenses; and therefore that terrible term, predestination, which hath troubled so many weak heads to conceive, and the wisest to explain, is in respect to God no prescious determination of our estates to come, but a definitive blast of his will already fulfilled, and at the instant that he first decreed it; for, to his eternity, which is indivisible, and altogether, the last trump is already sounded, the reprobates in the flame, and the blessed in Abraham's bosom. St. Peter speaks modestly when he saith, "A thousand years to God are but as one day:"<sup>3</sup> for, to speak like a philosopher, those continued instances of time, which flow into a thousand years, make not to him one moment. What to us is to come, to his eternity is present; his whole duration being but one permanent point, without succession, parts, flux, or division.

THE DIVINITY IN MAN

(From the same, Part II)

Now for my life, it is a miracle for thirty years, which to relate, were not a history, but a piece of poetry, and would sound to common ears like a fable. For the world, I count it not an inn, but an hospital; and a place not to live, but to die in. The world that I regard is myself; it is the microcosm of my own frame that I cast mine eye on: for the other, I use it but like my globe, and turn it round sometime for my recreation. Men that look upon my outside, perusing only my condition and fortunes, do err in my altitude; for I am above Atlas's shoulders. That mass of flesh that circumscribes me limits not my mind. That surface that tells the heavens it hath an end cannot persuade me I have any. I take my circle to be above three hundred and sixty. Though the number of the ark do measure my body, it comprehendeth not my mind. Whilst I study to find how I am a microcosm, or little world, I find myself something more than the great. There is surely a piece of divinity in us; something that was before the elements and owes no homage unto the sun. Nature tells me I am the image of God, as well as scripture. He that understands not thus much hath not his introduction or first lesson, and is yet to begin the alphabet of man. Let me not injure the felicity of others, if I say I am as happy as any. Ruat coelum, fiat voluntas tua,<sup>1</sup> salveth all; so that, whatsoever happens it is but what our daily prayers desire. In brief, I am content; and what should providence add more? Surely this is it we call happiness, and this do I enjoy; with this I am happy in a dream, and as content to enjoy a happiness in a fancy, as others in a more apparent truth and reality. There is surely a nearer apprehension of anything that delights us, in our dreams, than in our waked senses. Without this I were unhappy; for my awaked judgment discontents me, ever whispering unto me that I am from my friend, but my friendly dream in the night requite me, and make me think I am within his arms. I thank God for my happy dreams, as I do for my good rest; for there is a satisfaction in them unto reasonable desires and such as can be content with a fit of happiness. And surely it is not a melancholy conceit to think we are all asleep in this world and that the conceits of this life are as mere dreams, to those of the next, as the phantasms of the night, to the conceit of the day. There is an equal delusion in both; and the one doth but seem to be the emblem or picture of the other. We are somewhat more than ourselves in our sleeps; and the slumber of the body seems to be but the waking of the soul. It is the ligation of sense, but the liberty of reason and our waking conceptions do not match the fancies of our sleeps.

<sup>1</sup> For when neither the portico nor the bed has accepted me, I am insufficient for myself.

THE GOOD SCHOOLMASTER

(From The Holy State, 1642)

There is scarce any profession in the commonwealth more necessary, which is so slightly performed. The reasons whereof I conceive to be these: First, young scholars make this calling their refuge, yea, perchance before they have taken any degree in the university, commence schoolmasters in the country, as if nothing else were required to set up this profession but only a rod and a ferula. Secondly, others, who are able, use it only as a passage to better preferment, to patch the rents in their present fortune till they can provide a new one, and betake themselves to some more gainful calling. Thirdly, they are disheartened from doing their best with the miserable reward which in some places they receive, being masters to the children and slaves to their parents. Fourthly, being grown rich, they grow negligent, and scorn to touch the school by the proxy of an usher.<sup>1</sup> But, see how well our schoolmaster behaves himself.

His genius inclines him with delight to his profession. Some men had as lief be schoolboys as schoolmasters, to be tied to the school, as Cooper's "Dictionary" and Scapula's "Lexicon" are chained to the desks therein; and though great scholars, and skilful in other arts, are bunglers in this: but God of His goodness hath fitted several men for several callings, that the necessity of Church and State in all conditions may be provided for. So that he who beholds the fabric thereof may say, "God hewed out this stone, and appointed it to lie in this very place, for it would fit none other so well, and here it doth most excellent." And thus God mouldeth some for a schoolmaster's life, undertaking it with desire and delight, and discharging it with dexterity and happy success.

He studieth his scholars' natures as carefully as they their books, and ranks their dispositions into several forms.<sup>2</sup> And though it may seem difficult for him in a great school to descend to all particulars, yet experienced schoolmasters may quickly make a grammar of boys' natures, and reduce them all, saving some few exceptions to, these general rules:

1. Those that are ingenious and industrious. The conjunction of two such planets in a youth

<sup>1</sup> They made it possible for themselves to neglect the school by employing an usher as their proxy.

presages much good unto him. To such a lad a frown may be a whipping, and a whipping a death; yea, where their master whips them once, shame whips them all the week 5 after. Such natures he useth with all gentleness.

2. Those that are ingenious<sup>3</sup> and idle. These think, with the hare in the fable, that running with snails (so they count the rest of their schoolfellows) they shall come soon enough to the post, though sleeping a good while before their starting. Oh, a good rod would finely take them napping.

3. Those that are dull and diligent. Wines, the stronger they be, the more lees they have when they are new. Many boys are muddy-headed till they be clarified with age, and such afterwards prove the best. Bristol diamonds<sup>4</sup> are both bright and squared and pointed by nature, and yet are soft and worthless; whereas, Orient ones in India are rough and rugged, naturally. Hard, and dull natures of youth acquit themselves afterwards the jewels of the country, and therefore their dullness at first is to be borne with, if they be diligent. That schoolmaster deserves to be beaten himself who beats nature in a boy for a fault. And I question whether all the whipping in the world can make their parts, which are naturally sluggish, rise one minute before the hour nature hath appointed.

4. Those that are invincibly dull, and negligent also. Correction may reform the latter, not amend the former. All the whetting in the world can never set a razor's edge on that which hath no steel in it. Such boys he consigneth over to other professions. Shipwrights and boatmakers will choose those crooked pieces of timber which other carpenters refuse. Those may make excellent merchants and mechanics which will not serve for scholars.

He is able, diligent, and methodical in his teaching; not leading them rather in a circle than forwards. He minces his precepts for children to swallow, hanging clogs on the nimbleness of his own soul, that his scholars may go along with him. He is, and will be known to be, an absolute monarch in his school. If cockering mothers proffer him money to purchase their sons an exemption from his rod (to live as it were in a peculiar, out of their master's jurisdiction), with disdain he refuseth it, and scorns the late custom in some places of commuting whipping into money, and ransoming boys from the rod at a set price. If he hath a stubborn youth, correction-proof, he debaseth not his authority by contesting with him, but fairly, if he can, puts him away before his obstinacy hath infected others.

He is moderate in inflicting deserved correction. Many a schoolmaster better answereth the name παιδορπιβης<sup>5</sup> than παιδαγωγός,<sup>6</sup> rather tearing his scholars' flesh with whipping than giving them good education. No wonder if his scholars hate the Muses, being presented unto them in the shapes of fiends and furies. Junius complains de insolento carnificina<sup>7</sup> of his schoolmaster, by whom conscindebatur flagris septies aut octies in dies singulos.<sup>8</sup> Yea, hear the lamentable verses of poor Tusser<sup>9</sup> in his own life:

"From Paul's I went, to Eton sent,
To learn straightways the Latin phrase,
Where fifty-three stripes, given to me
At once I had.

"For fault but small, or none at all,
It came to pass thus beat I was;
See Udall,<sup>10</sup> see, the mercy of thee,
To me, poor lad."

Such an Orbilius<sup>11</sup> mars more scholars than 25 he makes: their tyranny hath caused many tongues to stammer, which spake plain by nature, and whose stuttering at first was nothing else but fears quavering on their speech at their master's presence; and whose mauling 30 them about their heads hath dulled those who, in quickness, exceeded their master.

He makes his school free to him who sues to him in forma pauperis. And surely learning is the greatest alms that can be given. But he 35 is a beast who, because the poor scholar cannot pay him his wages, pays the scholar in his whipping. Rather are diligent lads to be encouraged with all excitements to learning. This minds me of what I have heard concerning Mr. Bust, that worthy late schoolmaster of Eton, who would never suffer any wandering begging scholar (such as justly the statute hath ranked in the forefront of rogues) to come into his school, but would thrust him out 45 with earnestness (however privately charitably unto him), lest his schoolboys should be disheartened from their books by seeing some scholars, after their studying in the university, preferred to beggary.

He spoils not a good school to make thereof a bad college, therein to teach his scholars 5 logic. For, besides that logic may have an action of trespass against grammar for encroaching on her liberties, syllogisms are solecisms taught in the school, and oftentimes they are forced afterwards in the university to unlearn the fumbling skill they had before. 10

Out of his school he is no whit pedantical in carriage or discourse; contenting himself to be rich in Latin, though he doth not jingle with it in every company wherein he comes.

To conclude, let this amongst other motives 15 make schoolmasters careful in their place, that the eminencies of their scholars have commended the memories of their schoolmasters to posterity, who otherwise in obscurity had altogether been forgotten. Who had ever 20 heard of R. Bond, in Lancashire, but for the breeding of learned Ascham,<sup>12</sup> his scholar? or of Hartgrave, in Brundly school, in the same county, but because he was the first did teach 25 worthy Dr. Whitaker?<sup>13</sup> Nor do I honour the memory of Mulcaster for anything so much as for his scholar, that gulf of learning, Bishop Andrews.<sup>14</sup> This made the Athenians, the day before the great feast of Theseus, their founder, to sacrifice a ram to the memory of Conidas, his schoolmaster that first instructed him.

OF SELF-PRISING

(From the same)

He whose own worth doth speak, need not speak his own worth. Such boasting sounds proceed from emptiness of desert: whereas the conquerors in the Olympian games did not put on the laurels on their own heads, but waited till some other did it. Only anchorites<sup>1</sup> that want company may crown themselves with their own commendations.

It sheweth more wit but no less vanity to commend one's self not in a straight line but by reflection. Some sail to the port of their own praise by a side-wind; as when they dispraise themselves, stripping themselves naked of what is their due, that the modesty of the beholders may clothe them with it again; or when they flatter another to his face, tossing the ball to him that he may throw it back again to them; or when they commend that quality, wherein themselves excel, in another man (though absent) whom all know far their inferior in that faculty; or, lastly, (to omit other ambushes men set to surprise praise), when they send the children of their own brain to be nursed by another man, and commend their own works in a third person, but if challenged by the company that they were authors of it themselves, with their tongues they faintly deny it, and with their faces strongly affirm it.

Self-praising comes most naturally from a man when it comes most violently from him in his own defence. For though modesty binds a man's tongue to the peace in this point, yet, being assaulted in his credit, he may stand upon his guard, and then he doth not so much praise as purge himself. One braved a gentleman to his face that in skill and valour he came far behind him. "'Tis true," said the other, "for when I fought with you, you ran away before me." In such a case it was well returned, and without any just aspersion of pride. He that falls into sin is a man; that grieves at it, is a saint; that boasteth of it, is a devil. Yet some glory in their shame, counting the stains of sin the best complexion for their souls. These men make me believe it may be true what Mandeville writes of the Isle of Soma-barre, in the East Indies, that all the nobility thereof brand their faces with a hot iron in token of honour.

He that boasts of sins never committed is a double devil. . . . Some, who would sooner creep into a scabbard than draw a sword, boast of their robberies, to usurp the esteem of valour; whereas, first let them be well whipped for their lying, and as they like that let them come afterward and entitle themselves to the gallows.

OF BOOKS
(From the same)

Solomon saith truly, "Of making many books there is no end;"<sup>1</sup> so insatiable is the thirst of men therein: as also endless is the desire of many in buying and reading them. But we come to our rules.

1. It is a vanity to persuade the world one hath much learning by getting a large library. As soon shall I believe every one is valiant that hath a well furnished armory. I guess good housekeeping by the smoking, not the number of the tunnels, as knowing that many of them (built merely for uniformity) are without chimneys, and more without fires

Once a dunce, void of learning but full of books, flouted a library-less scholar with these words, —Salve, doctor sine libris:<sup>2</sup> but the next day the scholar coming into this jeerer's study crowded with books, —Salvete, libri, saith he, sine doctore.<sup>3</sup>

2. Few books well selected are best. Yet, as a certain fool bought all the pictures that came out, because he might have his choice; such is the vain humour of many men in gathering of books: yet when they have done all, they miss their end, it being in the editions of authors as in the fashions of clothes, when a man thinks he hath gotten the latest and newest, presently another newer comes out.

3. Some books are only cursorily to be tasted of. Namely, first voluminous books, the task of a man's life to read them over; secondly, auxiliary books, only to be repaired to on occasions; thirdly, such as are mere pieces of formality, so that if you look on them you look through them; and he that peeps through the casement of the index sees as much as if he were in the house. But the laziness of those cannot be excused who perfunctorily pass over authors of consequence, and only trade in their tables of contents. These, like city-cheaters,<sup>4</sup> having gotten the names of all country gentlemen, make silly people believe they have long lived in those places where they never were, and flourish with skill in those authors they never seriously studied.

4. The genius of the author is commonly discovered in the dedicatory epistle. Many place the purest grain in the mouth of the sack for chapmen to handle or buy; and from the dedication one may probably guess at the work, saving some rare and peculiar exceptions. Thus, when once a gentleman admired how so pithy, learned, and witty a dedication was matched to a flat, dull, foolish book: "In truth," said another, "they may be well matched together, for I profess they are nothing akin."

5. Proportion an hour's meditation to an hour's reading of a staple author. This makes a man master of his learning, and dispirits<sup>5</sup> the book into the scholar. The King of Sweden never filed his men above six deep in one company, because he would not have them lie in useless clusters in his army, but so that every particular soldier might be drawn out into service. Books that stand thin on the shelves, yet so as the owner of them can bring forth every one of them into use, are better than far better libraries.

6. Learning hath gained most by those books by which the printer hath lost. Arias Montanus,<sup>6</sup> in printing the Hebrew Bible, (commonly called the Bible of the King of Spain) much wasted himself, and was accused in the court of Rome for his good deed, and being cited thither, pro tantorum laborum præmio, viz veniam impetravit. Likewise, Christopher Plantin,<sup>7</sup> by printing of his curious interlineary Bible in Antwerp, through the unreasonable actions of the king's officers, sunk and almost ruined his estate. And our worthy English knight, who set forth the golden-mouthed Father<sup>8</sup> in a silver print, was a loser by it.

7. Whereas foolish pamphlets prove most beneficial to the printers. When a French printer complained that he was utterly undone by printing a solid serious book of Rabelais concerning phisic, Rabelais, to make him recompense, made that his jesting, scurrilous work, which repaired the printer's loss with advantage. Such books the world swarms too much with. When one had set out a witless pamphlet, writing Finis at the end thereof, another wittily wrote beneath it,

... "Nay, there thou liest, my friend,
In writing foolish books there is no end."

And surely such scurrilous, scandalous papers do more than conceivable mischief. First, their lusciousness puts many palates out of taste, that they can never after relish any solid and wholesome writers; secondly, they cast dirt on the faces of many innocent persons, which, dried on by continuance of time, can never after be washed off; thirdly, the pamphlets of this age may pass for records with the next (because publicly uncontrolled), and what we laugh at, our children may believe; fourthly, grant the things true they jeer at, yet this music is unlawful in any Christian church, to play upon the sins and miseries of others, the fitter object of the elegies and the satires of all truly religious.

But what do I speaking against multiplicity of books in this age, who trespass in this nature myself? What was a learned man's compliment, may serve for my confession and conclusion:—Multi mei similes hoc morbo laborant, ut cum scribere nesciant, tamen a scribendo temperare non possint.<sup>9</sup>

1608–1674

5 CHARLES I. SETS UP HIS STANDARD AT NOTTINGHAM

(From The History of the Rebellion, 1704–7)

10 (His Majesty) forthwith published a declaration, that had been long ready, in which he recapitulated all the insolent and rebellious actions which the two houses had committed against him: and declared them "to be guilty; and forbad all his subjects to yield any obedience to them:" and, at the same time, published his proclamation; by which "he required all men who could bear arms, to repair to him at Nottingham, by the twenty-fifth of August<sup>1</sup> following; on which day he would set up his royal standard there, which all good subjects were obliged to attend." . . .

The king came to Nottingham two or three days before the day he had appointed to set up the standard; having taken Lincoln in his way, and drawn some arms from the train bands of that country with him to Nottingham; from whence, the next day, he went to take a view of his horse; whereof there were several troops well armed, and under good officers, to the number of seven or eight hundred men; with which, being informed, "that there were some regiments of foot marching towards Coventry, by the Earl of Essex's orders," he made haste thither; making little doubt but that he should be able to get thither before them, and so to possess himself of that city; and he did get thither the day before they came; but found not only the gates shut against him, but some of his servants shot and wounded from the walls: nor could all his messages and summons prevail with the mayor and magistrates, before there was any garrison there, to suffer the king to enter into the city. So great an interest and reputation the parliament had gotten over the affections of the people, whose hearts were alienated from any reverence to the government.

The king could not remedy the affront, but went that night to Stonely, the house then of Sir Thomas Lee; where he was well received; and, the next day, his body of horse, having a clear view, upon an open campania, for five or six miles together, of the enemy's small body of foot, which consisted not of above twelve hundred men, with one troop of horse, which marched with them over that plain, retired before them, without giving them one charge; which was imputed to the lashty of Wilmot, who commanded; and had a colder courage than many who were under him, and who were of opinion, that they might have easily defeated that body of foot; which would have been a very seasonable victory; would have put Coventry unquestionably into the King's hands, and sent him with a good omen to the setting up of his standard. Whereas, that unhappy retreat, which looked like a defeat, 10 and the rebellious behaviour of Coventry, made his majesty's return to Nottingham very melancholy; and he returned thither the very day the standard was appointed to be set up.

According to the proclamation, upon the 15 twenty-fifth day of August, the standard was erected, about six of the clock in the evening of a very stormy and tempestuous day. The king himself, with a small train, rode to the top of the castle-hill, Varney the knight-20 marshal, who was standard bearer, carrying the standard, which was then erected in that place, with little other ceremony than the sound of drums and trumpets: melancholy men observed many ill presages about that 25 time. There was not one regiment of foot yet levied and brought thither; so that the trained bands, which the sheriff had drawn together, was all the strength the king had for his person, and the guard of the standard. There appeared 30 no conflux of men in obedience to the proclamation; the arms and ammunition were not yet come from York, and a general sadness covered the whole town. And the king himself appeared more melancholic than he used to be. 35 The standard itself was blown down, the same night it had been set up, by a very strong and unruly wind, and could not be fixed again in a day or two, till the tempest was allayed. And within three or four days the news arrived that 40 Portsmouth was given up; which almost struck the king to the heart. Goring,<sup>2</sup> who had received so much money from the parliament, to mend the fortifications, and so much from the queen, to provide men and victual and am-45 munition, that he might be able to defend himself when he should be forced to declare, which he expected to be much sooner, and could not expect to be suddenly relieved, had neither mended the fortifications, or provided any-50 thing for his defence, but had spent all the money in good fellow-ship, or lost it at play; the temptation of either of which vices, he never could resist. So that when he could no longer defer giving the parliament a direct 55

answer, he had only the Lord Wentworth and Mr. Thomas Weston, who came to enjoy the delight of his company, which was very attractive, and for whom he had promised to raise 5 troops of horse, and three or four country gentlemen, who repaired thither upon the first news of his declaring with so small a number of men, as was fitter for their equipage and retinue than for the defence of the place, and an addition of twenty or thirty common men to his garrison, which the kindness of some friends had supplied with: and in this state Sir Will. Waller found him and the place, when he came before it, and when he was deprived of all communication by land or sea. He continued in the same jollity from the time he was besieged, and suffered the enemy to approach as he pleased, without disturbing him by any brisk 10 sally or soldierly action, which all men expected from him, who were best acquainted with his other infirmities; and after about the end of three weeks, he delivered the town, upon no other conditions than the liberty for all who had a mind to go away, and his own transportation 15 into Holland. When he recovered, and restored himself to the king and queen's favour and trust, after his foul tergiversation, he had great thoughts in his heat of power and authority; for his ambition was always the first 20 deity he sacrificed to; and it was proposed by him, and consented to, that when the king should find it necessary to put himself into the field, (which was thought would be fit for him to do much sooner), the Queen should retire 25 to Portsmouth: and that was the reason why the queen was so solicitous that it might be put into a good condition; and by this means he should be sure never to be reduced into any straits without a powerful relief, and should 30 always have it in his power to make good conditions for himself, in all events. But when the parliament's power was so much increased and the king's abated, that the queen resolved to transport herself beyond the seas, the edge 35 of his zeal was taken off, and he thought Portsmouth too low a sphere for him to move in; and the keeping a town (which must follow the fate of the kingdom) was not a fit portion for him; and so he cared not to lose what he 40 did not care to keep. And it were to be wished that there might be no more occasion to mention him after this repeated treachery, and that his incomparable dexterity and sagacity had not prevailed so far over those whom he had 45 so often deceived, as to make it absolutely necessary to speak at large of him, more than once, before this discourse comes to an end. And this was the melancholy state of the king's affairs, when the standard was set up.

<sup>2</sup> Col. Goring, the Governor of Portsmouth. According to Clarendon he received £3000. from the Queen to fortify and victual Portsmouth, and accepted at the same time "a good supply from the Parliament" to pay the soldiers of the garrison.

LORD FALKLAND

(From the same)

In this unhappy battle<sup>1</sup> was slain the lord viscount Falkland;<sup>2</sup> a person of such prodigious parts of learning and knowledge, of that inimitable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and integrity of life, that if there were no other brand upon this odious and accursed civil war, than that single loss, it must be most infamous and execrable to all posterity.

Turpe mori, post te, solo non posse dolore.<sup>3</sup>

Before this parliament, his condition of life was so happy that it was hardly capable of improvement. Before he came to twenty years of age, he was master of a noble fortune, which descended to him by the gift of a grandfather, without passing through his father or mother, who were then both alive, and not well enough contented to find themselves passed by in the descent. His education for some years had been in Ireland, where his father was lord deputy; so that, when he returned into England, to the possession of his fortune, he was unentangled with any acquaintance or friends, which usually grow up by the custom of conversation; and therefore was to make a pure election of his company; which he chose by other rules than were prescribed to the young nobility of that time. And it cannot be denied, though he admitted some few to his friendship for the agreeableness of their natures, and their undoubted affection to him, that his familiarity and friendship, for the most part, was with men of the most eminent and sublime parts, and of untouched reputation in point of integrity; and such men had a title to his bosom.

He was a great cherisher of wit, and fancy, and good parts in any man; and, if he found them clouded with poverty or want, a most liberal and bountiful patron towards them, even above his fortune; of which, in those administrations, he was such a dispenser, as, if he had been trusted with it to such uses, and if there had been the least of vice in his expense, he might have been thought too prodigal. He was constant and pertinacious in whatsoever he resolved to do, and not to be wearied by any pains that were necessary to that end. And therefore having once resolved not to see London, which he loved above all places, till he had perfectly learned the Greek tongue, he went to his own house in the country, and pursued it with that indefatigable industry, that it will not be believed in how short a time he was master of it, and accurately read all the Greek historians.

In this time, his house being within ten miles of Oxford, he contracted familiarity and friendship with the most polite and accurate men of that university; who found such an immenseness of wit, and such a solidity of judgment in him, so infinite a fancy, bound in by a most logical ratiocination, such a vast knowledge, that he was not ignorant in anything, yet such an excessive humility, as if he had known nothing, that they frequently resorted, and dwelt with him, as in a college situated in a purer air; so that his house was a university in a less volume; whither they came not so much for repose as study; and to examine and refine those grosser propositions, which laziness and consent made current in vulgar conversation.

Many attempts were made upon him, by the instigation of his mother (who was a lady of another persuasion in religion, and of a most masculine understanding, allayed with the passions and infirmities of her own sex) to pervert him in his piety to the church of England, and to reconcile him to that of Rome; which they prosecuted with the more confidence, because he declined no opportunity or occasion of conference with those of that religion, whether priests or laics; having diligently studied the controversies, and exactly read all, or the choicest of the Greek and Latin fathers, and having a memory so stupendous, that he remembered, on all occasions, whatsoever he read. And he was so great an enemy to that passion and uncharitableness, which he saw produced, by difference of opinion, in matters of religion, that in all those disputations with priests, and others of the Roman church, he affected to manifest all possible civility to their persons, and estimation of their parts; which made them retain still some hope of his reduction, even when they had given over offering further reasons to him to that purpose.

He had a courage of the most clear and keen temper, and so far from fear, that he was not without appetite of danger; and therefore, upon any occasion of action, he always engaged his person in those troops, which he thought, by the forwardness of the commanders, to be most like to be furthest engaged, and in all such encounters he had about him a strange cheerfulness and companionableness, without at all affecting the execution which was then principally to be attended, in which he took no delight, but took pains to prevent it, where it was not, by resistance, necessary; insomuch that at Edge-hill,<sup>4</sup> when the enemy was routed, he was like to have incurred great peril, by interposing to save those who had thrown away their arms, and against whom, it may be, others were more fierce for their having thrown them away: insomuch as a man might think, he came into the field only out of curiosity to see the face of danger, and charity to prevent the shedding of blood. Yet in his natural inclination he acknowledged he was addicted to the profession of a soldier; and shortly after he came to his fortune, and before he came to age, he went into the Low Countries, with a resolution of procuring command, and to give himself up to it, from which he was converted by the complete inactivity of that summer: and so he returned into England, and shortly after entered upon that vehement course of study we mentioned before, till the first alarm from the north; and then again he made ready for the field, and though he received some repulse in the command of a troop of horse, of which he had a promise, he went a volunteer with the earl of Essex.

From the entrance into this unnatural war, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity grew clouded, and a kind of sadness and dejection of spirit stole upon him, which he had never been used to; yet being one of those who believed that one battle would end all differences, and that there would be so great a victory on one side, that the other would be compelled to submit to any conditions from the victor (which supposition and conclusion generally sunk into the minds of most men, and prevented the looking after of many advantages, that might have been laid hold of), he resisted those indispositions, et in luctu, bellum inter remedia erat.<sup>5</sup> But after the king's return from Brentford, and the furious resolution of the two houses not to admit any treaty for peace, those indispositions, which had before touched him, grew into a perfect habit of uncheerfulness; and he, who had been so exactly unreserved and affable to all men, that his face and countenance was always present, and vacant to his company, and held any cloudiness, and less pleasantness of the visage, a kind of rudeness or incivility, became, on a sudden, less communicable; and thence, very sad, pale, and exceedingly affected with the spleen. In his clothes and habit, which he had minded before always with more neatness, and industry, and expense, than is usual to so great a mind, he was not now only incurious, but too negligent; and in his reception of suitors, and the necessary or casual addresses to his place, so quick, and sharp, and severe, that there wanted not some men (who were strangers to his nature and disposition),<sup>7</sup> who believed him proud and imperious, from which no mortal man was ever more free.

The truth is, as he was of a most incomparable gentleness, application, and even a demissness,<sup>8</sup> and submission to good, and worthy, and entire men, so he was naturally (which could not but be more evident in his place, which objected him to another conversation and intermixture, than his own election had done) adversus malos injucundus<sup>9</sup> and was so ill a dissembler of his dislike and disinclination to ill men, that it was not possible for such not to discern it. There was once, in the house of Commons, such a declared acceptance of the good service an eminent member had done to them, and, as they said, to the whole kingdom, that it was moved, he being present, "that the speaker might, in the name of the whole house, give him thanks; and then, that every member might, as a testimony of his particular acknowledgement, stir or move his hat towards him;" the which (though not ordered) when very many did, the lord Falkland (who believed the service itself not to be of that moment, and that an honourable and generous person could not have stooped to it for any recompense), instead of moving his hat, stretched both his arms out, and clasped his hands together upon the crown of his hat, and held it close down to his head; that all men might see, how odious that flattery was to him, and the very approbation of the person, though at that time most popular.

When there was any overture or hope of peace, he would be more erect and vigorous, and exceedingly solicitous to press any thing which he thought might promote it; and sitting among his friends, often, after a deep silence and frequent sighs, would, with a shrill and sad accent, ingeminate the word Peace, Peace; and would passionately profess, "that the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and desolation the kingdom did and must endure, took his sleep from him, and would shortly break his heart." This made some think, or pretend to think, "that he was so much enamoured on peace, that he would have been glad the king should have bought it at any price:" which was a most unreasonable calamny. As if a man, that was himself the most punctual and precise in every circumstance that might reflect upon conscience or honour, could have wished the king to have committed a trespass against either. And yet this senseless scandal made some impression upon him, or at least he used it for an excuse of the daringness of his spirit; for at the leaguer<sup>10</sup> before Gloucester, when his friends passionately reprehended him for exposing his person unnecessarily to danger (as he delighted to visit the trenches, and nearest approaches, and to discover what the enemy did), as being so much beside the duty of his place, that it might be understood against it, he would say merrily, "that his office could not take away the privileges of his age; and that a secretary in war might be present at the greatest secret of danger;" but withal alleged seriously, "that it concerned him to be more active in enterprizes of hazard, than other men; that all might see, that his impatience for peace proceeded not from pusillanimity, or fear to adventure his own person."

In the morning before the battle, as always upon action, he was very cheerful, and put himself into the first rank of the lord Byron's<sup>11</sup> regiment, who was then advancing upon the enemy, who had lined the hedges upon both sides with musketeers; from whence he was shot with a musket in the lower part of the belly; and in the instant falling from his horse, his body was not found till the next morning; till when, there was some hope he might have been a prisoner; though his nearest friends, who knew his temper, received small comfort from that imagination. Thus fell that incomparable young man, in the four and thirtieth year of his age, having so much despatched the business of life, that the oldest rarely attain to that immense knowledge, and the youngest enter not into the world with more innocence: whosoever leads such a life, need not care upon how short warning it be taken from him.

OF CONTENTEDNESS IN ALL ESTATES AND ACCIDENTS

(From Holy Living, 1650)

1. Contentedness in all estates is a duty of religion: it is the great reasonableness of complying with the Divine Providence, which governs all the world, and hath so ordered us in the administration of his great family. He were a strange fool, that should be angry, because dogs and sheep need no shoes, and yet himself is full of care to get some. God hath supplied those needs to them by natural provisions, and to thee by an artificial: for he hath given thee reason to learn a trade, or some means to make or buy them, so that it only differs in the manner of our provision: and which had you rather want, shoes or reason? And my patron that hath given me a farm, is freer to me than if he gives a loaf ready baked. But, however, all these gifts come from him, and therefore it is fit he should dispense them as he pleases; and if we murmur here, we may, at the next melancholy, be troubled that God did not make us to be angels or stars. For if that, which we are or have, do not content us, we may be troubled for everything in the world, which is besides our being or our possessions.

God is the master of the scenes; we must not choose which part we shall act; it concerns us only to be careful that we do it well, always saying, "If this please God, let it be as it is:" and we who pray, that God's will may be done in earth, as it is in heaven, must remember, that the angels do whatsoever is commanded them, and go wherever they are sent, and refuse no circumstances: and if their employment be crossed by a higher degree, they sit down in peace and rejoice in the event; and when the angel of Judea<sup>1</sup> could not prevail in behalf of the people committed to his charge, because the angel of Persia opposed it, he only told the story at the command of God, and was as content, and worshipped with as great an ecstasy in his proportion, as the prevailing spirit. Do thou so likewise: keep the station, where God hath placed you and you shall never long for things without, but sit at home feasting upon the Divine providence and thy own reason by which we are taught, that it is necessary and reasonable to submit to God.

For is not all the world God's family? Are not we his creatures? Are we not as clay in the hand of the potter?<sup>2</sup> Do we not live upon his meat, and move by his strength, and do our work by his light? Are we anything, but what we are from him? And shall there be a mutiny among the flocks and herds, because their Lord or their shepherd chooses their pastures, and suffers them not to wander into deserts and unknown ways? If we choose, we do it so foolishly, that we cannot like it long, and most commonly not at all: but God, who can do what he pleases, is wise to choose safely for us, affectionate to comply with our needs, and powerful to execute all his wise decrees. Here therefore is the wisdom of the contented man, to let God choose for him: for when we have given up our wills to him, and stand in that station of the battle, where our great general hath placed us, our spirits must needs rest, while our conditions have, for their security, the power, the wisdom, and the charity of God.

2. Contentedness, in all accidents, brings great peace of spirit, and is the great and only instrument of temporal felicity. It removes the sting from the accident, and makes a man not to depend upon chance, and the uncertain dispositions of men for his well-being, but only on God and his own spirit. We ourselves make our fortunes good or bad; and when God lets loose a tyrant upon us, or a sickness, or scorn, or a lessened fortune, if we fear to die, or know not to be patient, or are proud, or covetous, then the calamity sits heavy on us. But if we know how to manage a noble principle, and fear not death so much as a dishonest action, and think impatience a worse evil than a fever, and pride to be the biggest disgrace, and poverty to be infinitely desirable before the torments of covetousness; then we, who now think vice to be so easy, and make it so familiar, and think the cure so impossible, shall quickly be of another mind, and reckon these accidents amongst things eligible.

But no man can be happy that hath great hopes and great fears of things without, and events depending upon other men, or upon the chances of fortune. The rewards of virtue are certain, and our provisions for our natural support are certain; or if we want meat till we die, then we die of that disease, and there are many worse than to die with an atrophy or consumption, or unapt and coarser nourishment. But he that suffers a transporting passion concerning things within the power of others, is free from sorrow and amazement no longer than his enemy shall give him leave; and it is ten to one but he shall be smitten then and there, where it shall most trouble him: for so the adder teaches us where to strike, by her curious and fearful defending of her head. The old stoics,<sup>3</sup> when you told them of a sad story would still answer, "What is that to me?"—Yes, for the tyrant hath sentenced you also to prison.—Well, what is that? He will put a chain upon my leg; but he cannot bind my soul.—No: but he will kill you.—Then I will die. If presently, let me go, that I may presently be freer than himself: but if not till anon or to-morrow, I will dine first, or sleep, or do what reason or nature calls for, as at other times." This, in Gentile philosophy, is the same with the discourse of St. Paul, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere and in all things I am instructed both how to be full and to be hungry; both to abound and to suffer need."<sup>4</sup>

We are in the world, like men playing at tables;<sup>5</sup> the chance is not in our power, but to play it is; and when it is fallen, we must manage it as we can; and let nothing trouble us, but when we do a base action, or speak like a fool, or think wickedly: these things God hath put into our powers; but concerning those things, which are wholly in the choice of another, they cannot fall under our deliberation, and therefore neither are they fit for our passions. My fear may make me miserable, but it cannot prevent what another hath in his power and purpose: and prosperities can only be enjoyed by them, who fear not at all to lose them; since the amazement and passion concerning the future takes off all the pleasure of the present possession. Therefore, if thou hast lost thy land, do not also lose thy constancy: and if thou must die a little sooner, yet do not die impatiently. For no chance is evil to him that is content, and to a man nothing is miserable, unless it be unreasonable. No man can make another man to be his slave, unless he hath first enslaved himself to life and death, to pleasure or pain, to hope or fear: command these passions, and you are freer than the Parthian kings.<sup>6</sup>

CONSIDERATION OF THE VANITY AND SHORTNESS OF MAN'S LIFE

(From Holy Dying, 1651)

A man is a bubble (said the Greek proverb), which Lucian<sup>1</sup> represents with advantages and its proper circumstances to this purpose: saying, All the world is a storm, and men rise up in their several generations, like bubbles descending à Jove pluvio, from God and the dew of heaven, from a tear and drop of rain, from nature and Providence; and some of these instantly sink into the deluge of their first parent, and are hidden in a sheet of water, having had no other business in the world, but <sup>3</sup> Apparently taken as examples of the oriental despot. Persian kings would seem to be an exacter illustration.

<sup>4</sup> A Greek satirist and humorist of the second century. His amplification of the Greek proverb referred to, occurs in his Charon, or the Spectator of the World. The passage in Taylor is a paraphrase of that in Lucian.

to be born, that they might be able to die: others float up and down two or three turns, and suddenly disappear, and give their place to others: and they that live longest upon the face of the waters, are in perpetual motion, restless and uneasy; and, being crushed with the great drop of a cloud, sink into flatness and a froth; the change not being great, it being hardly possible it should be more a nothing than it was before. So is every man: he is born in vanity and sin; he comes into the world like morning mushrooms, soon thrusting up their heads into the air, and conversing with their kindred of the same production, and as soon they turn into dust and forgetfulness: some of them<sup>2</sup> without any other interest in the affairs of the world, but that they made their parents a little glad, and very sorrowful; others ride longer in the storm; it may be until seven years of vanity be expired, and then peradventure the sun shines hot upon their heads, and they fall into the shades below, into the cover of death and darkness of the grave to hide them. But if the bubble stands the shock of a bigger drop, and outlives the chances of a child, of a careless nurse, of drowning in a pail of water, of being overlaid by a sleepy servant, or such little accidents, then the young man dances like a bubble, empty and gay, and shines like a dove's neck, or the image of a rainbow, which hath no substance, and whose very imagery and colours are fantastical; and so he dances out the gaiety of his youth, and is all the while in a storm, and endures, only because he is not knocked on the head by a drop of bigger rain, or crushed by the pressure of a load of indigested meat, or quenched by the disorder of an ill-placed humour:<sup>3</sup> and to preserve a man alive in the midst of so many chances and hostilities, is as great a miracle as to create him; to preserve him from rushing into nothing, and at first to draw him up from nothing, were equally the issues of an almighty power. And therefore the wise men of the world have contended, who shall best fit man's condition with words signifying his vanity and short abode. Homer calls a man "a leaf,"<sup>4</sup> the smallest, the weakest piece of a short-lived, unsteady plant. Pindar calls him "the dream of a shadow:" Another, "the dream of the shadow of smoke."<sup>5</sup> But St. James spake by a more excellent Spirit, saying, "Our life is but a vapour,"<sup>6</sup> viz. drawn from the earth by a celestial influence; made of smoke, or the lighter parts of water, tossed with every wind, moved by the motion of a superior body, without virtue in itself, lifted upon high, or left below, according as it pleases the sun, its foster-father. But it is lighter yet. It is but appearing; a fantastic vapour, an apparition, nothing real: it is not so much as a mist, not the matter of a shower, nor substantial enough to make a cloud; but it is like Cassiopeia's chair, or Pelops' shoulder;<sup>7</sup> or the circles of heaven, φαεινόμενα,<sup>8</sup> for which you cannot have a word that can signify a verier nothing. And yet the expression is one degree more made diminutive: a vapour, and fantastical, or a mere appearance, and this but for a little while neither; the very dream, the fantasm disappears in a small time, "like the shadow that departeth; or like a tale that is told; or as a dream when one waketh." A man is so vain, so unfixed, so perishing a creature, that he cannot long last in the scene of fancy: a man goes off and is forgotten, like the dream of a distracted person. The sum of all is this: that thou art a man, than whom there is not in the world any greater instance of heights and declensions, of lights and shadows, of misery and folly, of laughter and tears, of groans and death.

And because this consideration is of great usefulness and great necessity to many purposes of wisdom and the spirit; all the succession of time, all the changes in nature, all the varieties of light and darkness, the thousand thousands of accidents in the world, and every contingency to every man, and to every creature, doth preach our funeral sermon, and calls us to look and see, how the old sexton Time throws up the earth, and digs a grave, where we must lay our sins or our sorrows, and sow our bodies, till they rise again in a fair or an intolerable eternity. Every revolution which the sun makes about the world, divides between life and death; and death possesses both those portions by the next morrow; and we are dead to all those months which we have already lived, and we shall never live them over again: and still God makes little periods of our age. First we change our world, when we come from the womb to feel the warmth of the sun. Then we sleep, and enter into the image of death, in which state we are unconcerned in all the changes of the world: and if our mothers or our nurses die, or a wild boar destroy our vineyards, or our king be sick, we regard it not, but during that state, are as disinterested, as if our eyes were closed with the clay that weeps in the bowels of the earth. At the end of seven years our teeth fall and die before us, representing a formal prologue to the tragedy; and still every seven years, it is odds, but we shall finish the last scene: and when nature, or chance, or vice, takes our body in pieces, weakening some parts and loosing others, we taste the grave and the solemnities of our own funerals, first, in those parts that ministered to vice; and next, in them that served for ornament; and in a short time, even they that served for necessity become useless and entangled like the wheels of a broken clock. Baldness is but a dressing to our funerals, the proper ornament of mourning, and of a person entered very far into the regions and possession of death: and we have many more of the same signification: gray hairs, rotten teeth, dim eyes, trembling joints, short breath, stiff limbs, wrinkled skin, short memory, decayed appetite. Every day's necessity calls for a reparation of that portion, which death fed on all night, when we lay in his lap, and slept in his outer chambers. The very spirits of a man prey upon the daily portion of bread and flesh, and every meal is a rescue from one death, and lays up for another; and while we think a thought, we die; and the clock strikes and reckons on our portion of eternity; we form our words with the breath of our nostrils, we have the less to live upon for every word we speak.

<sup>7</sup> The shoulder of ivory supplied by Demeter in the place of the one she had thoughtlessly eaten (v. Pelops in Class. Dict.) exists only in fable, and is indeed the shadow of a shade, since this is not even the real shoulder of Pelops, and Pelops himself is a myth.

Thus nature calls us to meditate of death by those things which are the instruments of acting it: and God, by all the variety of his providence, makes us see death everywhere, in all variety of circumstances, and dressed up for all the fancies, and the expectation of every single person. Nature hath given us one harvest every year, but death hath two: and the spring and the autumn send throngs of men and women to charnel-houses; and all the summer long, men are recovering from their evils of the spring, till the dog-days come, and then the Sirian star<sup>9</sup> makes the summer deadly; and the fruits of autumn are laid up for all the year's provision, and the man that gathers them, eats and surfeits, and dies, and needs them not, and himself is laid up for eternity; and he that escapes till winter, only stays for another opportunity, which the distempers of that quarter minister to him with great variety. Thus death reigns in all the portions of our time. The autumn with its fruits provides disorders for us, and the winter's cold turns them into sharp diseases, and the spring brings flowers to strew our hearse, and the summer gives green turf and brambles to bind upon our graves. Calentures<sup>10</sup> and surfeit,<sup>11</sup> cold and agues, are the four quarters of the year, and all minister to death; and you can go no whither but you tread upon a dead man's bones.

The wild fellow in Petronius,<sup>12</sup> that escaped upon a broken table from the furies of a shipwreck, as he was sunning himself upon the rocky shore, espied a man rolled upon his floating bed of waves, ballasted with sand in the folds of his garment, and carried by his civil enemy, the sea, towards the shore to find a grave: and it cast him into some sad thoughts: that peradventure this man's wife, in some part of the continent, safe and warm, looks next month for the good man's return; or, it may be, his son knows nothing of the tempest; or his father thinks of that affectionate kiss, which still is warm upon the good old man's cheek, ever since he took a kind farewell; and he weeps with joy to think, how blessed he shall be, when his beloved boy returns into the circle of his father's arms. These are the thoughts of mortals, this is the end and sum of all their designs: a dark night and an ill guide, a boisterous sea and a broken cable, a hard rock and a rough wind, dashed in pieces the fortune of a whole family, and they that shall weep loudest for the accident, are not yet entered into the storm, and yet have suffered shipwreck. Then looking upon the carcass, he knew it, and found it to be the master of the ship, who, the day before, cast up the accounts of his patrimony and his trade, and named the day when he thought to be at home. See how the man swims, who was so angry two days since; his passions are becalmed with the storm, his accounts cast up, his cares at an end, his voyage done, and his gains are the strange events of death, which whether they be good or evil, the men, that are alive, seldom trouble themselves concerning the interest of the dead.

But seas alone do not break our vessel in pieces; everywhere we may be shipwrecked. A valiant general, when he is to reap the harvest of his crowns and triumphs, fights unprosperously, or falls into a fever with joy and wine, and changes his laurel into cypress, his triumphal chariot to a hearse; dying the night before he was appointed to perish, in the drunkenness of his festival joys. It was a sad arrest of the looseness and wilder feasts of the French court, when their king (Henry II.) was killed really by the sportive image of a fight. . . .

There is no state, no accident, no circumstance of our life, but it hath been soured by some sad instance of a dying friend: a friendly meeting often ends in some sad mischance, and makes an eternal parting: and when the poet Æschylus was sitting under the walls of his house, an eagle hovering over his bald head, mistook it for a stone, and let fall his oyster, hoping there to break the shell, but pierced the poor man's skull.

Death meets us everywhere, and is procured by every instrument and in all chances, and enters in at many doors; by violence and secret influence, by the aspect of a star and the stink of a mist, by the emissions of a cloud and the meeting of a vapour, by the fall of a chariot and the stumbling at a stone, by a full meal or an empty stomach, by watching at the wine or by watching at prayers, by the sun or the moon; by a heat or a cold, by sleepless nights or sleeping days; by water frozen into the hardness and sharpness of a dagger; or water thawed into the floods of a river; by a hair or a raisin;<sup>13</sup> by violent motion or sitting still; by severity or dissolution; by God's mercy or God's anger; by every thing in providence and every thing in manners; by every thing in nature and every thing in chance. Eripitur persona, manet res,<sup>14</sup> we take pains to heap up things useful to our life, and get our death in the purchase; and the person is snatched away, and the goods remain. And all this is the law and constitution of nature; it is a punishment to our sins, the unalterable event of Providence, and the decree of Heaven. The chains that confine us to this condition are strong as destiny and immutable as the eternal laws of God.

I have conversed with some men who rejoiced in the death or calamity of others, and accounted it as a judgment upon them for being on the other side, and against them in the contention; but within the revolution of a few months, the same men met with a more uneasy and unhandsome death: which when I saw, I wept, and was afraid; for I knew that it must be so with all men; for we also shall die, and end our quarrels and contentions by passing to a final sentence.

<sup>13</sup> The poet Anacreon is said to have met his death by swallowing the stone of a raisin.

<sup>14</sup> The person is snatched away, and the goods remain. These words however are employed in a different sense by Lucretius from whom the passage is taken.

ANGER A HINDERENCE TO PRAYER

(From Sermons, 1655)

Anger is a perfect alienation of the mind from prayer, and therefore is contrary to that attention, which presents our prayers in a right line to God. For so have I seen a lark rising from his bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rises, and hopes to get to heaven, and climb above the clouds; but the poor bird was beaten back with the loud sighings of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and inconstant, descending more at every breath of the tempest, than it could recover by the libration and frequent weighing of his wings; till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over; and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing, as if it had learned music and motion from an angel, as he passed sometimes through the air, about his ministries here below: so is the prayer of a good man; when his affairs have required business, and his business was matter of discipline, and his discipline was to pass upon a sinning person, or had a design of charity, his duty met with infirmities of a man, and anger was its instrument, and the instrument became stronger than the prime agent, and raised a tempest, and overruled the man; and then his prayer was broken, and his thoughts were troubled, and his words went up towards a cloud, and his thoughts pulled them back again, and made them without intention; and the good man sighs for his infirmity, but must be content to lose the prayer, and he must recover it when his anger is removed, and his spirit is becalmed, made even as the brow of Jesus, and smooth like the heart of God; and then it ascends to heaven upon the wings of the holy dove, and dwells with God, till it returns, like the useful bee, loaden with a blessing and the dew of heaven.

THE FIGHT WITH APOLLYON

(From The Pilgrim's Progress, 1678-1684)

(In the course of his pilgrimage from the City of Destruction to Mount Zion, Christian comes to the House Beautiful. Here Watchful, the Porter, summons Discretion, "a grave and beautiful damsel," who in turn calls Prudence, Piety, and Charity. All these, after some discourse with Christian, receive him kindly and hear his story. Christian sleeps that night in a "large upper chamber; whose window opened toward the sun-rising;" its name was Peace. In the morning Christian's entertainers take him to the armoury, and show him the armour provided for pilgrims. Christian abides there three days, and on the morning of the third day, they take him to the top of the house, and show him afar off Emmanuel's Land and the Delectable Mountains, telling him that from thence he can see the gate of the Celestial City. Christian then determines to leave the House Beautiful and continue on his pilgrimage.)

Now Christian bethought himself of setting forward, and they were willing he should. But first, said they, let us go again into the armoury. So they did; and when he came there, they harnessed him from head to foot with what was of proof, lest perhaps he should meet with assaults in the way. He, being therefore thus accoutred, walked out with his friends to the gate; and there he asked the Porter if he saw any pilgrim pass by. Then the Porter answered, Yes.

CHR. Pray did you know him?

PORT. I asked his name and he told me it was Faithful.

O, said Christian, I know him: he is my townsman, my near neighbour; he comes from the place where I was born: how far do you think he may be before?

PORT. He is got by this time below the hill.

Well, said Christian, good Porter, the Lord be with thee, and add to all thy blessings much increase, for the kindness that thou hast showed to me.

Then he began to go forward; but Discretion, Piety, Charity, and Prudence, would accompany him down to the foot of the hill. So they went on together, reiterating their former discourses, till they came to go down the hill. Then said Christian, As it was difficult coming up, so, so far as I can see, it is dangerous going down. Yes, said Prudence, so it is; for it is an hard matter for a man to go down into the valley of Humiliation, as thou art now, and to catch no slip by the way; therefore, said they, are we come out to accompany thee down the hill. So he began to go down, but very warily; yet he caught a slip or two.

Then I saw in my dream, that these good companions, when Christian was gone down to the bottom of the hill, gave him a loaf of bread, a bottle of wine, and a cluster of raisins; and then he went his way.

But now, in this valley of Humiliation, poor Christian was hard put to it; for he had gone but a little way, before he espied a foul fiend coming over the field to meet him: his name is Apollyon.<sup>1</sup> Then did Christian begin to be afraid, and to cast in his mind whether to go back, or stand his ground. But he considered again, that he had no armour for his back, and therefore thought that to turn the back to him might give him greater advantage with ease to pierce him with his darts; therefore he resolved to venture and stand his ground: for, thought he, had I no more in mine eye than the saving of my life, it would be the best way to stand.

So he went on, and Apollyon met him. Now the monster was hideous to behold: he was clothed with scales like a fish (and they are his pride); he had wings like a dragon, and feet like a bear, and out of his belly came fire and smoke; and his mouth was as the mouth of a lion. When he was come up to Christian, he beheld him with a disdainful countenance, and thus began to question with him.

APOL. Whence come you? and whither are you bound?

CHR. I am come from the City of Destruction, which is the place of all evil, and am going to the City of Zion.

APOL. By this I perceive that thou art one of my subjects; for all that country is mine, and I am the prince and god of it. How is it then that thou hast run away from thy king? Were it not for that I hope thou mayest do me more service, I would strike thee now at one blow to the ground.

CHR. I was indeed born in your dominions; but your service was hard, and your wages such as a man could not live on; "for the wages of sin is death;" therefore when I was come to years, I did as other considerate persons do, look out, if perhaps I might mend myself.

APOL. There is no prince that will thus lightly lose his subjects, neither will I as yet lose thee; but, since thou complainest of thy service and wages, be content to go back; what our country will afford, I do here promise to give thee.

CHR. But I have let myself to another, even to the King of princes; and how can I with fairness go back with thee?

APOL. Thou hast done in this according to the proverb, "Changed a bad for a worse;" but it is ordinary for those that have professed themselves his servants, after a while to give him the slip, and return again to me. Do thou so too, and all shall be well.

CHR. I have given him my faith, and sworn my allegiance to him: how then can I go back from this, and not be hanged as a traitor?

APOL. Thou didst the same to me; and yet I am willing to pass by all, if now thou wilt yet turn again and go back.

CHR. What I promised thee was in my nonage; and besides, I count that the Prince under whose banner I now stand, is able to absolve me; yea, and to pardon also what I did as to my compliance with thee: and, besides, O thou destroying Apollyon, to speak truth, I like his service, his wages, his servants, his government, his company, and country, 10 better than thine; therefore leave off to persuade me further; I am his servant, and I will follow him.

APOL. Consider again when thou art in cool blood, what thou art likely to meet with in the way that thou goest. Thou knowest that, for the most part, his servants come to an ill end, because they are transgressors against me and my ways. How many of them have been put to shameful deaths! And besides, thou countest his service better than mine; whereas he never came yet from the place where he is, to deliver any that served him out of their hands: but, as for me, how many times, as all the world very well knows, have I delivered, either 25 by power or fraud, those that have faithfully served me, from him and his, though taken by them! And so I will deliver thee.

CHR. His forbearing at present to deliver them is on purpose to try their love, whether they will cleave to him to the end: and, as for the ill end thou sayest they come to, that is most glorious in their account; for, for present deliverance, they do not much expect it; for they stay for their glory, and then they shall have it, when their Prince comes in his and the glory of the angels.

APOL. Thou hast already been unfaithful in thy service to him; and how dost thou think to receive wages of him?

CHR. Wherein, O Apollyon, have I been unfaithful to him?

APOL. Thou didst faint at first setting out, when thou wast almost choked in the Gulf of Despond; thou didst attempt wrong ways to be rid of thy burden, whereas thou shouldst have stayed till thy Prince had taken it off: thou didst sinfully sleep, and lose thy choice things: thou wast almost persuaded to go back at the sight of the lions: and when thou talkest 50 of thy journey, and of what thou hast seen and heard, thou art inwardly desirous of vain-glory in all that thou sayest or doest.

CHR. All this is true and much more which thou hast left out: but the Prince, whom I serve 55 and honour, is merciful and ready to forgive. But besides, these infirmities possessed me in thy country: for there I sucked them in, and I have groaned under them, being sorry for them, and have obtained pardon of my Prince.

Then Apollyon broke out into a grievous rage, saying, I am an enemy to this Prince; I hate his person, his laws, and people: I am come out on purpose to withstand thee.

CHR. Apollyon, beware what you do; for I am in the King's high-way, the way of holiness; therefore take heed to yourself.

Then Apollyon straddled quite over the whole breadth of the way, and said, I am void of fear in this matter; prepare thyself to die; for I swear by my infernal den, that thou shalt go no farther; here will I spill thy soul.

And with that he threw a flaming dart at his breast; but Christian had a shield in his hand, with which he caught it, and so prevented the danger of that.

Then did Christian draw; for he saw it was time to bestir him; and Apollyon as fast made at him, throwing darts as thick as hail; by the which, notwithstanding all that Christian could do to avoid it, Apollyon wounded him in his head, his hand, and foot. This made Christian give a little back: Apollyon, therefore, followed his work amain, and Christian again took courage and resisted as manfully as he could. This sore combat lasted for above half a day, even till Christian was almost quite spent; for you must know that Christian, by reason of his wounds, must needs grow weaker and weaker.

Then Apollyon, espying his opportunity, began to gather up close to Christian, and wrestling with him, gave him a dreadful fall; and with that Christian's sword flew out of his hand. Then said Apollyon, I am sure of thee now: and with that he had almost pressed him to death; so that Christian began to despair of 40 life. But, as God would have it, while Apollyon was fetching his last blow, thereby to make a full end of this good man, Christian nimbly reached out his hand for his sword, and caught it, saying, "Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, when I fall, I shall arise;" and with that gave him a deadly thrust, which made him give back as one that had received his mortal wound. Christian, perceiving that, made at him again, saying, "Nay, in all these things we are more 50 than conquerors, through Him that loved us." And, with that, Apollyon spread forth his dragon's wings and sped him away that Christian saw him no more.

In this combat no man can imagine, unless he had seen and heard, as I did, what yelling and hideous roaring Apollyon made all the time of the fight; he spake like a dragon:—and on the other side, what sighs and groans burst from Christian's heart. I never saw him all the while give so much as one pleasant look, till he perceived that he had wounded Apollyon with his two-edged sword; then indeed he did smile and look upward! But it was the dreadfullest fight that ever I saw.

So when the battle was over, Christian said, I will here give thanks to Him that hath delivered me out of the mouth of the lion, to Him that did help me against Apollyon. And so he did, saying,

"Great Beelzebub, the captain of this fiend,
Design'd my ruin: therefore to this end
He sent him harness'd out; and he with rage
That hellish was, did fiercely me engage:
But blessed Michael helped me; and I,
By dint of sword, did quickly made him fly:
Therefore to Him let me give lasting praise
And thanks, and bless His holy name always."

Then there came to him an hand with some of the leaves of the tree of life; the which Christian took, and applied to the wounds that he had received in the battle, and was healed immediately. He also sat down in that place to eat bread, and to drink of the bottle that was given to him a little before: so, being refreshed, he addressed himself to his journey, with his sword drawn in his hand; for, he said, I know not but some other enemy may be at hand. But he met with no other affront from Apollyon quite through this valley.

TRACTATE ON EDUCATION. LETTER TO HARTLIB

I am long since persuaded that to say and do aught worth memory and imitation, no purpose or respect should sooner move us than simply the love of God and of mankind. Nevertheless, to write now the reforming of education, though it be one of the greatest and noblest designs that can be thought on, and for the want whereof this nation perishes, I had not yet at this time been induced but by your earnest entreaties and serious conjurements; as having my mind for the present half diverted into the pursuance of some other assertions, the knowledge and the use of which cannot but be a great furtherance both to the enlargement of truth and honest living with much more peace. Nor should the laws of any private friendship have prevailed with me to divide thus, or transpose my former thoughts; but that I see those aims, those actions, which have won you with me<sup>2</sup> the esteem of a person sent hither by some good providence from a far country to be the occasion and incitement of great good to this island, and as I hear you have obtained the same repute with men of most approved wisdom and some of the highest authority among us, not to mention the learned correspondence which you hold in foreign parts, and the extraordinary pains and diligence which you have used in this matter both here and beyond the seas, either by the definite will of God so ruling, or the peculiar sway of nature, which also is God's working. Neither can I think, that so reputed and so valued as you are, you would, to the forfeit of your own discerning ability, impose upon me an unfit and over-ponderous argument; but that the satisfaction which you profess to have received from those incidental discourses which we have wandered into, hath pressed and almost constrained you into a persuasion, that what you require from me in this point, I neither ought nor can in conscience defer beyond this time both of so much need at once, and so much opportunity to try what God hath determined.

I will not resist, therefore, whatever it is either of divine or human obligation that you lay upon me; but will forthwith set down in writing, as you request me, that voluntary idea, which hath long in silence presented itself to me, of a better education, in extent and comprehension far more large, and yet of time far shorter and of attainment far more certain, than hath been yet in practice. Brief I shall endeavour to be; for that which I have to say, assuredly this nation hath extreme need should be done sooner than spoken. To tell you, therefore, that I have benefited herein among old renowned authors I shall spare; and to search what many modern Januas and Didactics,<sup>3</sup> more than ever I shall read, have projected, my inclination leads me not. But if you can accept of these few observations which have flowered off, and are, as it were, the burnishing of many studious and contemplative years

<sup>3</sup> Januas = either those books which serve as entrances or introductions to a subject (Lat. Janua, a door, an entrance), or, more probably, the authors of such books. Didactics = either works of a didactic, or teaching, character, or, preferably, the authors of such works.

altogether spent in the search of religious and civil knowledge, and such as pleased you so well in the relating, I here give you them to dispose of.

The end, then, of learning is, to repair the ruins of our first parents by regaining to know God aright, and out of that knowledge to love him, to imitate him, to be like him, as we may the nearest by possessing our souls of true virtue, which, being united to the heavenly grace of faith, makes up the highest perfection. But because our understanding cannot in this body find itself but on sensible things, nor arrive so clearly to the knowledge of God and things invisible, as by orderly coming over the visible and inferior creature, the same method is necessarily to be followed in all discreet teaching. And seeing every nation affords not experience and tradition enough for all kinds of learning, therefore we are chiefly taught the languages of those people who have at any time been most industrious after wisdom; so that language is but the instrument conveying to us things useful to be known. And though a linguist should pride himself to have all the tongues that Babel cleft the world into, yet if he have not studied the solid things in them, as well as the words and lexicons, he were nothing so much to be esteemed a learned man, as any yeoman or tradesman competently wise in his mother-dialect only. Hence appear the many mistakes which have made learning generally so unpleasing and so unsuccessful. First, we do amiss to spend seven or eight years merely in scraping together so much miserable Latin and Greek as might be learned otherwise easily and delightfully in one year. And that which casts our proficiency therein so much behind, is our time lost partly in too oft idle vacancies<sup>4</sup> given both to schools and universities; partly in a preposterous exaction, forcing the empty wits of children to compose themes, verses, and orations, which are the acts of ripest judgment, and the final work of a head filled by long reading and observing, with elegant maxims and copious invention. These are not matters to be wrung from poor striplings, like blood out of the nose, or the plucking of untimely fruit; besides the ill habit which they get of wretched barbarising against the Latin and Greek idiom with their untutored Anglicisms, odious to be read, yet not to be avoided without a well-continued and judicious conversing among pure authors, digested, which they scarce taste. Whereas, if after some preparatory grounds of speech by their certain forms got into memory, they were led to the praxis<sup>5</sup> hereof in some chosen short book lessoned thoroughly to them, they might then forthwith proceed to learn the substance of good things and arts in due order, which would bring the whole language quickly into their power. This I take to be the most rational and most profitable way of learning languages, and whereby we may best hope to give account to God of our youth spent herein. And for the usual method of teaching arts, I deem it to be an old error of universities, not yet well recovered from the scholastic grossness of barbarous ages, that instead of beginning with arts most easy (and those be such as are most obvious to the sense), they present their young unmatriculated novices, at first coming, with the most intellective abstractions of logic and metaphysics; so that they having but newly left those grammatic flats and shallows, where they stuck unreasonably, to learn a few words with lamentable construction, and now on the sudden transported under another climate, to be tossed and turmoiled with their unballasted wits in fathomless and unquiet deeps of controversy, do, for the most part, grow into hatred and contempt of learning, mocked and deluded all this while with ragged notions and babblements, while they expected worthy and delightful knowledge; till poverty or youthful years call them importunately their friends, either to an ambitious and mercenary, or ignorantly zealous divinity: some allured to the trade of law, grounding their purposes not on the prudent and heavenly contemplation of justice and equity, which was never taught them, but on the promising and pleasing thoughts of litigious terms, fat contentions, and flowing fees; others betake them to state affairs, with souls so unprincipled in virtue and true generous breeding, that flattery and court-shifts, and tyrannous aphorisms appear to them the highest points of wisdom; instilling their barren hearts with a conscientious slavery; if, as I rather think, it be not feigned: others, lastly, of a more delicious and airy spirit,<sup>6</sup> retire themselves, knowing no better, to the enjoyments of ease and luxury, living out their days in feast and jollity; which indeed is the wisest and safest course of all these, unless they were with more integrity undertaken. And these are the errors, and these are the fruits of mispending our prime youth at the schools and universities, as we do, either in learning mere words, or such things chiefly as were better unlearned.

I shall detain you now no longer in the demonstration of what we should not do, but straight conduct you to a hillside, where I will point you out the right path of a virtuous and noble education; laborious indeed at the first ascent, but else so smooth, so green, so full of goodly prospect, and melodious sounds on every side, that the harp of Orpheus was not more charming. I doubt not but ye shall have more ado to drive our duller and laziest youth, our stocks and stubs,<sup>7</sup> from the infinite desire of such a happy nurture, than we have now to hale and drag our choicest and hope-fullest wits to that asinine feast of sow-thistles and brambles, which is commonly set before them as all the food and entertainment of their tenderest and most docible age. I call, therefore, a complete and generous education, that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war. And how all this may be done between twelve and one-and-twenty, less time than is now bestowed in pure trifling at grammar and sophistry, is to be thus ordered:—

First, to find out a spacious house and ground about it fit for an academy, and big enough to lodge a hundred and fifty persons, whereof twenty or thereabout may be attendants, all under the government of one, who shall be thought of desert sufficient, and ability either to do all, or wisely to direct and oversee it done. This place should be at once both school and university, not needing a remove to any other house of scholarship, except it be some peculiar college of law, or physic, where they mean to be practitioners; but as for those general studies which take up all our time from Lilly<sup>8</sup> to commencing, as they term it, master of art, it should be absolute. After this pattern as many edifices may be converted to this use as shall be needful in every city throughout this land, which would tend much to the increase of learning and civility everywhere. This number,<sup>9</sup> less or more, thus collected, to the convenience of a foot-company, or interchangeably two troops of cavalry, should divide their day's work into three parts as it lies orderly—their studies, their exercise, and their diet.

For their studies: first, they should begin with the chief and necessary rules of some good <sup>7</sup> Stocks and stubs are identical, both meaning lifeless, insensible blocks, or trunks. Cf. stocks and stones.

<sup>8</sup> I. e., from the time when he begins his studies with Lilly's Latin Grammar to commencing or Commencement Day, when he completes them as Master of Arts. "To commence M. A." (as Milton tells us) was the regular, or technical equivalent for "to take the degree of M. A."

<sup>9</sup> I. e., this number of students (150, as above suggested) having been thus collected to about the convenience of a foot-company (the number of a foot-company when convened), or, what is the same thing, to the number of two troops of cavalry. There were about as many men in two cavalry troops as in one company of foot.

grammar, either that now used, or any better; and while this is doing, their speech is to be fashioned to a distinct and clear pronunciation, as near as may be to the Italian, especially in the vowels. For we Englishmen, being far northerly, do not open our mouths in the cold air wide enough to grace a southern tongue, but are observed by all other nations to speak exceeding close and inward; so that to smatter Latin with an English mouth is as ill a hearing as law French. Next, to make them expert in the usefulest points of grammar, and withal to season them and win them early to the love of virtue and true labour, ere any flattering seducement or vain principle seize them wandering, some easy and delightful book of education should be read to them, whereof the Greeks have store, as Cebes,<sup>10</sup> Plutarch, and other Socratic discourses; but in Latin we have none of classic authority extant, except the two or three first books of Quintilian<sup>11</sup> and some select pieces elsewhere.

But here the main skill and groundwork will be, to temper them such lectures and explanations upon every opportunity as may lead and draw them in willing obedience, inflamed with the study of learning and the admiration of virtue, stirred up with high hopes of living to be brave men and worthy patriots, dear to God and famous to all ages: that they may despise and scorn all their childish and ill-taught qualities, to delight in manly and liberal exercises; which he who hath the art and proper eloquence to catch them with, what with mild and effectual persuasions, and what with the intimation of some fear, if need be, but chiefly by his own example, might in a short space gain them to an incredible diligence and courage, infusing into their young breasts such an ingenuous and noble ardour as would not fail to make many of them renowned and matchless men. At the same time, some other hour of the day might be taught them the rules of arithmetic, and, soon after, the elements of geometry, even playing, as the old manner was. After evening repast till bed-time their thoughts would be best taken up in the easy grounds of religion and the story of Scripture.

The next step would be to the authors of agriculture, Cato, Varro, and Columella,<sup>12</sup> for the matter is most easy; and if the language be difficult, so much the better; it is not a difficulty above their years. And here will be an occasion of inciting and enabling them hereafter to improve the tillage of their country, to recover the bad soil, and to remedy the waste that is made of good; for this was one of Hercules' praises. Ere half these authors be read (which will soon be with plying hard and daily) they cannot choose but be masters of any ordinary prose: so that it will be then seasonable for them to learn in any modern author the use of the 10 globes and all the maps, first with the old names and then with the new; or they might then be capable to read any compendious method of natural philosophy; and, at the same time, might be entering into the Greek tongue, 15 after the same manner as was before prescribed in the Latin; whereby the difficulties of grammar being soon overcome, all the historical physiology of Aristotle and Theophrastus<sup>13</sup> are open before them, and, as I may say, under 20 contribution. The like access will be to Vitruvius, to Seneca's "Natural Questions," to Mela, Celsus, Pliny, or Solinus.<sup>14</sup> And having thus past the principles of arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and geography, with a 25 general compact of physics, they may descend in mathematics to the instrumental science of trigonometry, and from thence to fortification, architecture, enginery, or navigation. And in natural philosophy they may proceed leisurely 30 from the history of meteors, minerals, plants, and living creatures, as far as anatomy. Then also in course might be read to them out of some not tedious writer, the institution of physics; that they may know the tempers, the 35 humours, the seasons, and how to manage a crudity,<sup>15</sup> which he who can wisely and timely do is not only a great physician to himself and to his friends, but also may at some time or other save an army by this frugal and expense- 40 less means only, and not let the healthy and stout bodies of young men rot away under him for want of this discipline, which is a great pity, and no less a shame to the commander. To set forward all these proceedings in nature and 45 mathematics, what hinders but that they may procure, as oft as shall be needful, the helpful experience of hunters, fowlers, fishermen, shepherds, gardeners, apothecaries; and in the other sciences, architects, engineers, mariners, 50 anatomists, who, doubtless, would be ready, some for reward and some to favour such a hopeful seminary. And this would give them such a real tincture of natural knowledge as they shall never forget, but daily augment with 55 delight. Then also those poets which are now counted most hard will be both facile and pleasant, Orpheus, Hesiod, Theocritus, Aratus, Nicander, Oppian, Dionysius; and, in Latin, 5 Lucretius, Manilius, and the rural part of Virgil.

By this time years and good general precepts will have furnished them more distinctly with that act of reason which in ethics is called Proairesis;<sup>16</sup> that they may with some judgment contemplate upon moral good and evil. Then will be required a special reinforcement of constant and sound indoctrinating to set them right and firm, instructing them more amply 15 in the knowledge of virtue and the hatred of vice; while their young and pliant affections are led through all the moral works of Plato, Xenophon, Cicero, Plutarch, Laertius, and those Lorian remnants;<sup>17</sup> but still to be re- 20 duced in their nightward studies wherewith they close the day's work under the determinate sentence of David or Solomon, or the evangelists and apostolic scriptures. Being perfect in the knowledge of personal duty, they may then begin the study of economics. And either now or before this, they may have easily 25 learned, at any odd hour, the Italian tongue. And soon after, but with wariness and good antidote, it would be wholesome enough to let them taste some choice comedies, Greek, Latin, or Italian; those tragedies also that treat of household matters, as Trachiniae,<sup>18</sup> Alcestis,<sup>19</sup> and the like.

The next removal must be to the study of 35 politics; to know the beginning, end, and reasons of political societies, that they may not, in a dangerous fit of the commonwealth, be such poor shaken uncertain reeds, of such a tottering conscience as many of our great 40 councillors have lately shown themselves, but steadfast pillars of the State. After this they are to dive into the grounds of law and legal justice, delivered first and with best warrant by Moses, and, as far as human prudence can 45 be trusted, in those extolled remains of Grecian lawgivers, Lycurgus, Solon, Zaleucus, Charondas; and thence to all the Roman edicts and tables, with their Justinian; and so down to the Saxon and common laws of England and the 50 statutes.

Sundays also and every evening may be now

<sup>16</sup> Aristotle uses this word in his Ethics to express a deliberate preference for one thing over another, as distinguished from a sudden or unpremeditated action, and declares that the exercise of this deliberate preference is "most intimately connected with virtue."

<sup>17</sup> Probably, as much of the work of the philosopher Timæus of Locri, as has come down to us. A work On the Soul of the World and of Nature was formerly attributed to him, but his authorship of it is disputed.

<sup>13</sup> A Greek philosopher and scientist (b. c. 371 B. C.) who has been called the founder of botany.

understandingly spent in the highest matters of theology and church history, ancient and modern: and ere this time the Hebrew tongue at a set hour might have been gained, that the Scriptures may be now read in their own original; whereto it would be no impossibility to add the Chaldee and the Syrian dialect. When all these employments are well conquered, then will the choice histories, heroic poems, and Attic tragedies of stateliest and most regal argument, with all the famous political orations, offer themselves; which, if they were not only read, but some of them got by memory, and solemnly pronounced with right accent and grace, as might be taught, would endure them even with the spirit and vigour of Demosthenes or Cicero, Euripides or Sophocles.

And now, lastly, will be the time to read with them those organic arts<sup>20</sup> which enable men to discourse and write perspicuously, elegantly, 20 and according to the fittest style of lofty, mean, or lowly. Logic, therefore, so much as is useful, is to be referred to this due place, with all her well-couched heads and topics, until it be time to open her contracted palm into a graceful and ornate rhetoric, taught out of the rule of Plato, Aristotle, Phalereus, Cicero, Hermogenes, Longinus. To which poetry would be made subsequent, or, indeed, rather precedent, as being less subtle and fine, but more 30 simple, sensuous, and passionate. I mean not here the prosody of a verse, which they could not but have hit on before among the rudiments of grammar, but that sublime art which in Aristotle's Poetics, in Horace, and the Italian commentaries of Castelvetro, Tasso, Mazzoni,<sup>21</sup> and others, teaches what the laws are of a true epic poem, what of a dramatic, what of a lyric, what decorum is, which is the grand masterpiece to observe. This would make them soon 40 perceive what despicable creatures our common rhymers and play-writers be; and show them what religious, what glorious and magnificent use might be made of poetry, both in divine and human things.

From hence, and not till now, will be the right season of forming them to be able writers and composers in every excellent matter, when they shall be thus fraught with an universal insight into things: or whether they be to speak 50 in parliament or council, honour and attention would be waiting on their lips. There would then also appear in pulpits other visages, other gestures, and stuff otherwise wrought, than what we now sit under, oft-times to as great a trial of our patience as any other that they preach to us. These are the studies wherein 5 our noble and our gentle youth ought to bestow their time in a disciplinary way from twelve to one-and-twenty, unless they rely more upon their ancestors dead than upon themselves living. In which methodical course it is so supposed they must proceed by the steady pace of learning onward, as at convenient times for memory's sake to retire back into the middle ward, and sometimes into the rear of what they have been taught, until they have confirmed and solidly united the whole body of their perfected knowledge, like the last embattling of a Roman legion.<sup>22</sup> Now will be worth the seeing what exercises and recreations may best agree and become these studies.

THEIR EXERCISE

The course of study hitherto briefly described is, what I can guess by reading, likeliest to those ancient and famous schools of Pythagoras, 25 Plato, Isocrates, Aristotle, and such others, out of which were bred such a number of renowned philosophers, orators, historians, poets, and princes all over Greece, Italy, and Asia, besides the flourishing studies of Cyrene and Alexandria. But herein it shall exceed them, and supply a defect as great as that which Plato noted in the commonwealth of Sparta. Whereas that city trained up their youth most for war, and these in their academies and 35 Lycaum all for the gown, this institution of breeding which I here delineate shall be equally good both for peace and war. Therefore, about an hour and a half ere they eat at noon should be allowed them for exercise, and due rest afterwards; but the time for this may be enlarged at pleasure, according as their rising in the morning shall be early. The exercise which I commend first is the exact use of their weapon, to guard, and to strike safely with edge or 45 point. This will keep them healthy, nimble, strong, and well in breath; is also the likeliest means to make them grow large and tall, and to inspire them with a gallant and fearless courage, which being tempered with seasonal lectures and precepts to them of true fortitude and patience, will turn into a native and heroic valour, and make them hate the cowardice of doing wrong. They must be also practised in all the locks and gripes of wrestling, wherein Englishmen were wont to excel, as need may often be in fight to tug, to grapple, and to close. And this, perhaps, will be enough wherein to prove and heat their single strength. The interim of unsweating themselves regularly, and convenient rest before meat, may both with profit and delight be taken up in recreating and composing their travailed spirits with the solemn and divine harmonies of music heard or learned, either whilst the skilful organist plies his grave and fancied descant in lofty fugues, or the whole symphony with artful and unimaginable touches adorn and grace the well-studied chords of some choice composer; sometimes the lute or soft organ-stop, waiting on elegant voices either to religious, martial, or civil ditties, which, if wise men and prophets be not extremely out, have a great power over dispositions and manners to smooth and make them gentle from rustic harshness and distempered passions. The like also would not be unexpedient after meat, to assist and cherish nature in her first concoction, and send their minds back to study in good tune and satisfaction. Where having followed it close under vigilant eyes until about two hours before supper, they are, by a sudden alarm or watchword, to be called out to their military motions, under sky or covert, according to the season, as was the Roman wont; first on foot, then, as their age permits, on horseback, to all the art of cavalry; that having in sport, but with much exactness and daily muster, served out the rudiments of their soldiership in all the skill of embattling, marching, encamping, fortifying, besieging, and battering, with all the helps of ancient and modern stratagems, tactics, and warlike maxims, they may, as it were out of a long war, come forth renowned and perfect commanders in the service of their country. They would not then, if they were trusted with fair and hopeful armies, suffer them for want of just and wise discipline to shed away from about them like sick feathers, though they be never so oft supplied; they would not suffer their empty and unrecrutable colonels of twenty men in a company to quaff out or convey into secret hoards the wages of a delusive list and miserable remnant; yet in the meanwhile to be overmastered with a score or two of drunkards, the only soldiery left about them, or else to comply with all rapines and violences. No, certainly, if they knew aught of that knowledge that belongs to good men or good governors they would not suffer these things.

<sup>20</sup> Arts which are not an end in themselves, but instrumental to the attainment of some further end.

In the last embattling those who had originally been in advance would thus be in the rear.

these constant exercises at home, there is another opportunity of gaining experience to be won from pleasure itself abroad: in those vernal seasons of the year, when the air is calm and pleasant, it were an injury and sullenness against nature not to go out and see her riches and partake in her rejoicing with heaven and earth. I should not, therefore, be a persuader to them of studying much then, after two or three years that they have well laid their grounds, but to ride out in companies with prudent and staid guides to all the quarters of the land, learning and observing all places of strength, all commodities of building and of soil for towns and tillage, harbours, and ports for trade. Sometimes taking sea as far as to our navy, to learn there also what they can in the practical knowledge of sailing and of sea-fight. These ways would try all their peculiar gifts of nature, and if there were any secret excellence among them, would fetch it out and give it fair opportunities to advance itself by, which could not but mightily redound to the good of this nation, and bring into fashion again those old admired virtues and excellencies with far more knowledge now in this purity of Christian knowledge. Nor shall we then need the mon-sieurs of Paris to take our hopeful youth into their slight and prodigal custodies, and send them over back again transformed into mimics, apes, and kekshose.<sup>23</sup> But if they desire to see other countries at three or four and twenty years of age, not to learn principles, but to enlarge experience and make wise observation, they will by that time be such as shall deserve the regard and honour of all men where they pass, and the society and friendship of those in all places who are best and most eminent. And perhaps then other nations will be glad to visit us for their breeding, or else to imitate us in their own country.

Now, lastly, for their diet there cannot be much to say, save only that it would be best in the same house; for much time else would be lost abroad, and many ill habits got; and that it should be plain, healthful, and moderate, I suppose is out of controversy.

Thus, Mr. Hartlib, you have a general view in writing, as your desire was, of that which at several times I had discoursed with you concerning the best and noblest way of education; not beginning, as some have done, from the cradle, which yet might be worth many considerations, if brevity had not been my scope. Many other circumstances also I could have mentioned, but this, to such as have the worth in them to make trial, for light and direction may be enough. Only I believe that this is not a bow for every man to shoot in, that counts himself a teacher, but will require sinews almost equal to those which Homer gave Ulysses; yet I am withal persuaded that it may prove much more easy in the assay than it now seems at distance, and much more illustrious: howbeit, not more difficult than I imagine, and that imagination presents me with nothing but very happy and very possible according to best wishes, if God have so decreed, and this age have spirit and capacity enough to apprehend.

(Selections)

If ye be thus resolved,<sup>2</sup> as it were injury to think ye were not, I know not what should withhold me from presenting ye with a fit instance wherein to show both that love of truth which ye eminently profess, and that uprightness of your judgment which is not wont to be partial to yourselves; by judging over again that Order which ye have ordained<sup>3</sup> to regulate Printing: That no Book, pamphlet, or paper shall be henceforth Printed, unless the same be first approved and licensed by such, or at least one of such as shall be thereto appointed. For that part which preserves justly every man's copy to himself, or provides for the poor, I touch not, only wish they be not made pretences to abuse and persecute honest and painful men, who offend not in either of these particulars. But that other clause of Licensing Books, which we thought had died with his brother quadragesimal<sup>4</sup> and matrimonial when the prelates expired, I shall now attend with such a homily, as shall lay before ye, first the inventors of it, to be those whom ye will be loth to own; next what is to be thought in general of reading, whatever sort the books be; and that this Order avails nothing to the suppressing of scandalous, seditious, and libellous books, which were mainly intended to be suppressed. Last, that it will be primarily to the discouragement of all learning, and the stop of Truth, not only by the disexercising and blunting our abilities in what we know already, but by hindering and cropping the discovery that might be yet further made both in religious and civil Wisdom.

I deny not, but that it is of greatest concernment in the Church and Commonwealth, to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors: For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous Dragon's teeth;<sup>5</sup> and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book: who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were in the eye.<sup>6</sup> Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse. We should be wary therefore what persecution we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom, and if it extend to the whole impression,<sup>7</sup> a kind of massacre, whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence,<sup>8</sup> the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life.

<sup>1</sup> i. e., address to the Areopagus. By the Areopagus Milton means the English Parliament, which he thus likens to the Greek Areopagus, the high council and court of ancient Athens. One of the orations of Isocrates, the Attic orator, is known as Logos Areopagitikos, the Areopagitic Discourse. As Isocrates appealed to the ancient Areopagus (the high court of Ares, "or Mars," Hill), so Milton appeals to the modern Areopagus, "the Lords and Commons of England" assembled in Parliament, and hence he calls his appeal an Areopagitic address.

<sup>2</sup> i. e., resolved to do what has just been urged by Milton in the preceding passage; viz. to "obey the voice of reason from whatever quarter it be heard speaking," and to repeal any Parliamentary act of your own as willingly as you would one passed by your predecessors in Parliament.

<sup>4</sup> Pertaining to Lent, a season of forty days. Ecclesiastical rules for the observance of Lent, and ecclesiastical views of marriage (which Milton regarded as a civil contract and not as a sacrament) had "died when the prelates expired," but the censorship of the press (which Milton calls their brother) is continued.

<sup>8</sup> Aristotle holds that there are five elements, earth, water, air, fire, ether; the last is the "fifth element," or quintessence (fifth essence), which is not subject to change. He who destroys all the copies of a book, does not merely destroy a thing subject to change (like the first four elements), he destroys part of a man's spirit preserved and stored up in a good book beyond the term of mortal life, he slays the "fifth essence," the man's ethereal part, "an immortality rather than a life."

But lest I should be condemned of introducing license, while I oppose licensing, I refuse not the pains to be so much historical, as will serve to show what hath been done by ancient and famous commonwealths, against this disorder, till the very time that this project of licensing crept out of the Inquisition, was caught up by our prelates, and hath caught some of our presbyters.

[An historical survey here follows, showing the position of the authorities in Athens, Lacedæmon, and Rome, in regard to the question at issue. Continuing the history through early Christian times, Milton finally contends that the system of press censorship, which he condemned, was "engendered" by the Council of Trent (1546) and the Spanish Inquisition.]

Dionysius Alexandrinus was about the year 240, a person of great name in the Church for piety and learning, who had went to avail himself much against heretics by being conversant in their books; until a certain presbyter laid it scrupulously to his conscience, how he durst venture himself among those defiling volumes. The worthy man, loth to give offence, fell into a new debate with himself what was to be thought; when suddenly a vision sent from God (it is his own epistle that so avers it) confirmed him in these words: Read any books whatever come to thy hands, for thou art sufficient both to judge aright, and to examine each matter. To this revelation he assented the sooner, as he confesses, because it was answerable to that of the Apostle to the Thessalonians: Prove all things, hold fast that which is good. And he might have added another remarkable saying of the same author: To the pure, all things are pure; not only meats and drinks, but all kind of knowledge whether of good or evil; the knowledge cannot defile, nor consequently the books, if the will and conscience be not defiled. For books are as meats and viands are; some of good, some of evil substance; and yet God in that unapocryphal vision, said without exception: Rise, Peter, kill and eat, leaving the choice to each man's discretion. Wholesome meats to a vitiated stomach differ little or nothing from unwholesome; and best books to a naughty mind are not unapplicable to occasions of evil. Bad meats will scarce breed good nourishment in the healthiest concoction; but herein the difference is of bad books, that they to a discreet and judicious reader serve in many respects to discover, to confute, to forewarn, and to illustrate. Whereof what better witness can ye expect I should produce, than one of your own now sitting in Parliament, the chief of learned men reputed in this land, Mr. Selden,<sup>9</sup> whose volume of natural and national laws proves, not only by great authorities brought together, but by exquisite reasons and theorems almost mathematically demonstrative, that all opinions, yea errors, known, read, and collated, are of main service and assistance toward the speedy attainment of what is truest. I conceive, therefore, that when God did enlarge the universal diet of man's body, saving ever the rules of temperance, He then also, as before, left arbitrary the dieting and repasting of our minds; as wherein every mature man might have to exercise his own leading capacity. How great a virtue is temperance, how much of moment through the whole life of man! yet God commits the managing so great a trust, without particular law or prescription, wholly to the demeanour of every grown man. And therefore when He Himself tabled the Jews from heaven, that omer, which was every man's daily portion of manna, is computed to have been more than might have well sufficed the heartiest feeder thrice as many meals. For those actions which enter into a man, rather than issue out of him, and therefore defile not, God uses not to captivate under a perpetual childhood of prescription, but trusts him with the gift of reason to be his own chooser; there were but little work left for preaching, if law and compulsion should grow so fast upon those things which heretofore were governed only by exhortation. Solomon informs us, that much reading is a weariness to the flesh; but neither he nor other inspired author tells us that such, or such reading is unlawful: yet certainly had God thought good to limit us herein, it had been much more expedient to have told us what was unlawful, than what was wearisome. As for the burning of those Ephesian books by St. Paul's converts;<sup>10</sup> 'tis replied the books were magic, the Syriac so renders them. It was a private act, a voluntary act, and leaves us to a voluntary imitation: the men in remorse burnt those books which were their own; the magistrate by this example is not appointed: these men practised the books, another might perhaps have read them in some sort usefully. Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed on Psyche<sup>11</sup> as an incessant labour to cull out, and sort asunder, were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say of knowing good by evil. As therefore the state of man now is; what wisdom can there be to choose, what continuance to forbear without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental whiteness;<sup>12</sup> which was the reason why our sage and serious poet Spenser, whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas, describing true temperance under the person of Guion,<sup>13</sup> brings him in with his palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain. Since therefore the knowledge and survey of vice is in the world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger scout into the regions of sin and falsity than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read. . . .

If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric. There must be licensing dancers, that no gesture, motion, or deportment be taught our youth but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of; it will ask more than the work of twenty licensers to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers? The windows also, and the balconies must be thought on, there are shrewd books, with dangerous frontispieces, set to sale; who shall prohibit them, shall twenty licensers? The villages also must have their visitors to inquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebeck reads even to the ballatry,<sup>14</sup> and the gamut of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadias, and his Monte Mayors.<sup>15</sup> Next, what more national corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, than household gluttony: who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting? And what shall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent those houses where drunkenness is sold and harboured? Our garments also should be referred to the licensing of some more sober workmasters to see them cut into a less wanton garb. Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth, male and female together, as is the fashion of this country, who shall still appoint what shall be discoursed, what presumed, and no further? Lastly, who shall forbid and separate all idle resort, all evil company? These things will be, and must be; but how they shall be least hurtful, how least enticing, herein consists the grave and governing wisdom of a state. To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian polities,<sup>16</sup> which never can be drawn into use, will not mend our condition; but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. . . .

Lords and Commons of England, consider what Nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious, and piercing spirit, acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of Learning in her deepest sciences have been so ancient, and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity, and ablest judgment have been persuaded that even the school of Pythagoras, and the Persian wisdom took beginning from the old philosophy of this island. And that wise and civil Roman, Julius Agricola, who governed once here for

Cæsar, preferred the natural wits of Britain, before the laboured studies of the French. Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian<sup>17</sup> sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia, and beyond the Hercynian wilderness,<sup>18</sup> not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language, and our theologic arts. Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of Heaven, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending towards us. Why else was this Nation chosen before any other, that out of her as out of Sion should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet of Reformation to all Europe? And had it not been the obstinate perverseness of our prelates against the divine and admirable spirit of Wickliff, to suppress him as a schismatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian Huss and Jerome,<sup>19</sup> no nor the name of Luther, or of Calvin had been ever known: the glory of reforming all our neighbours had been completely ours. But now, as our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter, we are become hitherto the latest and backward scholars, of whom God offered to have made us the teachers. Now once again by all concurrence of signs, and by the general instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in His Church, even to the reforming of Reformation itself. What does He then but reveal Himself to His servants, and as His manner is, first to His Englishmen; I say as His manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of His counsels, and are unworthy. Behold now this vast City: a city of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with His protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguered truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and conviction. What could a man require more from a Nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil, but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a Nation of Prophets, of Sages, and of Worthies? We reckon more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already. Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism, we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city. What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-reputed care of their Religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join, and unite in one general and brotherly search after Truth; could we but forego this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not, if some great and worthy stranger should come among us, wise to discern the mould and temper of a people, and how to govern it, observing the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reasonings in the pursuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pyrrhus<sup>20</sup> did, admiring the Roman docility and courage: If such were my Epirots,<sup>21</sup> I would not despair the greatest design that could be attempted to make a Church or Kingdom happy. Yet these are the men cried out against for schismatics and sectaries; as if, while the temple of the Lord was building, some cutting, some squaring the marble, others hewing the cedars, there should be a sort<sup>22</sup> of irrational men who could not consider there must be many schisms and many dissections made in the quarry and in the timber, ere the house of God can be built. And when every stone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world; neither can every piece of the building be of one form; nay rather the perfection consists in this: that out of many moderate varieties and brotherly dissimilitudes that are not vastly disproportional, arises the goodly and the graceful symmetry that commends the whole pile and structure. Let us therefore be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture, when great reformation is expected. For now the time seems come, wherein Moses the great prophet may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious work of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy Elders, but all the Lord's people,<sup>23</sup> are become prophets. No marvel then though some men, and some good men too, perhaps, but young in 10 goodness, as Joshua then was, envy them. They fret, and out of their own weakness are in agony, lest these divisions and subdivisions will undo us. The adversary again applauds, and waits the hour; when they have branched themselves out, saith he, small enough into parties and partitions, then will be our time. Fool! he sees not the firm root, out of which we all grow, though into branches: nor will beware until he see our small divided maniples<sup>24</sup> cutting through at every angle of his ill-united and unwieldy brigade. And that we are to hope better of all these supposed sects, and schisms, and that we shall not need that solicitude honest perhaps though over-timorous 25 of them that vex in this belief, but shall laugh in the end, at those malicious applauders of our differences, I have these reasons to persuade me.

First, when a City shall be as it were besieged 30 and blocked about, her navigable river infested, inroads and incursions round, defiance and battle oft rumoured to be marching up even to her walls, and suburb trenches, that then the people, or the greater part, more than at other times, wholly taken up with the study of highest and most important matters to be reformed, should be disputing, reasoning, reading, inventing, discoursing, even to a rarity, and admiration, things not before discoursed or 40 written of, argues first a singular goodwill, contentedness and confidence in your prudent foresight, and safe government, Lords and Commons; and from thence derives itself to a gallant bravery and well grounded contempt 45 of their enemies, as if there were no small number of as great spirits among us, as his was,<sup>25</sup> who when Rome was nigh besieged by Hannibal, being in the city, bought that piece of ground at no cheap rate, whereon Hannibal himself 50 encamped his own regiment. Next it is a lively and cheerful presage of our happy success and victory. For as in a body, when the blood is fresh, the spirits pure and vigorous, not only to vital, but to rational faculties, and those in the 55 acutest, and the pertest operations of wit and subtlety, it argues in what good plight and constitution the body is, so when the cheerfulness of the people is so sprightly up, as that it 5 has, not only wherewith to guard well its own freedom and safety, but to spare, and to bestow upon the solidest and sublimest points of controversy and new invention, it betokens us not degenerated, nor drooping to a fatal decay, but casting off the old and wrinkled skin of corruption to outlive these pangs and wax young again, entering the glorious ways of truth and prosperous virtue destined to become great and honourable in these latter ages. Methinks I see 15 in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks: Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing<sup>26</sup> her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused 20 sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

What should ye do then, should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city, should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counsel ye to 35 such a suppressing, do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon show how. If it be desired to know the immediate cause of all this free writing and free speaking, there cannot be assigned a truer than your own mild, and free, and humane government; it is the liberty, Lords and Commons, which your own valorous and happy counsels have purchased us, liberty which is the nurse of all great wits; this is that which hath rarified and enlightened 40 our spirits like the influence of heaven; this is that which hath enfranchised, enlarged, and lifted up our apprehensions degrees above themselves. Ye cannot make us now less capable, less knowing, less eagerly pursuing of the truth, unless ye first make yourselves, that made us so, less the lovers, less the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutish, formal, and slavish, as ye found us; but you then must first become that 45 which ye cannot be, oppressive, arbitrary, and tyrannous, as they were from whom ye have freed us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the search and expectation of greatest and exactest things, is the issue of your own virtue propagated in us; ye cannot suppress that unless ye reinforce an abrogated and merciless law, that fathers may despatch at will their own children. And who shall then stick closest to ye, and excite others? not he who takes up arms for coat and conduct,<sup>27</sup> and his four nobles of Danegelt. Although I dispraise not the defence of just immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. ### OF MYSELF

(Essays in Verse and Prose, 1668)

It is a hard and nice subject for a man to write of himself; it grates his own heart to say anything of disparagement, and the reader's ears to hear anything of praise for him. There is no danger from me of offending him in this kind; neither my mind, nor my body, nor my fortune, allow me any materials for that vanity. It is sufficient for my own contentment that they have preserved me from being scandalous, or remarkable on the defective side. But besides that, I shall here speak of myself only in relation to the subject of these precedent discourses,<sup>1</sup> and shall be likelier thereby to fall into the contempt, than rise up to the estimation of most people.

As far as my memory can return back into my past life, before I knew or was capable of guessing what the world, or glories, or business of it were, the natural affections of my soul gave me a secret bent of aversion from them, as some plants are said to turn away from others, by an antipathy imperceptible to themselves and inscrutable to man's understanding. Even when I was a very young boy at school, instead of running about on holidays and playing with my fellows, I was wont to steal from them and walk into the fields, either alone with a book, or with some one companion, if I could find any of the same temper. I was then, too, so much an enemy to all constraint, that my masters could never prevail on me, by any persuasions or encouragements, to learn without book the common rules of grammar, in which they dispensed with me alone,<sup>2</sup> because they found I made a shift to do the usual exercises out of my own reading and observation. That I was then of the same mind as I am now (which, I confess, I wonder at myself) may appear by the latter end of an ode which I made when I was but thirteen years old, and which was then printed with many other verses. The beginning of it is boyish, but of this part, which I here set down, if a very little were corrected, I should hardly now be much ashamed.

IX

This only grant me, that my means may lie
Too low for envy, for contempt too high.
Some honour I would have,
Not from great deeds, but good alone:
The unknown are better than ill known.
Rumour can ope the grave.
Acquaintance I would have, but when it depends
Not on the number, but the choice of friends.

X

Books should, not business, entertain the light,
And sleep, as undisturbed as death, thenight.
My house a cottage, more
Than palace, and should fitting be
For all my use, no luxury.
My garden painted o'er
With Nature's hand, not Art's; and pleasures
yield,
Horace might envy in his Sabine field.

XI

Thus would I double my life's fading space;
For he that runs it well twice runs his race.
And in this true delight,
These unbought sports, this happy state,
I would not fear, nor wish my fate,
But boldly say each night,
To-morrow let my sun his beams display
Or in clouds hide them—I have lived to-day.

You may see by it I was even then acquainted with the poets (for the conclusion is taken out of Horace),<sup>3</sup> and perhaps it was the immature and immoderate love of them which stamped first, or rather engraved, these characters in me. They were like letters cut into the bark of a young tree, which with the tree still grow proportionably. But how this love came to be produced in me so early is a hard question. I believe, I can tell the particular little chance that filled my head first with such chimes of verse, as have never since left ringing there.

For I remember, when I began to read, and to take some pleasure in it, there was wont to lie in my mother's parlour (I know not by what accident, for she herself never in her life read any book but of devotion), but there was wont to lie Spenser's works; this I happened to fall upon, and was infinitely delighted with the stories of the knights, and giants, and monsters, and brave houses, which I found everywhere there (though my understanding had little to do with all this); and by degrees with the tinkling of the rhyme and dance of the numbers, so that I think I had read him all over before I was twelve years old, and was thus immediately made a poet.

With these affections of mind, and my heart wholly set upon letters, I went to the university,<sup>4</sup> but was soon torn from thence by that violent public storm<sup>5</sup> which would suffer nothing to stand where it did, but rooted up every plant, even from the princely cedars to me, the hyssop. Yet I had as good fortune as could have befallen me in such a tempest; for I was cast by it into the family of one of the best persons,<sup>6</sup> and into the court of one of the best princesses<sup>7</sup> of the world. Now though I was here engaged in ways most contrary to the original design of my life, that is, into much company, and no small business, and into a daily sight of greatness, both militant and triumphant (for that was the state then of the English and French Courts); yet all this was so far from altering my opinion, that it only added the confirmation of reason to that which was before but natural inclination. I saw plainly all the paint of that kind of life, the nearer I came to it; and that beauty, which I did not fall in love with when, for aught I knew, it was real, was not like to bewitch or entice me when I saw that it was adulterate. I met with several great persons, whom I liked very well; but could not perceive that any part of their greatness was to be liked or desired, no more than I would be glad or content to be in a storm, though I saw many ships which rid safely and bravely in it. A storm would not agree with my stomach, if it did with my courage. Though I was in a crowd of as good company as could be found anywhere, though

I was in business of great and honourable trust, though I ate at the best table, and enjoyed the best conveniences for present subsistence that ought to be desired by a man of my condition in banishment and public distresses; yet I could not abstain from renewing my old schoolboy's wish in a copy of verses to the same effect:

Well then; I now do plainly see,
This busy world and I shall ne'er agree, etc.<sup>8</sup>

And I never then proposed to myself any other advantage from His Majesty's happy Restoration, but the getting into some moderately convenient retreat in the country, which I thought in that case I might easily have compassed, as well as some others, with no greater probabilities or pretences have arrived to extraordinary fortunes. But I had before written a shrewd prophecy against myself, and I think Apollo inspired me in the truth, though not in the elegance of it:

Thou, neither great at court nor in the war
Nor at th' exchange shalt be, nor at the wrangling bar;
Content thyself with the small barren praise,
Which neglected verse does raise, etc.

However, by the failing of the forces which I had expected, I did not quit the design which I had resolved on; I cast myself into it A corps perdu,<sup>9</sup> without making capitulations or taking counsel of fortune. But God laughs at a man who says to his soul, "Take thy ease:" I met presently not only with many little encumbrances and impediments, but with so much sickness (a new misfortune to me) as would have spoiled the happiness of an emperor as well as mine. Yet I do neither repent nor alter my course. Non ego perfidum dixi sacramentum.<sup>10</sup> Nothing shall separate me from a mistress which I have loved so long, and have now at last married, though she neither has brought me a rich portion, nor lived yet so quietly with me as I hoped from her:

... *Nec vos, dulcissima mundi
Nomina, vos Musæ, libertas, otia, libri,
Hortique sylvæque, animâ remanente relinquam.*

Nor by me e'er shall you,
You of all names the sweetest, and the best,
You, Muses, books, and liberty, and rest;
You gardens, fields, and woods, forsaken be,
As long as life itself forsakes not me.

THE MERITS OF SIR HUDIBRAS<sup>1</sup>

(From Hudibras, Part I, Canto I, 1663)

When civil dudgeon first grew high,
And men fell out, they knew not why:
When hard words, jealousies, and fears
Set folks together by the ears,
And made them fight, like mad or drunk,
For dame Religion as for Punk;
Whose honesty they all durst swear for,
Tho' not a man of them knew wherefore:
When Gospel-Trumpeter,<sup>2</sup> surrounded
With long-ear'd rout, to battle sounded,
And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist, instead of a stick:
Then did Sir Knight<sup>3</sup> abandon dwelling,
And out he rode a collonelling.<sup>4</sup>
A wight he was, whose very sight would Entitle him, Mirror of Knighthood;
That never bow'd his stubborn knee
To anything but chivalry;
Nor put up blow,<sup>5</sup> but that which laid
Right Worshipful on shoulder-blade:
Chief of domestic Knights, and errant,
Either for chartel<sup>6</sup> or for warrant;<sup>7</sup>
Great on the bench, great in the saddle,
That could as well bind o'er, as swaddle;<sup>7</sup>
Mighty he was at both of these,
And styl'd of war as well as peace.
(So some rats of amphibious nature,
Are either for the land or water.)
But here our authors make a doubt,
Whether he were more wise or stout.
Some hold the one, and some the other;
But howsoe'er they make a pother,
The difference was so small, his brain
Outweigh'd his rage but half a grain;
Which made some take him for a tool
That knaves do work with, call'd a fool.
For 't has been held by many, that
As Montaigne,<sup>8</sup> playing with his cat,

Complains she thought him but an ass,
Much more she would Sir Hudibras: 40
For that's the name our valiant knight
To all his challenges did write.
But they're mista<sup>9</sup>ken very much,
'Tis plain enough he was no such;
We grant, altho' he had much wit, 45
H' was very shy of using it;
As being loath to wear it out,
And therefore bore it not about;
Unless on holy-days, or so,
As men their best apparel do. 50
Beside, 'tis known he could speak Greek
As naturally as pigs squeak:
That Latin was no more difficile,
Than to a blackbird 'tis to whistle:
Being rich in both, he never scanted 55
His bounty unto such as wanted;
But much of either would afford
To many, that had not one word. . . . 58
He was in logic a great critic,
Profoundly skill'd in Analytic;
He could distinguish, and divide 65
A hair 'twixt south and south-west side;
On either which he would dispute,
Confute, change hands, and still confute; 70
He'd undertake to prove, by force
Of argument, a man's no horse;
He'd prove a buzzard is no fowl, 20
And that a Lord may be an owl;
A calf an Alderman, a goose a Justice, 75
And rocks, Committee-men or Trustees.
He'd run in debt by disputation,
And pay with ratiocination. 25
All this by syllogism, true
In mood and figure, he would do. 80
For Rhetoric, he could not ope
His mouth, but out there flew a trope;<sup>9</sup>
And when he happen'd to break off
I' th' middle of his speech, or cough, 85
H' had hard words ready, to shew why,
And tell what rules he did it by:
Else, when with greatest art he spoke,
You'd think he talk'd like other folk. 35
For all a rhetorician's rules
Teach nothing but to name his tools.
But, when he pleas'd to shew't, his speech
In loftiness of sound was rich;
A Babylonish dialect,
Which learning pedants much affect; 95
It was a party-colour'd dress
Of patch'd and piebald languages:
'Twas English cut on Greek and Latin,
Like fustian<sup>10</sup> heretofore on satin.
It had an odd promiscuous tone,
As if h' had talk'd three parts in one; 100

<sup>9</sup> A figure of rhetoric, i. e. he could not speak without using ornate language.

<sup>10</sup> Sleeves or hose made of coarse fustian were often cut into holes in order to show the satin underneath.

Which made some think, when he did gabble,
 Th' had heard three labourers of Babel;
 Or Cerberus<sup>11</sup> himself pronounce
 A leash of languages at once.
 This he as volubly would vent 105
 As if his stock would ne'er be spent;
 And truly, to support that charge,
 He had supplies as vast and large:
 For he could coin or counterfeit
 New words, with little or no wit; 110
 Words so debas'd and hard, no stone<sup>12</sup>
 Was hard enough to touch them on.
 And when with hasty noise he spoke 'em,
 The ignorant for current took 'em;
 That had the orator,<sup>13</sup> who once 115
 Did fill his mouth with pebble stones
 When he harangu'd, but known his phrase,
 He would have us'd no other ways.
 In Mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe,<sup>14</sup> or Erra Pater;<sup>15</sup> 120
 For he, by geometric scale,
 Could take the size of pots of ale;
 Resolve by sines and tangents straight,
 If bread or butter wanted weight;
 And wisely tell what hour o' th' day 125
 The clock does strike, by Algebra.
 Beside, he was a shrewd Philosopher,
 And had read ev'ry text and gloss over:
 Whate'er the crabbed'st author hath,
 He understood b' implicit faith: 130
 Whatever sceptic could enquire for,
 For ev'ry why, he had a wherefore;
 Knew more than forty of them do,
 As far as words and terms could go.
 All which he understood by rote, 135
 And, as occasion serv'd, would quote:
 No matter whether right or wrong;
 They might be either said or sung.
 His notions fitted things so well,
 That which was which he could not tell; 140
 But oftentimes mistook the one
 For th' other, as great clerks have done.
 He could reduce all things to acts,
 And knew their natures by abstracts;
 Where entity<sup>16</sup> and quiddity,<sup>17</sup> 145
 The ghosts of defunct bodies fly;
 Where Truth in person does appear,
 Like words congeal'd in Northern air.
 He knew what's what, and that's as high
 As metaphysic wit can fly.
 In school-divinity as able 150
 As he that hight Irrefragable;<sup>18</sup>
 A second Thomas,<sup>19</sup> or at once
 To name them all, another Duns.<sup>20</sup>

Profound in all the nominal,<sup>21</sup> 155
 And real ways, beyond them all;
 For he a rope of sand could twist
 As tough as learned Sorbonist;<sup>22</sup>
 And weave fine cobwebs fit for skull
 That's empty when the moon<sup>23</sup> is full; 160
 Such as take lodgings in a head
 That's to be let unfurnished.
 He could raise scruples dark and nice,
 And after solve 'em in a trice. . . . 164
 For his Religion, it was fit
 To match his learning and his wit:
 'Twas Presbyterian true blue,
 For he was of that stubborn crew
 Of errant saints, whom all men grant
 To be the true Church Militant:
 Such as do build their faith upon 195
 The holy text of Pike and Gun.
 Decide all controversies by Infallible artillery;
 And prove their doctrine Orthodox
 By apostolic Blows and Knocks; 200
 Call fire, and sword, and desolation,
 A godly thorough reformation,
 Which always must be carried on,
 And still be doing, never done:
 As if religion were intended 205
 For nothing else but to be mended.
 A sect whose chief devotion lies
 In odd perverse antipathies:
 In falling out with that or this,
 And finding somewhat still amiss: 210
 More peevish, cross, and splenetic,
 Than dog distract, or monkey sick.
 That with more care keep holy-day
 The wrong, than others the right way:
 Compound for sins they are inclined to, 215
 By damning those they have no mind
 to.
 Still so perverse and opposite,
 As if they worshipp'd God for spite.
 The self-same thing they will abhor
 One way, and long another for. 220
 Free-will they one way disavow,
 Another, nothing else allow.
 All piety consists therein
 In them, in other men all sin.
 Rather than fail, they will defy 225
 That which they love most tenderly;
 Quarrel with mine'd-pies, and disparage
 Their best and dearest friend, plum-porridge;
 Fat pig and goose itself oppose,
 And blaspheme custard thro' the nose. 230
 Th' apostles of this fierce religion,
 Like Mahomet's, were ass and widgeon.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>21</sup> Nominal vs. real. The reference is to two philosophical doctrines advocated by the Nominalists and the Realists respectively.

<sup>22</sup> A member or Doctor of the College of the Sorbonne in Paris, founded by Robert de Sorbon in 1257.

<sup>23</sup> The old belief that insanity was due to the influence of the moon is reflected in our words lunatic, lunacy, from Latin luna, moon.

<sup>24</sup> The ass, according to the Koran, was the beast which Gabriel brought to carry Mahomet to the presence of God. The pigeon (widgeon) Mahomet taught to eat out of his ear, that it might be thought to be his means of communication with God.

To whom our Knight, by fast instinct
Of wit and temper, was so linkt,
As if hypocrisy and nonsense 235
Had got th' advowson<sup>25</sup> of his conscience.

MAC-FLECKNOE; OR, A SATIRE ON THE TRUE BLUE PROTESTANT POET, T. S.<sup>1</sup>

(1682)

All human things are subject to decay,
And, when fate summons, monarchs must obey.
This Flecknoe found, who, like Augustus,
young

Was called to empire, and had governed long;
In prose and verse was owned, without dispute, 5

Through all the realms of Nonsense, absolute.
This aged prince, now flourishing in peace,
And blest with issue of a large increase,
Worn out with business, did at length debate
To settle the succession of the state; 10
And, pondering which of all his sons was fit
To reign, and wage immortal war with wit, Cried, "Tis resolved! for Nature pleads, that he Should only rule, who most resembles me.

Shadwell alone my perfect image bears, 15
Mature in dulness from his tender years;
Shadwell alone, of all my sons, is he,
Who stands confirmed in full stupidity.

The rest to some faint meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense; 20
Some beams of wit on other souls may fall,
Strike through, and make a lucid interval;
But Shadwell's genuine night admits no ray,
His rising fogs prevail upon the day.
Besides, his goodly fabric fills the eye, 25
And seems designed for thoughtless majesty;
Thoughtless as monarch oaks, that shade the plain,

And, spread in solemn state, supinely reign.
Heywood and Shirley were but types of thee,
Thou last great prophet of tautology! 30
Even I, a dunce of more renown than they,
Was sent before but to prepare thy way;
And, coarsely clad in Norwich druggut,<sup>2</sup> came
To teach the nations in thy greater name.

<sup>25</sup> Advowson meant originally the obligation to protect a religious office or institution; hence the passage would seem to mean that hypocrisy and nonsense had come to defend and excuse his conscience.

<sup>2</sup> "This stuff appears to have been sacred to the poorer votaries of Parnassus; and it is somewhat odd that it seems to have been the dress of our poet himself in the entire stages of his fortune." Scott.

My warbling lute,—the lute I whilom strung, 35
When to King John of Portugal<sup>3</sup> I sung,—
Was but the prelude to that glorious day,
When thou on silver Thames didst cut thy way,
With well-timed oars, before the royal barge,
Swelled with the pride of thy celestial charge; 40
And big with hymn, commander of an host,—
The like was ne'er in Epsom blankets tost.
Methinks I see the new Arion sail,
The lute still trembling underneath thy nail.
At thy well-sharpened thumb, from shore to shore, 45

The trebles squeak for fear, the basses roar; . . .
About thy boat the little fishes throng, 49
As at the morning toast<sup>4</sup> that floats along.
Sometimes, as prince of thy harmonious band,
Thou wield'st thy papers in thy threshing hand;

St. Andre's<sup>5</sup> feet ne'er kept more equal time,
Not even the feet of thy own Psyche's rhyme:
Though they in number as in sense excel; 55
So just, so like tautology, they fell,
That, pale with envy, Singleton<sup>6</sup> forswore
The lute and sword, which he in triumph bore,
And vowed he ne'er would act Villerius more."
Here stopt the good old sire and wept for joy, 60

In silent raptures of the hopeful boy.
All arguments, but most his plays, persuade,
That for anointed dulness he was made.

Close to the walls which fair Augusta<sup>7</sup> bind,
(The fair Augusta much to fears inclined), 65
An ancient fabric raised to inform the sight,
There stood of yore, and Barbican<sup>8</sup> it hight,<sup>9</sup>
A watch-tower once, but now, so fate ordains,
Of all the pile an empty name remains; . . . 69
Near it a Nursery<sup>10</sup> erects its head, 73
Where queens are formed and future heroes bred,

Where unfledged actors learn to laugh and cry, . . . 75
And little Maximins<sup>11</sup> the gods defy. 78

Great Fletcher never treads in buskins here,
Nor greater Jonson dares in socks appear; 80
But gentle Simkin<sup>12</sup> just reception finds Amidst this monument of vanished minds;
Pure clinches<sup>13</sup> the suburban muse affords,
And Panton<sup>14</sup> waging harmless war with words.
Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known, 85

Ambitiously designed his Shadwell's throne.
For ancient Decker prophesied long since,

That in this pile should reign a mighty prince,
Born for a scourge of wit, and flail of sense;
To whom true dulness should some Psyches owe, 90
But worlds of Misers<sup>15</sup> from his pen should flow;
Humorists and Hypocrites, it should produce,—

Whole Raymond families, and tribes of Bruce.
Now empress Fame had published the renown

Of Shadwell's coronation through the town. 95
Roused by report of fame, the nations meet,
From near Bunhill,<sup>16</sup> and distant Watling
Street.<sup>17</sup>

No Persian carpets spread the imperial way,
But scattered limbs of mangled poets lay. . . .
Much Heywood, Shirley, Ogleby<sup>18</sup> there lay, 102
But loads of Shadwell almost choked the way;
Bilked<sup>19</sup> stationers for yeomen stood prepared,
And Herringman<sup>20</sup> was captain of the guard. 105
The hoary prince in majesty appeared,
High on a throne of his own labours reared.

At his right hand our young Ascanius sate,
Rome's other hope, and pillar of the state.
His brows thick fogs, instead of glories, grace,
And lambent dulness played around his face. 111
As Hannibal did to the altars come,
Sworn by his sire, a mortal foe to Rome,
So Shadwell swore, nor should his vow be vain,
That he till death true dulness would maintain; 115

And, in his father's right, and realm's defence, Ne'er to have peace with wit, nor truce with sense.

The king himself the sacred unction made,
As king by office, and as priest by trade.
In his sinister hand, instead of ball, 120
He placed a mighty mug of potent ale;
"Love's kingdom" to his right he did convey,
At once his sceptre, and his rule of sway;
Whose righteous lore the prince had practised
young,
And from whose loins recorded<sup>21</sup> Psyche<sup>22</sup>
sprung. 125

His temples, last, with poppies were o'erspread,
That nodding seemed to consecrate his head.
Just at the point of time, if fame not lie,
On his left hand twelve reverend owls did fly;
So Romulus, 'tis sung, by Tiber's brook, 130
Presage of sway from twice six vultures took.
The admiring throng loud acclamations make,
And omens of his future empire take.
The sire then shook the honours of his head,
And from his brows damps of oblivion shed 135
Full on the filial dulness: long he stood,
Repelling from his breast the raging god;

At length burst out in this prophetic mood:—
"Heavens bless my son! from Ireland let him
reign,

To far Barbadoes on the western main; 140
Of his dominion may no end be known,
And greater than his father's be his throne;
Beyond love's kingdom let him stretch his pen!"

He paused, and all the people cried, "Amen."
Then thus continued he: "My son, advance 145
Still in new impudence, new ignorance.
Success let others teach, learn thou from me
Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.

Let Virtuosos in five years be writ,
Yet not one thought accuse thy toil of wit. 150
Let gentle George<sup>23</sup> in triumph tread the stage,
Make Dormiant betray, and Loveit rage;
Let Cully, Cockwood, Fopling, charm the pit,
And in their folly show the writer's wit;
Yet still thy fools shall stand in thy defence, 155
And justify their author's want of sense.

Let them be all by thy own model made
Of dulness, and desire no foreign aid,
That they to future ages may be known,
Not copies drawn, but issue of thy own: 160
Nay, let thy men of wit too be the same,
All full of thee, and differing but in name,
But let no alien Sedley<sup>24</sup> interpose,
To lard with wit thy hungry Epsom prose.
And when false flowers of rhetoric thou wouldst cull, 165

Trust nature; do not labour to be dull,
But write thy best, and top; and, in each line,
Sir Formal's<sup>25</sup> oratory will be thine:

Sir Formal, though unsought, attends thy quill,
And does thy northern dedications<sup>26</sup> fill. 170
Nor let false friends seduce thy mind to fame,
By arrogating Jonson's hostile name;
Let father Flecknoe fire thy mind with praise,
And uncle Ogleby thy envy raise.

Thou art my blood, where Jonson has no part:
What share have we in nature, or in art? 176
Where did his wit on learning fix a brand,
And rail at arts he did not understand?

Where made he love in Prince Nicander's<sup>27</sup>
vein,

Or swept the dust in Psyche's humble strain? . . . 180

When did his muse from Fletcher scenes pur-loin, 183

As thou whole Etherege dost transfuse to thine?
But so transfused, as oil and waters flow, 185
His always floats above, thine sinks below.
This is thy province, this thy wondrous way,
New humours to invent for each new play:
This is that boasted bias of thy mind,
By which one way to dulness 'tis inclined; 190

<sup>16, 17</sup> Two sections of London. The sense is that they come from north and south.

<sup>27</sup> A lover in the opera of Psyche.

Which makes thy writings lean on one side still,
 And, in all changes, that way bends thy will.
 Nor let thy mountain belly make pretence
 Of likeness; thine's a tympany of sense.
 A tun of man in thy large bulk is writ, 195
 But sure thou art but a kilderkin<sup>22</sup> of wit.
 Like mine, thy gentle numbers feebly creep;
 Thy tragic muse gives smiles, thy comic sleep.
 With whate'er gall thou setst thyself to write,
 Thy inoffensive satires never bite; 200
 In thy felonious heart though venom lies,
 It does but touch thy Irish pen, and dies.
 Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
 In keen iambics, but mild anagram.
 Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command, 205
 Some peaceful province in Acrostic land.
 There thou may'st wings display, and altars
 raise,
 And torture one poor word ten thousand ways;
 Or, if thou wouldst thy different talents suit,
 Set thy own songs, and sing them to thy lute."
 He said: but his last words were scarcely heard; 211
 For Bruce<sup>23</sup> and Longvil<sup>30</sup> had a trap prepared
 And down they sent the yet declaiming bard.
 Sinking he left his drugged robe behind,
 Borne upwards by a subterranean wind. 215
 The mantle fell to the young prophet's part;
 With double portion of his father's art.

ACHITOPHEL<sup>1</sup>

(From Absalom and Achitophel, 1681)

Of these the false Achitophel was first; 150
 A name to all succeeding ages curst:
 For close designs, and crooked counsels fit;
 Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
 Restless, unfixed in principles and place;
 In power displeased, impatient of disgrace; 155
 A fiery soul, which, working out its way,
 Fretted the pigmy-body to decay,
 And o'er-informed the tenement of clay.
 A daring pilot in extremity,
 Pleased with the danger, when the waves went high, 160
 He sought the storms; but for a calm unfit,
 Would steer too nigh the sands, to boast his wit.
 Great wits are sure to madness near allied,
 And thin partitions do their bounds divide;
 Else, why should he, with wealth and honour
 blest, 165
 Refuse his age the needful hours of rest?
 Punish a body which he could not please;
 Bankrupt of life, yet prodigal of ease?
 And all to leave what with his toil he won,
 To that unfeathered two-legged thing, a son; 170
 Got, while his soul did huddled notions try;
 And born a shapeless lump, like anarchy.
 In friendship false, implacable in hate;
 Resolved to ruin, or to rule the state.

To compass this the triple bond<sup>2</sup> he broke; 175
 The pillars of the public safety shook;
 And fitted Israel for a foreign yoke;
 Then, seized with fear, yet still affecting fame,
 Usurped a patriot's all-atoning name.
 So easy still it proves in factious times, 180
 With public zeal to cancel private crimes.
 How safe is treason, and how sacred ill,
 Where none can sin against the people's will,
 Where crowds can wink, and no offence be known,
 Since in another's guilt they find their own? 185
 Yet fame deserved no enemy can grudge;
 The statesman we abhor, but praise the judge.
 In Israel's courts ne'er sat on Abbethdin<sup>3</sup>
 With more discerning eyes, or hands more clean,
 Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress;
 Swift of despatch, and easy of access. 191
 Oh! had he been content to serve the crown,
 With virtue only proper to the gown;
 Or had the rankness of the soil been freed
 From cockle, that oppressed the noble seed; 195
 David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
 And heaven had wanted one immortal song.
 But wild ambition loves to slide, not stand,
 And fortune's ice prefers to virtue's land.
 Achitophel, grown weary to possess 200
 A lawful fame, and lazy happiness,
 Disdained the golden fruit to gather free,
 And lent the crowd his arm to shake the tree.

A SONG FOR ST. CECILIA'S<sup>1</sup> DAY, 22ND NOVEMBER

1687

I

From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
 This universal frame began:
 When nature underneath a heap
 Of jarring atoms lay,
 And could not heave her head, 5
 The tuneful voice was heard from high,
 "Arise, ye more than dead."
 Then cold, and hot, and moist, and dry,
 In order to their stations leap,
 And Music's power obey. 10
 From harmony, from heavenly harmony,
 This universal frame began;
 From harmony to harmony
 Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
 The diapason closing full in man. 15

II

What passion cannot music raise and quell?
 When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
 His listening brethren stood around,

<sup>3</sup> A Hebrew word meaning "father of the Nation;" i.e., the judges. As Lord Chancellor, Shaftsbury had a well deserved reputation for uprightness and ability.

<sup>1</sup> St. Cecilia, virgin martyr of the third century, became patron saint of music, and was supposed to have invented the organ.

And, wondering, on their faces fell
 To worship that celestial sound: 20
 Less than a God they thought there could not dwell
 Within the hollow of that shell,
 That spoke so sweetly, and so well.
 What passion cannot music raise and quell?

III

The trumpet's loud clangour 25
 Excites us to arms,
 With shrill notes of anger
 And mortal alarms.
 The double, double, double beat
 Of the thundering drum, 30
 Cries, hark! the foes come:
 Charge, charge! 'tis too late to retreat.

IV

The soft complaining flute,
 In dying notes, discovers
 The woes of hopeless lovers; 35
 Whose dirge is whispered by the warbling lute.

V

Sharp violins proclaim
 Their jealous pangs and desperation,
 Fury, frantic indignation,
 Depth of pains, and height of passion, 40
 For the fair, disdainful dame.

VI

But, oh! what art can teach,
 What human voice can reach,
 The sacred organ's praise?
 Notes inspiring holy love, 45
 Notes that wend their heavenly ways
 To mend the choirs above.

VII

Orpheus could lead the savage race;
 And trees unrooted left their place,
 Sequacious of the lyre: 50
 But bright Cecilia raised the wonder higher;
 When to her organ vocal breath was given,
 An angel heard, and straight appeared,
 Mistaking earth for heaven.

GRAND CHORUS

As from the power of sacred lays 55
 The spheres began to move,
 And sung the great Creator's praise
 To all the blessed above;
 So when the last and dreadful hour
 This crumbling pageant shall devour, 60
 The trumpet shall be heard on high,
 The dead shall live, the living die,
 And Music shall untune the sky.

ALEXANDER'S FEAST, OR THE POWER OF MUSIC; AN ODE IN HONOUR OF ST. CECILIA'S DAY, 1697

I

'Twas at the royal feast, for Persia won
 By Philip's warlike son:
 Aloft, in awful state,
 The godlike hero sate
 On his imperial throne. 5

His valiant peers were placed around;
 Their brows with roses and with myrtles bound:
 (So should desert in arms be crowned.)
 The lovely Thais, by his side,
 Sate like a blooming eastern bride, 10
 In flower of youth and beauty's pride.
 Happy, happy, happy pair!
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave deserves the fair. 15

CHORUS

Happy, happy, happy pair!
None but the brave,
None but the brave,
None but the brave deserves the fair.

II

Timotheus, placed on high 20
 Amid the tuneful quire,
 With flying fingers touched the lyre:
 The trembling notes ascend the sky,
 And heavenly joys inspire.
 The song began from Jove, 25
 Who left his blissful seats above,
 (Such is the power of mighty love.)
 A dragon's fiery form belied the god;
 Sublime on radiant spires! he rode;
 When he to fair Olympia pressed, 30
 And while he sought her snowy breast;
 Then, round her slender waist he curled,
 And stamped an image of himself, a sovereign of the world.
 The listening crowd admire the lofty sound,
 A present deity! they shout around; 35
 A present deity! the vaulted roofs rebound.
 With ravished ears,
 The monarch hears;
 Assumes the god,
 Affects to nod, 40
 And seems to shake the spheres.

CHORUS

With ravished ears,
The monarch hears;
Assumes the god,
Affects to nod, 45
And seems to shake the spheres.

III

The praise of Bacchus then the sweet musician
 sung;
 Of Bacchus ever fair, and ever young.
 The jolly god in triumph comes;
 Sound the trumpets, beat the drums; 50
 Flushed with a purple grace
 He shows his honest face:
 Now, give the hautboys breath; he comes, he comes.
 Bacchus, ever fair and young,
 Drinking joys did first ordain; 55
 Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
 Drinking is the soldier's pleasure;
 Rich the treasure,
 Sweet the pleasure,
 Sweet is pleasure after pain. 60

<sup>1</sup> Spirals, coils. Cf. Milton, Par. Lost. ix, 502.

CHORUS

*Bacchus' blessings are a treasure,
Drinking is the soldier's pleasure;
Rich the treasure,
Sweet the pleasure,
Sweet is pleasure after pain.*

65

IV

Soothed with the sound, the king grew vain:
Fought all his battles o'er again;
And thrice he routed all his foes, and thrice he slew the slain.

The master saw the madness rise,
His glowing cheeks, his ardent eyes; 70
And, while he heaven and earth defied,
Changed his hand, and checked his pride.

He chose a mournful muse,
Soft pity to infuse,

He sung Darius great and good 75

By too severe a fate,
Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,
Fallen from his high estate,

And weltering in his blood:
Deserted, at his utmost need, 80
By those his former bounty fed;
On the bare earth exposed he lies,
With not a friend to close his eyes.

With downcast looks the joyless victor sate,
Revolving, in his altered soul, 85

The various turns of chance below;
And, now and then, a sigh he stole,
And tears began to flow.

CHORUS

*Revolving, in his altered soul,
The various turns of chance below; 90
And, now and then, a sigh he stole;
And tears began to flow.*

V

The mighty master smiled, to see
That love was in the next degree;
'Twas but a kindred-sound to move, 95

For pity melts the mind to love.
Softly sweet, in Lydian measures,
Soon he soothed his soul to pleasures:

War, he sung, is toil and trouble;
Honour, but an empty bubble; 100

Never ending, still beginning,
Fighting still, and still destroying;
If the world be worth thy winning,

Think, O think it worth enjoying;
Lovely Thais sits beside thee, 105

Take the good the gods provide thee—
The many rend the skies with loud applause;
So Love was crowned, but Music won the cause.

The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
Gazed on the fair. 110

Who caused his care,
And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
Sighed and looked, and sighed again;

At length, with love and wine at once oppressed

The vanquished victor sunk upon her breast. 115

CHORUS

*The prince, unable to conceal his pain,
Gazed on the fair
Who caused his care,
And sighed and looked, sighed and looked,
Sighed and looked, and sighed again; 120
At length, with love and wine at once oppressed.
The vanquished victor sunk upon her breast.*

VI

Now strike the golden lyre again;
A louder yet, and yet a louder strain.
Break his bands of sleep asunder, 125
And rouse him, like a rattling peal of thunder.

Hark, hark! the horrid sound

Has raised up his head;
As awaked from the dead,

And amazed, he stares around. 130

Revenge, revenge! Timotheus cries,
See the furies arise;

See the snakes, that they rear,
How they hiss in their hair,
And the sparkles that flash from their eyes! 135

Behold a ghastly band,
Each a torch in his hand!

Those are Grecian ghosts, that in battle were slain,

And, unburied, remain
Inglorious on the plain: 140

Give the vengeance due
To the valiant crew.

Behold how they toss their torches on high,
How they point to the Persian abodes,

And glittering temples of their hostile gods.—
The princes applaud, with a furious joy, 146

And the king seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;

Thais led the way,
To light him to his prey,

And, like another Helen, fired another Troy. 150

CHORUS

And the King seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;

*Thais led the way,
To light him to his prey,*

And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.

VII

Thus, long ago, 155
Ere heaving bellows learned to blow,

While organs yet were mute,
Timotheus, to his breathing flute,

And sounding lyre,
Could swell the soul to rage, or kindle soft
desire. 160

At last divine Cecilia came,
Inventress of the vocal frame;

The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred store,
Enlarged the former narrow bounds,

And added length to solemn sounds, 165
With nature's mother-wit, and arts unknown
before.

Let old Timotheus yield the prize,
Or both divide the crown;
He raised a mortal to the skies,
She drew an angel down. 170

GRAND CHORUS

*At last divine Cecilia came,
Inventress of the vocal frame:
The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred store,
Enlarged the former narrow bounds,
And added length to solemn sounds, 175
With nature's mother-wit, and arts unknown

*Let old Timotheus yield the prize,

UNDER MR. MILTON'S PICTURE

(1688)

Three poets, in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England, did adorn.
The first, in loftiness of thought surpassed;
The next, in majesty; in both the last.
The force of Nature could no further go; 5
To make a third, she joined the former two.

SONG

In "The Indian Emperor"

Ah fading joy! how quickly art thou past!
Yet we thy ruin haste.
As if the cares of human life were few,
We seek out new:
And follow fate, which would too fast pursue: 5
See how on every bough the birds express,
In their sweet notes their happiness.
They all enjoy and nothing spare;
But on their mother Nature lay their care:
Why then should man the lord of all below, 10
Such troubles choose to know,
As none of all his subjects undergo?
Hark, hark, the waters fall, fall, fall,
And with a murmuring sound,
Dash, dash upon the ground, 15
To gentle slumbers call.

VENI CREATOR SPIRITUS

(Paraphrased)

Creator Spirit, by whose aid
The world's foundations first were laid,
Come visit every pious mind;
Come pour thy joys on human kind;
From sin and sorrow set us free,
And make thy temples worthy thee.

O source of uncreated light,
The Father's promised Paraclete!
Thrice holy fount, thrice holy fire,
Our hearts with heavenly love inspire; 10
Come, and thy sacred unction bring
To sanctify us, while we sing.

Plenteous of grace, descend from high,
Rich in thy sevenfold energy!
Thou strength of his Almighty hand, 15
Whose power does heaven and earth command.
Proceeding Spirit, our defence,
Who dost the gift of tongues dispense,
And crown'st thy gifts with eloquence!
Refine and purge our earthly parts; 20
But, oh, inflame and fire our hearts!
Our frailties help, our vice control,
Submit the senses to the soul;
And when rebellious they are grown,
Then lay thy hand, and hold 'em down. 25
Chase from our minds the infernal foe;
And peace the fruit of love bestow;
And lest our feet should step astray,
Protect and guide us in the way.
Make us eternal truths receive; 30
And practise all that we believe;
Give us thyself, that we may see:
The Father, and the Son, by thee:
Immortal honour, endless fame;
Attend the Almighty Father's name: 35
The Saviour Son be glorified,
Who for lost man's redemption died:
And equal adoration be,
Eternal Paraclete, to thee.

EPITAPH ON CHARLES II

(1685)

Here lies our sovereign lord the King,
Whose word no man relies on,
Who never said a foolish thing,
Nor ever did a wise one.

THE GREAT FIRE

(From Evelyn's Diary, 1641-1697)

Sept. 2, 1666. This fatal night about ten, began that deplorable fire near Fish street<sup>1</sup> in London.

3. I had public prayers at home. The fire
5 continuing, after dinner I took coach with my wife and son and went to the Bankside in Southwark, where we beheld the dismal spectacle, the whole City in dreadful flames near the water side; all the houses from the 5 10 Bridge, all Thames Street, and upwards towards Cheapside, down to the Three Cranes, were now consumed; and so returned exceeding astonished what would become of the rest.

<sup>1</sup> The fire started in the house of the "King's Baker," in Pudding Lane, near New Fish-street-hill. In general terms, this was not far from the river, and between the Tower and London Bridge.

The fire having continued all this night (if I may call that night which was light as day for ten miles round about, after a dreadful manner), when conspiring with a fierce eastern wind in a very dry season; I went on foot to the same place, and saw the whole south part of the city burning from Cheapside to the Thames, and all along Cornhill (for it likewise kindled back against the wind as well as forward), Tower Street, Fen-church Street, Gracious Street, and so along to Baynard's Castle, and was now taking hold of St. Paul's Church, to which the scaffolds contributed exceedingly. The conflagration was so universal, and the people so astonished, that from the beginning, I know not by what despondency or fate, they hardly stirred to quench it, so that there was nothing heard or seen but crying out and lamentation, running about like distracted creatures, without at all attempting to save even their goods; such a strange consternation there was upon them, so as it burned both in breadth and length, the churches, public halls, Exchange, hospitals, monuments, and ornaments, leaping after a prodigious manner from house to house and street to street, at great distances one from the other; for the heat with a long set of fair and warm weather had even ignited the air and prepared the materials to conceive the fire, which devoured after an incredible manner houses, furniture, and everything. Here we saw the Thames covered with goods floating, all the barges and boats laden with what some had time and courage to save, as, on the other, the carts, etc., carrying out to the fields, which for many miles were strewn with moveables of all sorts, and tents erecting to shelter both people and what goods they could get away. Oh the miserable and calamitous spectacle! such as haply the world had not seen the like since the foundation of it, nor be outdone till the universal conflagration of it. All the sky was of a fiery aspect, like the top of a burning oven, and the light seen above forty miles round about for many nights. God grant mine eyes may never behold the like, who now saw about 10,000 houses all in one flame; the noise and cracking and thunder of the impetuous flames, the shrieking of women and children, the hurry of people, the fall of towers, houses and churches, was like an hideous storm, and the air all about so hot and inflamed that at the last one was not able to approach it, so that they were forced to stand still and let the flames burn on, which they did for near two miles in length and one in breadth. The clouds also of smoke were dismal and reached upon computation near fifty-six miles in length. Thus I left it this afternoon burning, a resemblance of Sodom, or the last day. It forcibly called to my mind that passage non enim hic habemus stabilem civitatem;<sup>2</sup> the ruins resembling the picture of Troy. London was, but is no more! Thus I returned home.

Sept. 4. The burning still rages, and it was now gotten as far as the Inner Temple; all Fleet Street, the Old Bailey, Ludgate Hill, Warwick Lane, Newgate, Paul's Chain, Watling Street, now flaming, and most of it reduced to ashes; the stones of Paul's flew like granados,<sup>3</sup> the melting lead running down the streets in a stream, and the very pavements glowing with fiery redness, so as no horse nor man was able to tread on them, and the demolition had stopped all the passages, so that no help could be applied. The eastern wind still more impetuously driving the flames forward. Nothing but the Almighty power of God was able to stop them, for vain was the help of man.

5. It crossed towards Whitehall; but oh, the confusion there was then at that Court! It pleased his Majesty to command me among the rest to look after the quenching of Fetter Lane end, to preserve if possible that part of Holborn whilst the rest of the gentlemen took their several posts, some at one part, some at another (for now they began to bestir themselves, and not till now, who hitherto had stood as men intoxicated, with their hands across) and began to consider that nothing was likely to put a stop but the blowing up of so many houses as might make a wider gap than any had yet been made by the ordinary method of pulling them down with engines; this some stout seamen proposed early enough to have saved nearly the whole City, but this some tenacious and avaricious men, aldermen &c., would not permit, because their houses must have been of the first. It was therefore now commanded to be practised, and my concern being particularly for the Hospital of St. Bartholomew, near Smithfield, where I had my wounded and sick men, made me the more diligent to promote it; nor was my care for the Savoy less.

It now pleased God by abating the wind, and by the industry of the people, when almost all was lost, infusing a new spirit into them, that the fury of it began sensibly to abate about noon, so as it came no farther than the Temple westward, nor than the entrance of Smithfield north; but continued all this day and night so impetuous toward Cripple-gate and the Tower as made us all despair; it also brake out again in the Temple, but the courage of the multitude persisting, and many houses being blown up, such gaps and desolations were soon made, as with the former three days consumption, the back fire did not so vehemently urge upon the rest as formerly. There was yet no standing near the burning and glowing ruins by near a furlong's space.

The coal and wood wharves and magazines of oil, rosin, &c., did infinite mischief, so as the invective which a little before I had dedicated to his Majesty and published, giving 10 warning what might probably be the issue of suffering those shops to be in the City, was looked on as a prophecy.

The poor inhabitants were dispersed about St. George's Fields, and Moorfields, as far as 15 Highgate, and several miles in circle, some under tents, some under miserable huts and hovels, without a rag or any necessary utensils, bed or board, who from delicateness, riches, and easy accommodations in stately and 20 well furnished houses, were now reduced to extremest misery and poverty.

In this calamitous condition I returned with a sad heart to my house, blessing and adoring the distinguishing mercy of God to me and mine 25 who in the midst of all this ruin was like Lot, in my little Zoar,<sup>4</sup> safe and sound.

OF HEALTH AND LONG LIFE

(From Miscellanea, 1679-1692)

Some writers, in casting up the goods most desirable in life, have given them this rank, health, beauty, and riches. Of the first I find no dispute, but to the two others much may be said: for beauty is a good that makes others happy rather than one's self; and, how riches should claim so high a rank, I cannot tell, when so great, so wise, and so good a part of mankind have in all ages preferred poverty before them. 45 The Therapeutæ<sup>1</sup> and Ebionites<sup>2</sup> among the Jews, the primitive monks and modern friars among Christians, so many Dervishes<sup>3</sup> among the Mahometans, the Brachmans<sup>4</sup> among the Indians, and all the ancient philosophers; who, whatever else they differed in, agreed in this of despising riches, and at best esteeming them an unnecessary trouble or incumbrance of life: so that whether they are to be reckoned among goods or evils is yet left in doubt.

When I was young and in some idle company, it was proposed that every one should tell what their three wishes should be, if they were sure to be granted; some were very pleasant, and some very extravagant; mine were health, and peace, and fair weather; which, though out of the way among young men, yet perhaps might pass well enough among old: they are all of a strain, for health in the body is like peace in the State and serenity in the air: the sun, in our climate at least, has something 5 so reviving, that a fair day is a kind of a sensual pleasure, and, of all others, the most innocent.

Peace is a public blessing, without which no man is safe in his fortunes, his liberty, or his life: neither innocence or laws are a guard or defence; no possessions are enjoyed but in danger or fear, which equally lose the pleasure and ease of all that fortune can give us. Health is the soul that animates all enjoyments of life, which fade and are tasteless, if not dead, without it: a man starves at the best and the greatest tables, makes faces at the noblest and most delicate wines, is poor and wretched in the midst of the greatest treasures and fortunes: with common diseases strength grows decrepit, 30 youth loses all vigour, and beauty all charms; music grows harsh, and conversation disagreeable; palaces are prisons, or of equal confinement, riches are useless, honour and attendance are cumbersome, and crowns themselves are 35 a burden: but, if diseases are painful and violent, they equal all conditions of life, make no difference between a Prince and a beggar; and a fit of the stone or the colic puts a King to the rack, and makes him as miserable as he can do the meanest, the worst, and most criminal of his subjects.

To know that the passions or distempers of the mind make our lives unhappy, in spite of all accidents and favours of fortune, a man perhaps must be a philosopher; and requires much thought, and study, and deep reflections. To be a Stoic, and grow insensible of pain, as well as poverty or disgrace, one must be perhaps something more or less than a man, renounce common nature, oppose common truth and constant experience. But there needs little learning or study, more than common thought and observation, to find out, that ill health loses not only the enjoyments of fortune, but the pleasures of sense, and even of imagination, and hinders the common operations both of body and mind from being easy and free. Let philosophers reason and differ about the chief good or happiness of man; let them find it where they can, and place it where they please; but there is no mistake so gross, or opinion so impertinent (how common soever) as to think pleasures arise from what is without us, rather than from what is within; from the impression given us of objects, rather than from the disposition of the organs that receive them. The various effects of the same objects upon different persons, or upon the same persons at different times, make the contrary most evident. Some distempers make things look yellow, others double what we see; the commonest alter our tastes and our smells, and the very foulness of ears changes sounds. The difference of tempers, as well as of age, may have the same effect, by the many degrees of perfection or imperfection in our original tempers, as well as of strength or decay, from the differences of health and of years. From all which 'tis easy without being a great naturalist, to conclude, that our perceptions are formed, and our imaginations raised upon them, in a very great measure, by the dispositions of the organs through which the several objects make their impressions; and that these vary according to the different frame and temper of the others; as the sound of the same breath passing through an oaten pipe, a flute, or a trumpet. But to leave philosophy, and return to health. Whatever is true in point of happiness depending upon the temper of the mind, 'tis certain that pleasures depend upon the temper of the body; and that, to enjoy them, a man must be well himself, as the vessel must be sound to have your wine sweet; for otherwise, let it be never so pleasant and so generous, it loses the taste; and pour in never so much, it all turns sour; and were better let alone. Whoever will eat well, must have a stomach; who will relish the pleasure of drinks, must have his mouth in taste; nay, to find any felicity, or take any pleasure in the greatest advantages of honour and fortune, a man must be in health. Who would not be covetous, and with reason, if this could be purchased with gold? who not ambitious, if it were at the command of power, or restored by honour? But alas! a white staff<sup>5</sup> will not help gouty feet to walk better than a common cane; nor a blue ribbon<sup>6</sup> bind up a wound so well as a fillet: the glitter of gold or of diamonds will but hurt sore eyes, instead of curing them; and an aching head will be no more eased by wearing a crown than a common night-cap.

If health be such a blessing, and the very source of all pleasure, it may be worth the pains to discover the regions where it grows, the springs that feed it, the customs and methods by which it is best cultivated and preserved. . . .

5 [Temple here goes on to consider the various practices for the preservation of health, which have obtained in different times and countries, illustrating his remarks by personal anecdotes.] . . .

10 In the course of my life, I have often pleased or entertained myself with observing the various and fantastical changes of the diseases generally complained of, and of the remedies in common vogue, which were like birds of passage, very much seen or heard of at one season, and disappeared at another, and commonly succeeded by some of a very different kind. When I was very young, nothing was so much feared or talked of as rickets among children, and consumptions among young people of both sexes. After these the spleen<sup>7</sup> came in play, and grew a formal disease: then the scurvy, which was the general complaint, and both were thought to appear in many various guises. 25 After these, and for a time, nothing was so much talked of as the ferment of the blood, which passed for the cause of all sorts of ailments, that neither physicians nor patients knew well what to make of. And to all these succeeded vapours,<sup>8</sup> which serve the same turn, and furnish occasion of complaint among persons whose bodies or minds ail something, but they know not what; and among the *Chin*ese would pass for mists of the mind or fumes of the brain, rather than indispositions of any other parts. Yet these employ our physicians, perhaps more than other diseases, who are fain to humour such patients in their fancies of being ill, and to prescribe some remedies, for 40 fear of losing their practice to others that pretend more skill in finding out the cause of diseases, or care in advising remedies, which neither they nor their patients find any effect of, besides some gains to one, and amusement to the other. This, I suppose, may have contributed much to the mode of going to the waters either cold or hot upon so many occasions, or else upon none besides that of entertainment, and which commonly may have no other effect. And 'tis well if this be the worst of the frequent use of those waters, which, though commonly innocent, yet are sometimes dangerous, if the temper of the person or cause of the indisposition be unhappily mistaken, especially in people of age.

<sup>7</sup> Temple, writing at the end of the 17th century, speaks as though this favorite complaint were then less prevalent, or less popular. If this were so its loss of the popular favor was only temporary, as the literature of the early 18th century is full of allusions to it as the fashionable disease. Lady Winchelsea published a Pindaric Ode entitled The Spleen, in 1701, and Matthew Green's poem on the same subject appeared in 1737. V. also Pope's Rape of the Lock, lv. 15, et seq.

<sup>8</sup> Like the spleen, a fashionable malady, real or pretended, of the latter 17th and early 18th centuries. It was associated with nervous depression of spirits and debility, and was apparently similar to what we call "nervous prostration."

As diseases have changed vogue, so have remedies in my time and observation. I remember at one time the taking of tobacco, at another the drinking of warm beer, proved for universal remedies; then swallowing of pebble-stones, in imitation of falconers curing hawks. One Doctor pretended to cure all heats and fevers, by drinking as much cold spring water as the patient could bear; at another time, swallowing up a spoonful of powder of sea-bisket after meals was infallible for all indigestion, and so preventing diseases. Then coffee and tea began their successive reigns. The infusion of powder of steel have had their turns, and certain drops of several names and compositions; but none that I find have established their authority, either long or generally, by any constant and sensible successes of their reign, but have rather passed like a mode, which every one is apt to follow, and finds the most convenient or graceful while it lasts; and begins to dislike in both those respects when it goes out of fashion.

Thus men are apt to play with their healths and their lives, as they do with their clothes; which may be the better excused, since both are so transitory, so subject to be spoiled with common use, to be torn by accidents, and at best to be so soon worn out. . . . I observed a consult of physicians, in a fever of one of my near friends, perplexed to the last degree whether to let him blood or no, and not able to resolve, till the course of the disease had declared itself, and thereby determined them. Another of my friends was so often let blood, by his first physician, that a second, who was sent for, questioned whether he would recover it: the first persisted the blood must be drawn till some good appeared; the other affirmed, that, in such diseases, the whole mass was corrupted, but would purify again when the accident was past, like wine after a fermentation, which makes all in the vessel thick and foul for a season; but when that is past, grows clear again of itself. So much is certain, that it depends a great deal upon the temper of the patient, the nature of the disease in its first causes, upon the skill and care of the physician to decide whether any of these violences upon nature are necessary or no, and whether they are like to do good or harm.

The rest of our common practice consists in various compositions of innocent ingredients, which feed the hopes of the patient, and the apothecary's gains, but leave nature to her course, who is the sovereign physician in most diseases, and leaves little for others to do, further than to watch accidents; where they know no specific remedies, to prescribe diets; and, above all, to prevent disorders from the stomach, and take care that nature be not employed in the kitchen, when she should be in the field to resist her enemy; and that she should not be weakened in her spirits and strength, when they are most necessary to support and relieve her. 'Tis true, physicians must be in danger of losing their credit with the vulgar, if they should often tell a patient he has no need of physic, and prescribe only rules of diet or common use; most people would think they had lost their fee: but the excellence of a physician's skill and care is discovered by resolving first whether it be best in the case to administer any physic or none, to trust to nature or to art; and the next, to give such prescriptions, as, if they do no good, may be sure to do no harm.

In the midst of such uncertainties of health and of physic, for my own part, I have, in the general course of my life, and of many acute diseases, as well as some habitual, trusted to God Almighty, to nature, to temperance or abstinence, and the use of common remedies, either vulgarly known, and approved like proverbs by long observation and experience, either of my own, or such persons as have fallen in the way of my observation or inquiry. . . .

The two great blessings of life are, in my opinion, health and good humour; and none contribute more to one another; without health, all will allow life to be but a burden; and the several conditions of fortune to be all wearisome, dull, or disagreeable, without good humour: nor does any seem to contribute towards the true happiness of life, but as it serves to increase that treasure, or to preserve it. Whatever other differences are commonly apprehended in the several conditions of fortune, none perhaps will be found so true or so great, as what is made by those two circumstances, so little regarded in the common course or pursuits of mortal men.

Whether long life be a blessing or no, God Almighty only can determine, who alone knows what length it is like to run, and how 'tis like to be attended. Socrates used to say, that 'twas pleasant to grow old with good health and a good friend; and he might have reason. A man may be content to live while he is no trouble to himself or his friends; but, after that, 'tis hard if he be not content to die. I knew and esteemed a person abroad, who used to say, a man must be a mean wretch that desired to live after threescore years old. But so much, I doubt, is certain, that, in life, as in wine, he, that will drink it good, must not draw it to the dregs.

Where this happens, one comfort of age may be, that, whereas younger men are usually in pain, when they are not in pleasure, old men find a sort of pleasure, whenever they are out of pain. And, as young men often lose or impair their present enjoyments, by raving after what is to come, by vain hopes, or fruitless fears; so old men relieve the wants of their age, by pleasing reflexions upon what is past. Therefore men, in the health and vigour of their age, should endeavour to fill their lives with reading, with travel, with the best conversation, and the worthiest actions, either in their public or private stations; that they may have something agreeable left to feed on, when they are old, by pleasing remembrances.

But, as they are only the clean beasts which chew the cud, when they have fed enough; so they must be clean and virtuous men that can reflect, with pleasure, upon the past accidents or courses of their lives. Besides, men who grow old with good sense, or good fortunes, and good nature, cannot want the pleasure of pleasing others, by assisting with their gifts, their credit, and their advice, such as deserve it; as well as their care of children, kindness to friends, and bounty to servants.

But there cannot indeed live a more unhappy creature than an ill-natured old man, who is neither capable of receiving pleasures, nor sensible of doing them to others; and, in such a condition, it is time to leave them.

Thus have I traced, in this essay, whatever has fallen in my way or thoughts to observe concerning life and health, and which I conceived might be of any public use to be known or considered: the plainness wherewith it is written easily shews, there could be no other intention: and it may at least pass like a Derbyshire charm, which is used among sick cattle, with these words; if it does thee no good, it will do thee no harm.

To sum up all, the first principle of health and long life is derived from the strength of our race or our birth; which gave occasion to that saying, gaudeant bene nati: let them rejoice that are happily born. Accidents are not in our power to govern: so that the best cares or provisions for life and health, that are left us, consist in the discreet and temperate government of diet and exercise: in both which all excess is to be avoided, especially in the common use of wine; whereof the first glass may pass for health, the second for good humour, the third for our friends; but the fourth is for our enemies.

For temperance in other kinds, or in general, I have given its character and virtues in the essay of moxa, so as to need no more upon that subject here.

When, in default or despite of all these cares, or by effect of ill airs and seasons, acute or strong diseases may arise, recourse must be had to the best physicians that are in reach, whose success will depend upon thought and care, as much as skill. In all diseases of body or mind,<sup>1</sup> it is happy to have an able physician for a friend, or a discreet friend for a physician; which is so great a blessing, that the wise man will have it to proceed only from God, where he says, A faithful friend is the medicine of life, and he that fears the Lord shall find him.<sup>2</sup>

FRENCH AND ENGLISH TRAGIC WRITERS<sup>1</sup>

(From An Essay of Dramatic Poesy, 1668)

"Now what, I beseech you, is more easy than to write a regular French play, or more difficult than write an irregular English one, like those of Fletcher, or of Shakespeare?

"If they content themselves, as Corneille did, with some flat design, which, like an ill riddle, is found out ere it be half proposed, such plots we can make every way regular, as easily as they; but whens'er they endeavour to rise to any quick turns and counterturns of plot, as some of them have attempted, since Corneille's plays have been less in vogue, you see they write as irregularly as we, though they cover it more speciously. Hence the reason is perspicuous, why no French plays, when translated, have, or ever can succeed on the English stage. For, if you consider the plots, our own are fuller of variety; if the writing, ours are more quick and fuller of spirit; and therefore 'tis a strange mistake in those who decry the way of writing plays in verse, as if the English therein imitated the French.

<sup>1</sup> In the prefatory note to this essay, Dryden tells us that its main purpose was "to vindicate the honour of our English writers from the censure of those who unjustly prefer the French before them." The essay is in the form of a conversation between four gentlemen, whom Dryden calls Eugenius, Crites, Lisideus, and Neander, who have taken a barge and gone down the Thames towards Greenwich. Eugenius is Charles, Lord Buckhurst, Crites is Sir Robert Howard, Lisideus is Sir Charles Sedley, and Neander is Dryden himself. In the passage given above, Neander is replying to Lisideus, who has been speaking in praise of the French dramatists.

We have borrowed nothing from them; our plots are weaved in English looms: we endeavour therein to follow the variety and greatness of characters which are derived to us from Shakespeare and Fletcher; the copiousness and well-knitting of the intrigues we have from Jonson; and for the verse itself we have English precedents of elder date than any of Corneille's plays. Not to name our old comedies before Shakespeare, which were all writ in verse of six feet, or Alexandrines, such as the French now use, I can show in Shakespeare, many scenes of rhyme together, and the like in Ben Jonson's tragedies: in Catiline and Sejanus sometimes thirty or forty lines, I mean besides the Chorus, or the monologues; which by the way, showed Ben no enemy to this way of writing, especially if you look upon his Sad Shepherd, which goes sometimes on rhyme, sometimes on blank verse, like an horse who eases himself on trot and amble. You find him likewise commending Fletcher's pastoral of The Faithful Shepherdess, which is for the most part rhyme, though not refined to that purity to which it hath since been brought. And these examples are enough to clear us from a servile imitation of the French.

"But to return from whence I have digressed: I dare boldly affirm these two things of the English drama;—First, that we have many plays of ours as regular as any of theirs, and which, besides, have more variety of plot and characters; and secondly, that in most of the irregular plays of Shakespeare or Fletcher (for Ben Jonson's are for the most part regular), there is a more masculine fancy and greater spirit in the writing, than there is in any of the French. I could produce, even in Shakespeare's and Fletcher's works, some plays which are almost exactly formed; as The Merry Wives of Windsor, and The Scornful Lady: but because (generally speaking), Shakespeare, who writ first, did not perfectly observe the laws of Comedy, and Fletcher, who came nearer to perfection, yet through carelessness made many faults; I will take the pattern of a perfect play from Ben Jonson, who was a careful and learned observer of the dramatic laws, and from all his comedies I shall select The Silent Woman; of which I will make a short examen, according to those rules which the French observe."

As Neander was beginning to examine The Silent Woman, Eugenius, looking earnestly upon him; "I beseech you, Neander," said he, "gratify the company, and me in particular, so far, as before you speak of the play, to give us a character of the author; and tell us frankly your opinion, whether you do not think all writers, both French and English, ought to give place to him."

"I fear," replied Neander, "that in obeying your commands I shall draw a little envy on myself. Besides, in performing them, it will be first necessary to speak somewhat of Shakespeare and Fletcher, his rivals in poesy; and one of them, in my opinion, at least his equal, perhaps his superior."

"To begin then, with Shakespeare. He was the man who of all modern, and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul. All the images of Nature were still present to him, and he drew them, not laboriously, but luckily; when he describes anything, you more than see it, you feel it too. Those who accuse him to have wanted learning, give him the greater commendation: he was naturally learned; he needed not the spectacles of books to read Nature; he looked inwards and found her there. I cannot say he is everywhere alike; were he so, I should do him injury to compare him with the greatest of mankind. He is many times flat, insipid; his comic wit degenerating into clenches,<sup>2</sup> his serious swelling into bombast. But he is always great, when some great occasion is presented to him; no man can say he ever had a fit subject for his wit, and did not then raise himself as high above the rest of poets,

The consideration of this made Mr. Hales of Eaton<sup>4</sup> say, that there was no subject of which any poet ever writ, but he would produce it much better treated of in Shakespeare; and however others are now generally preferred before him, yet the age wherein he lived, which had contemporaries with him Fletcher and Jonson, never equalled them to him in their esteem; and in the last King's court, when Ben's reputation was at highest, Sir John Suckling, and with him the greater part of the courtiers, set our Shakespeare far above him.

"Beaumont and Fletcher, of whom I am next to speak, had, with the advantage of Shakespeare's wit, which was their precedent, great natural gifts, improved by study: Beaumont especially being so accurate a judge of plays, that Ben Jonson, while he lived, submitted all his writings to his censure, and, 'tis thought, used his judgment in correcting, if not contriving, all his plots. What value he had for him, appears by the verses he writ to him;<sup>5</sup> and therefore I need speak no farther of it. The first play that brought Fletcher and him in esteem was their Philaster: for before that, they had written two or three very unsuccessfully, as the like is reported of Ben Jonson, before he writ Every Man in his Humour. Their plots were generally more regular than Shakespeare's, especially those which were made before Beaumont's death; and they understood and imitated the conversation of gentlemen much better; whose wild debaucheries, and quickness of wit in repartees, no poet can ever paint as they have done. Humour, which Ben Jonson derived from particular persons, they made it not their business to describe: they represented all the passions very lively, but above all, love. I am apt to believe the English language in them arrived to its highest perfection: what words have since been taken in, are rather superfluous than ornamental. Their plays are now the most pleasant and frequent entertainments of the stage; two of theirs being acted through the year for one of Shakespeare's or Jonson's; the reason is, because there is a certain gaiety in their comedies, and pathos in their more serious plays, which suits generally with all men's humours. Shakespeare's language is likewise a little obsolete, and Ben Jonson's wit comes short of theirs.

30 "As for Jonson, to whose character I am now arrived, if we look upon him while he was himself (for his last plays were but his dotages), I think him the most learned and judicious writer which any theatre ever had. He was a most severe judge of himself, as well as others. One cannot say he wanted wit, but rather that he was frugal of it. In his works you find little to retrench or alter. Wit, and language, and humour also in some measure, we had before him; but something of art was wanting to the Drama, till he came. He managed his strength to more advantage than any who preceded him. You seldom find him making love in any of his scenes, or endeavouring to move the passions; his genius was too sullen and saturnine to do it gracefully, especially when he knew he came after those who had performed both to such an height. Humour was his proper sphere; and in that he delighted most to represent mechanic people. He was deeply conversant in the Ancients, both Greek and Latin, and he borrowed boldly from them: there is scarce a poet or historian among the Roman authors of those times whom he has not translated in Sejanus and Catiline. But he has done his robberies so openly, that one may see he fears not to be taxed by any law.

He invades authors like a monarch; and what would be theft in other poets, is only victory in him. With the spoils of these writers he so represents old Rome to us, in its rites, ceremonies, and customs, that if one of their poets had written either of his tragedies, we had seen less of it than in him. If there was any fault in his language, 'twas that he weaved it too closely and laboriously, in his serious plays: Perhaps too he did a little too much Romanize our tongue, leaving the words which he translated almost as much Latin as he found them: wherein, though he learnedly followed the idiom of their language, he did not enough comply with the idiom of ours. If I would compare him with Shakespeare, I must acknowledge him the more correct poet, but Shakespeare the greater wit. Shakespeare was the Homer, or father of our dramatic poets; Johnson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing; I admire him but I love Shakespeare. To conclude of him; as he has given us the most correct plays, so in the precepts which he has laid down in his Discoversies, we have as many and profitable rules for perfecting the stage, as any where with the French can furnish us."

SHAKESPEARE

(From Preface to Troilus and Cressida, 1679)

If Shakespeare be allowed, as I think he must, to have made his characters distinct, it will easily be inferred that he understood the nature of the passions: because it has been proved already that confused passions make undistinguishable characters: yet I cannot deny that he has his failings; but they are not so much in the passions themselves, as in his manner of expression: he often obscures his meaning by his words, and sometimes makes it unintelligible. I will not say of so great a poet, that he distinguished not the blown puffy style from true sublimity; but I may venture to maintain, that the fury of his fancy often transported him beyond the bounds of judgment, either in coining of new words and phrases, or racking words which were in use, into the violence of a catachresis.<sup>1</sup> It is not that I would explode the use of metaphors from passion, for Longinus thinks 'em necessary to raise it: but to use 'em at every word, to say nothing without a metaphor, a simile, an image, or description, is, I doubt, to smell a little too strongly of the buskin. I must be forced to give an example of expressing passion

figuratively; but that I may do it with respect to Shakespeare, it shall not be taken from anything of his: 'tis an exclamation against Fortune, quoted in his Hamlet but written by some other poet—

Out, out, thou strumpet, Fortune! all you gods,
In general synod, take away her power;
Break all the spokes and felleys from her wheel,
And bowl the round nave down the hill of Heav'n,

As low as to the fiends.

And immediately after, speaking of Hecuba, when Priam was killed before her eyes—

The mobbled queen

Threatening the flame, ran up and down
With bissom rheum; a clout about that head
Where late the diadem stood; and for a robe,
About her lank and all o'er-teemed loins,
A blanket in th' alarm of fear caught up.
Who this had seen, with tongue in venom

steep'd

'Gainst Fortune's state would treason have pronounced;

But if the gods themselves did see her then,
When she saw Pyrrhus make malicious sport
In mincing with his sword her husband's limbs,
The instant burst of clamour that she made (Unless things mortal move them not at all)
Would have made milch the burning eyes of heaven,

And passion in the gods.

What a pudder is here kept in raising the expression of trifling thoughts! Would not a man have thought that the poet had been bound prentice to a wheelwright, for his first rant? and had followed a ragman, for the clout and blanket in the second? Fortune is painted on a wheel, and therefore the writer, in a rage, will have poetical justice done upon every member of that engine: after this execution, he bowls the nave down-hill, from Heaven, to the fiends (an unreasonable long mark, a man would think); 'tis well there are no solid orbs to stop it in the way, or no element of fire to consume it: but when it came to the earth, it must be monstrous heavy, to break grounds as low as the centre. His making milch the burning eyes of heaven was a pretty tolerable flight too: and I think no man ever drew milk out of eyes before him: yet, to make the wonder greater, these eyes were burning. Such a sight indeed were enough to have raised passion in the gods; but to excuse the effects of it, he tells you, perhaps they did not see it. Wise men would be glad to find a little sense couched under all these pompous words; for bombast is commonly the delight of that audience which loves Poetry, but understands it not: and as commonly has been the practice of those writers, who, not being able to infuse a natural passion into the mind, have made it their business to ply the ears, and to stun their judges by the noise. But Shakespeare does not often thus; for the passions in his scene between Brutus and Cassius are extremely natural, the thoughts are such as arise from the matter, the expression of 'em not viciously figurative. I cannot leave this subject, before I do justice to that divine poet, by giving you one of his passionate descriptions: 'tis of Richard the Second when he was deposed, and led in triumph through the streets of London by Henry of Bullingbrook: the painting of it is so lively, and the words so moving, that I have scarce read anything comparable to it in any other language. Suppose you have seen already the fortunate usurper passing through the crowd, and followed by the shouts and acclamations of the people; and now behold King Richard entering upon the scene: consider the wretchedness of his condition, and his carriage in it; and refrain from pity, if you can—

As in a theatre, the eyes of men,
After a well-graced actor leaves the stage,
Are idly bent on him that enters next,
Thinking his prattle to be tedious:
Even so, or with much more contempt, men's
eyes

Did scowl on Richard: no man cried, God save him:

No joyful tongue gave him his welcome home,
But dust was thrown upon his sacred head,
Which with such gentle sorrow he shook off,
His face still combating with tears and smiles
(The badges of his grief and patience),
That had not God (for some strong purpose) steel'd

The hearts of men, they must perforce have melted,

And barbarism itself have pitied him.

To speak justly of this whole matter: 'tis neither height of thought that is discommended, nor pathetic vehemence, nor any nobleness of expression in its proper place; but 'tis a false measure of all these, something, which is like them, and is not them; 'tis the Bristol-stone<sup>1</sup> which appears like a diamond; 'tis an extravagant thought, instead of a sublime one; 'tis roaring madness, instead of vehemence; and a sound of words, instead of sense. If Shakespeare were stripped of all the bombasts in his passions, and dressed in the most vulgar words, we should find the beauties of his thoughts remaining; if his embroideries were burnt down, there would still be silver at the bottom of the melting-pot: but I fear (at least let me fear it for myself) that we, who ape his sounding words, have nothing of his thought but are all outside; there is not so much as a dwarf within our giant's clothes. Therefore, let not Shakespeare suffer for our sakes; 'tis our fault, who succeed him in an age which is more refined, if we imitate him so ill, that we copy his failings only, and make a virtue of that in our writings which in his was an imperfection.

For what remains, the excellency of that poet was, as I have said, in the more manly passions; Fletcher's in the softer: Shakespeare writ better betwixt man and man; Fletcher, betwixt man and woman: consequently, the one described friendship better; the other love: yet Shakespeare taught Fletcher to write love: and Juliet and Desdemona are originals. 'Tis true, the scholar had the softer soul; but the master had the kinder. Friendship is both a virtue and a passion essentially; love is a passion only in its nature, and is not a virtue but by accident: good nature makes friendship; but effeminacy love. Shakespeare had an universal mind, which comprehended all characters and passions; Fletcher a more confined and limited: for though he treated love in perfection, yet honour, ambition, revenge, and generally all the stronger passions, he either touched not, or not masterly. To conclude all, he was a limb of Shakespeare.

I had intended to have proceeded to the last property of manners, which is, that they must be constant, and the characters maintained the same from the beginning to the end; and from thence to have proceeded to the thoughts and expressions suitable to a tragedy; but I will first see how this will relish with the age. It is, I confess, but cursorily written; yet the judgment, which is given here, is generally founded upon experience: but because many men are shocked at the name of rules, as if they were a kind of magisterial prescription upon poets, I will conclude with the words of Rapin, in his Reflections on Aristotle's work Of Poetry: "If the rules be well considered, we shall find them to be made only to reduce Nature into method, to trace her step by step, and not to suffer the least mark of her to escape us: 'tis only by these, that probability in fiction is maintained, which is the soul of poetry. They are founded upon good sense, and sound reason, rather than on authority; for though Aristotle and Horace are produced, yet no man must argue, that what they write is true, because they writ it; but 'tis evident, by the ridiculous mistakes and gross absurdities which have been made by those poets who have taken their fancy only for their guide, that if this fancy be not regulated, it is a mere caprice, and utterly incapable to produce a reasonable and judicious poem."

POSTSCRIPT TO THE READER

(From Dryden's translation of Virgil, 1697)

What Virgil wrote in the vigour of his age, in plenty and at ease, I have undertaken to translate in my declining years; struggling with wants, oppressed with sickness, curbed in my genius, liable to be misconstrued in all I write; and my judges, if they are not very equitable, already prejudiced against me, by the lying character which has been given them of my morals. Yet steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavours, overcome all difficulties, and, in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I owed the public when I undertook this work. In the first place, therefore, I thank-fully acknowledge to the Almighty Power the assistance He has given me in the beginning, the prosecution, and conclusion of my present studies, which are more happily performed than I could have promised to myself, when I laboured under such discouragements. For, what I have done, imperfect as it is for want of health and leisure to correct it, will be judged in after-ages, and possibly in the present, to be no dishonour to my native country, whose language and poetry would be more esteemed abroad, if they were better understood. Somewhat (give me leave to say) I have added to both of them in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers, which were wanting, especially the last, in all our poets, even in those who, being endued with genius, yet have not cultivated their mother-tongue with sufficient care; or, relying on the beauty of their thoughts, have judged the ornament of words, and sweetness of sound, unnecessary. One is for raking in Chaucer (our English Ennius<sup>1</sup>) for antiquated words, which are never to be revived, but when sound or significancy is wanting in the present language. But many of his deserve not this redemption, any more than the crowds of men who daily die, or are slain for sixpence in a battle, merit to be restored to life, if a wish could revive them. Others have no ear for verse, nor choice of words, nor distinction of thoughts; but mingle farthings with their gold, to make up the sum. Here is a field of satire opened to me: but, since the Revolution, I have wholly renounced that talent. For who would give physic to the great, when he is uncalled?—to do his patient no good, and endanger himself for his prescription? Neither am I ignorant, but I may justly be condemned for many of those faults of which I have too liberally arraigned others.

. . . Cynthius aurem
 Vellit, et admonuit . . .<sup>2</sup>

'Tis enough for me, if the Government will let me pass unquestioned. In the meantime, I am obliged, in gratitude, to return my thanks to many of them, who have not only distinguished me from others of the same party, by a particular exception of grace, but, without considering the man, have been bountiful to the poet: have encouraged Virgil to speak such English as I could teach him, and rewarded his interpreter for the pains he has taken in bringing him over into Britain, by defraying the charges of his voyage. Even Cerberus, when he had received the sop, permitted Æneas to pass freely to Elysium. Had it been offered me, and I had refused it, yet still some gratitude is due to such who were willing to oblige me; but how much more to those from whom I have received the favours which they have offered to one of a different persuasion! Amongst whom I cannot omit naming the Earls of Derby and of Peterborough. To the first of these I have not the honour to be known; and therefore his liberality was as much unexpected as it was undeserved. The present Earl of Peterborough has been pleased long since to accept the tenders of my service: his favours are so frequent to me, that I receive them almost by prescription. No difference of interest or opinion has been able to withdraw his protection from me; and I might justly be condemned for the most unthankful of mankind, if I did not always preserve for him a most profound respect and inviolable gratitude. I must also add, that, if the last Æneid shine amongst its fellows, 'tis owing to the commands of Sir William Trumball, one of the principal Secretaries of State, who recommended it, as his favourite, to my care; and for his sake particularly, I have made it mine. For who would confess weariness, when he enjoined a fresh labour? I could not but invoke the assistance of a Muse, for this last office.

<sup>2</sup> Apollo twitched my ear, and admonished me. Dryden translates the passage (Virg. Ecl., v. 3):

"Apollo checked my pride, and bade me feed
My fattening flocks, nor dare beyond the reed."

Extremum hunc, Arethusa . . .
 . . . Negat quis carmina Gallo?<sup>3</sup>

Neither am I to forget the noble present which was made me by Gilbert Dolben, Esq., the worthy son of the late Archbishop of York, who, when I began this work, enriched me with all the several editions of Virgil, and all the commentaries of those editions in Latin. 10 amongst which, I could not but prefer the Dauphin's, as the last, the shortest, and the most judicious. Fabrini I had also sent me from Italy; but either he understands Virgil very imperfectly, or I have no knowledge of 15 my author.

Being invited by that worthy gentleman, Sir William Bowyer, to Denham Court, I translated the first Georgic at his house, and the greatest part of the last Æneid. A more 20 friendly entertainment no man ever found. No wonder, therefore, if both those versions surpass the rest, and own the satisfaction I received in his converse, with whom I had the honour to be bred in Cambridge, and in 25 the same college. The Seventh Æneid was made English at Burleigh, the magnificent abode of the Earl of Exeter. In a village belonging to his family I was born; and under his roof I endeavoured to make that Æneid appear in English with as much lustre as I could; though my author has not given the finishing 30 strokes either to it, or to the Eleventh, as I perhaps could prove in both, if I durst presume to criticise my master.

By a letter from William Walsh,<sup>4</sup> of Abberley, Esq. (who has so long honoured me with his friendship, and who, without flattery, is the best critic of our nation), I have been informed, that his Grace the Duke of Shrewsbury has 40 procured a printed copy of the Pastorals, Georgics, and first six Æneids, from my bookseller, and has read them in the country, together with my friend. This noble person having been pleased to give them a commendation, which I presume not to insert, has made me 45 vain enough to boast of so great a favour, and to think I have succeeded beyond my hopes; the character of his excellent judgment, the acuteness of his wit, and his general knowledge of good letters, being known as well to all the world, as the sweetness of his disposition, his humanity, his easiness of access, and desire of obliging those who stand in need of his protection, are known to all who have ap- 55 proached him, and to me in particular, who have formerly had the honour of his conversation. Whoever has given the world the translation of part of the Third Georgic, which he calls The Power of Love, has put me to sufficient pains to make my own not inferior to his; as my Lord Roscommon's Silenus had formerly given me the same trouble. The most ingenious Mr. Addison of Oxford has also been as troublesome to me as the other two, and on the same account. After his Bees, my latter swarm is hardly worth the hiving. Mr. Cowley's Praise of a Country Life is excellent, but is rather an imitation of Virgil than a version. That I have recovered, in some measure, the health which I had lost by too much application to this work, is owing, next to God's mercy, to the skill and care of Dr. Guibbons and Dr. Hobbs, the two ornaments of their profession, whom I can only pay by this acknowledgement. The whole Faculty has always been ready to oblige me; and the only one of them, who endeavoured to defame me, had it not in his power. I desire pardon from my readers for saying so much in relation to myself, which concerns not them; and, with my acknowledgements to all my subscribers, have only to add, that the few Notes which follow are par manière d'acquit,<sup>5</sup> because I had obliged myself by articles to do somewhat of that kind. These scattering observations are rather guesses at my author's meaning in some passages, than proofs that so he meant. The unlearned may have recourse to any poetical dictionary in English, for the names of persons, places, or fables, which the learned need not; but that little which I say is either new or necessary; and the first of these qualifications never fails to invite a reader, if not to please him.

Samuel Pepys

1633-1703

THE RETURN OF CHARLES II.

(From Diary of Samuel Pepys, 1660)

23rd.<sup>1</sup> In the morning come infinity of people on board from the King to go along with him. . . . All day nothing but Lords and persons of honour on board, that we were exceeding full. Dined in a great deal of state,

<sup>1</sup> i. e., May 23, 1660. At this time Pepys was still young, poor, and comparatively unknown. The foundation of his fortune had, however, been laid by the kindness of his patron and kinsman Sir Edward Montague (afterwards Earl of Sandwich), through whose influence he had been made secretary to the generals on the English fleet, in March, 1660. With his patron, and the other members of the delegation, he went to the Hague to bring back Charles II. The passages here given relate to the King's embarkation at the Hague and his landing at Dover.

the Royalle company by themselves in the coach,<sup>2</sup> which was a blessed sight to see. After dinner the King and Duke altered the name of some of the ships,<sup>3</sup> viz. the Nazeby into Charles; the Richard, James; the Speaker, Mary; the Dunbar (which was not in company with us), the Henry; Winsly, Happy Return; Wakefield, Richmond; Lambert, the Henrietta; Cheriton, the Speedwell; Bradford, the Successe. That done, the Queen,<sup>4</sup> Princesse Royale,<sup>5</sup> and Prince of Orange, took leave of the King, and the Duke of York<sup>6</sup> went on board the London, and the Duke of Gloucester, the Swiftsure. Which done, we weighed anchor, and with a fresh gale and most happy weather we set sail for England. All the afternoon the King walked here and there, up and down (quite contrary to what I thought him to have been) very active and stirring. Upon the quarter-deck he fell into discourse of his escape from Worcester,<sup>7</sup> where it made me ready to weep to hear the stories that he told of his difficulties that he had passed through, as his travelling four days and three nights on foot, every step up to his knees in dirt, with nothing but a green coat and a pair of country breeches on, and a pair of country shoes that made him so sore all over his feet, that he could scarce stir. Yet he was forced to run away from a miller and other company, that took them for rogues. His sitting at table at one place, where the master of the house, that had not seen him in eight years, did know him, but kept it private; when at the same table there was one that had been of his own regiment at Worcester could not know him, but made him drink the King's health, and said that the King was at least four fingers higher than he. At another place he was by some servants of the house made to drink, that they might know that he was not a Roundhead, which they swore he was. In another place at his inn, the master of the house, as the King was standing with his hands upon the back of a chair by the fire-side, kneeled

<sup>3</sup> The reason for the change of name is obvious: but this purifying from Puritanic and embarrassing association has an element of humour. Nazeby and Dunbar were of course reminiscent of Puritan victories, while the Richard (presumably named after Cromwell's son), the Speaker, the Lambert, and the rest, bore names hardly less full of unpleasant suggestion to the ears of the Royalists.

<sup>4</sup> Elizabeth, Queen of Bohemia, daughter of James VI, of Scotland, and First of England, whose husband, Frederick became King of Bohemia. Shortly after, he was forced by reverses to fly with his family to Holland. Elizabeth returned to England after the Restoration of her nephew, where she died in 1662.

down and kissed his hand, privately, saying, that he would not ask him who he was, but bid God bless him whither he was going. Then the difficulties in getting a boat to get into France, where he was fain to plot with the master thereof to keep his design from the foreman and a boy (which was all the ship's company,) and so get to Fecamp in France. At Rouen he looked so poorly, that the people went into the rooms before he went away to see whether 10 he had not stole something or other. . . .

So to my cabin again, where the company still was, and were talking more of the King's difficulties; as how he was fain to eat a piece of bread and cheese out of a poor body's pocket; 15 how, at a Catholique house, he was fain to lie in the priest's hole a good while in the house for his privacy. After that our company broke up. We have all the Lord Commissioners on board us, and many others. Under sail 20 all night, and most glorious weather.

24th. Up, and made myself as fine as I could, with the linning stockings on and wide canons<sup>s</sup> that I bought the other day at Hague. . . .

25th. By the morning we were come close 25 to the land, and everybody made ready to get on shore. The King and the two Dukes did eat their breakfast before they went, and there being set some ship's diet, they did eat of nothing else but pease and pork, and boiled beef. 30 Dr. Clerke, who eat with me, told me how the King had given 50£ to Mr. Shepley for my Lord's servants, and 500£ among the officers and common men of the ship. I spoke to the Duke of York about business, who called me 35 Pepys by name, and upon my desire did promise me his future favour. Great expectation of the King's making some Knights, but there was none. About noon (though the brigantine that Beale made was there ready to carry him) 40 yet he would go in my Lord's barge with the two Dukes. Our Captn. steered, and my Lord went along bare with him. I went, and Mr. Mansell, and one of the King's footmen, and a dog that the king loved, in a boat by ourselves, 45 and so got on shore when the King did, who was received by General Monk with all imaginable love and respect at his entrance upon the land of Dover. Infinite the crowd of people and the horsemen, citizens, and noblemen of 50 all sorts. The Mayor of the town come and give him his white staff, the badge of his place, which the King did give him again. The Mayor also presented him from the town a very rich Bible, which he took, and said it was the thing 55 that he loved above all things in the world. A canopy was provided for him to stand under, which he did, and talked awhile with General Monk and others, and so into a stately coach there set for him, and so away through the town towards Canterbury, without making 5 any stay at Dover. The shouting and joy expressed by all is past imagination.

THE GREAT FIRE OF LONDON

(From the same, 1666)

2nd.<sup>1</sup> (Lord's Day). Some of our maids sitting up late last night to get things ready against our feast to-day, Jane called us up about three in the morning, to tell us of a great fire they saw in the city. So I rose, and slipped on my night-gown, and went to her window; and thought it to be on the back-side of Marke-lane at the farthest, but being unused to such fires as followed, I thought it far enough off: and so went to bed again, and to sleep. About seven rose again to dress myself, and there looked out at the window, and saw the fire not so much as it was, and further off. 5 So to my closet to set things to rights, after yesterday's cleaning. By and by Jane comes and tells me that she hears that above 300 houses have been burned down to-night by the fire we saw, and that it is now burning down all Fish-street, by London Bridge. So I made myself ready presently, and walked to the Tower, and there got upon one of the high places, Sir J. Robinson's little son going up with me; and there I did see the houses at that 10 end of the bridge all on fire, and an infinite great fire on this and the other side the end of the bridge; which, among other people, did trouble me for poor little Michell and our Sarah on the bridge. So down with my heart full of trouble to the Lieutenant of the Tower, who tells me it begun this morning in the King's baker's house in Puddine-lane, and that it hath burned down St. Magnes Church<sup>2</sup> and most part of Fish-street already. So I down to the water-side, and there got a boat, and through bridge, and there saw a lamentable fire. Poor Michell's house, as far as the Old Swan,<sup>3</sup> already burned that way, and the fire running further, that in a very little time 15 it got as far as the Steele-yard, while I was there. Everybody endeavouring to remove their goods, and flinging into the river, or bringing them into lighters that lay off; poor people staying in their houses as long as till the very fire touched them, and then running into boats, or clambering from one pair of stairs by the water-side to another. And among other things, the poor pigeons, I perceive, were loth to leave their houses, but hovered about the windows and balconys, till they burned their wings and fell down. Having staid, and in an hour's time seen the fire rage every way, and nobody, to my sight, endeavouring to quench it, but to remove their goods, and leave all to the fire, and having seen it get as far as the Steele-yard,<sup>4</sup> and the wind mighty high, and driving it into the city; and everything after so long a drouth proving combustible, even the very stones of churches, and among other things, the poor steeple by which pretty Mrs.—— lives, and whereof my old school-fellow Elborough is parson, taken fire in the very top, and there burned till it fell down: I to White Hall (with a gentleman with me, who desired to go off from the Tower, to see the fire, in my boat); and there up to the King's closet in the Chapel, where people come about me; and I did give them an account dismayed them all, and word was carried in to the King. So I was called for, and did tell the King and the Duke of York what I saw, and that unless his Majesty did command houses to be pulled down, nothing could stop the fire. They seemed much troubled, and the King commanded me to go to my Lord Mayor from him, and command him to spare no houses, but to pull down before the fire every way. The Duke of York bid me tell him, that if he would have any more soldiers, he shall; and so did my Lord Arlington afterwards, as a great secret. Here meeting with Captain Cocke, I in his coach, which he lent me, and Creed with me to Paul's, and there walked along Watling-street, as well as I could, every creature coming away loaden with goods to save, and here and there sick people carried away in beds. Extraordinary good goods carried in carts and on backs. At last met by Lord Mayor in Canning-street, like a man spent, with a handkercher about his neck. To the King's message, he cried like a fainting woman, "Lord! what can I do? I am spent: people will not obey me. I have been pulling down houses; but the fire overtakes us faster than we can do it." That he needed no more soldiers; and that, for himself, he must go and refresh himself, having been up all night. So he left me, and I him, and walked home; seeing people all almost distracted, and no manner of means used to quench the fire. The houses too so very thick thereabouts, and full of matter for burning, as pitch and tar, in Thames-street: and warehouses 5 of oil, and wines, and brandy, and other things. . . . Having seen as much as I could now, I away to White Hall by appointment, and there walked to St. James' Park, and there met my wife and Creed and Wood and his wife, and 10 walked to my boat; and there upon the water again, and to the fire up and down, it still encreasing, and the wind great. So near the fire as we could for smoke; and all over the Thames, with one's faces in the wind, you 15 were almost burned with a shower of fire-drops. This is very true; so as houses were burned by these drops and flakes of fire, three or four, nay five or six houses, one from another. When we could endure no more 20 upon the water, we to a little ale-house on the Bankside,<sup>5</sup> over against the Three Cranes, and there staid till it was dark almost, and saw the fire grow, and as it grew darker, appeared more and more, and in corners and 25 upon steeples, and between churches and houses, as far as we could see up the hill of the city, in a most horrid malicious bloody flame, not like the fine flame of an ordinary fire. Barbary and her husband away before 30 us. We staid till, it being darkish, we saw the fire as only one entire arch of fire from this to the other side the bridge, and in a bow up the hill for an arch of above a mile long; it made me weep to see it. The churches, houses, and 35 all on fire, and flaming at once, and a horrid noise the flames made, and the cracking of houses at their ruin. So home with a sad heart, and there find everybody discoursing and lamenting the fire!

THE LAST ENTRY IN PEPYS' DIARY

31st.<sup>1</sup> Up very betimes, and continued all the morning with W. Hewer, upon examining 45 and stating my accounts, in order to the fitting myself to go abroad beyond sea, which the ill condition of my eyes and my neglect for a year or two hath kept me behind-hand in, and so as to render it very difficult now and 50 troublesome to my mind to do it: but I this day made a satisfactory entrance therein. Had another meeting with the Duke of York at White Hall on yesterday's work, and made a good advance: and so being called by my 55 wife, we to the Park, Mary Batelier, and a Dutch gentleman, a friend of hers, being with us. Thence to "The World's End," a drinking-house by the Park; and there merry, and so home late. And thus ends all that I doubt

I shall ever be able to do with my own eyes in the keeping of my Journall, I being not able to do it any longer, having done now so long as to undo my eyes almost every time that I take a pen in my hand; and therefore, what ever comes of it, I must forbear: and therefore resolve from this time forward to have it kept by my people in long-hand, and must be contented to set down no more than is fit for them and all the world to know; or if there be anything, I must endeavour to keep a margin in my book open, to add here and there a note in short-hand with my own hand. And so I betake myself to that course, which is almost as much as to see myself go into my grave;
for which, and all the discomforts that will accompany my being blind, the God prepare me! S. P.

THE AGE OF POPE

Matthew Prior

1664-1721

TO A CHILD OF QUALITY FIVE YEARS OLD. MDCCIV

THE AUTHOR THEN FORTY

(From Poems on Several Occasions, 1709)

Lords, knights, and 'squires the numerous band,
That wear the fair Miss Mary's fetters,
Were summoned by her high command,
To show their passions by their letters.

My pen among the rest I took,
Lest those bright eyes that cannot read
Should dart their kindling fires, and look
The power they have to be obeyed.

Nor quality, nor reputation,
Forbid me yet my flame to tell,
Dear five years old befriends my passion,
And I may write till she can spell.

For, while she makes her silk-worm's beds,
With all the tender things I swear;
Whilst all the house my passion reads,
In papers round her baby's hair;

She may receive and own my flame,
For though the strictest prudes should know
it,
She'll pass for a most virtuous dame,
And I for an unhappy poet.

Then, too, alas! when she shall tear
The lines some younger rival sends;
She'll give me leave to write, I fear,
And we shall still continue friends.

For, as our different ages move,
'Tis so ordained, (would Fate but mend it!)
That I shall be past making love,
When she begins to comprehend it.

A BETTER ANSWER

Dear Chloe, how blubbered is that pretty face!
Thy cheek all on fire, and thy hair all un-curled:

Pr'ythee quit this caprice; and (as old Falstaff
says),

Let us e'en talk a little like folks of this world.

How cans't thou presume, thou hast leave to destroy

The beauties, which Venus but lent to thy keeping?

Those looks were designed to inspire love and
joy:

More ordinary eyes may serve people for weeping.

To be vexed at a trifle or two that I writ,
Your judgment at once, and my passion you wrong:

You take that for fact, which will scarce be found wit:

Odds life! must one swear to the truth of a
song?

What I speak, my fair Chloe, and what I write,
shows

The difference there is betwixt nature and art:

I court others in verse; but I love thee in prose:
And they have my whimsies; but thou hast
my heart.

The god of us verse-men (you know, Child)
the sun,

How after his journeys he sets up his rest;
If at morning o'er earth 'tis his fancy to run;
At night he reclines on his Thetis's breast.

So when I am wearied with wandering all day;
To thee, my delight, in the evening I come:

No matter what beauties I saw in my way:
They were but my visits, but thou art my home.

Then finish, dear Chloe, this pastoral war;
And let us like Horace and Lydia agree:

For thou art a girl as much brighter than her,
As he was a poet sublimer than me.

IN SICKNESS

(Written in Ireland in October, 1714)

'Tis true—then why should I repine
To see my life so fast decline?
But why obscurely here alone,
Where I am neither loved nor known?

My state of health none care to learn, 5
 My life is here no soul's concern;
 And those with whom I now converse
 Without a tear will tend my hearse.
 Removed from kind Arbuthnot's aid,<sup>1</sup>
 Who knows his art but not his trade, 10
 Preferring his regard for me
 Before his credit or his fee.
 Some formal visits, looks, and words,
 What mere humanity affords, 15
 I meet, perhaps, from three or four
 From whom I once expected more,
 Which those who tend the sick for pay
 Can act as decently as they;
 But no obliging tender friend
 To help at my approaching end, 20
 My life is now a burden grown
 To others, ere it be my own.

Ye formal weepers for the sick,
 In your last offices be quick,
 And spare my absent friends the grief 25
 To hear, yet give me no relief;
 Expired to-day, intombed tomorrow,
 When known, will save a double sorrow.

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT

With a whirl of thought oppress'd,
 I sunk from reverie to rest.
 A horrid vision seiz'd my head,
 I saw the graves give up their dead!
 Jove, armed with terrors, bursts the skies, 5
 And thunder roars and lightning flies!
 Amaz'd, confus'd, its fate unknown,
 The world stands trembling at his throne!
 While each pale sinner hung his head,
 Jove, nodding, shook the heavens, and said: 10
 "Offending race of human kind,
 By nature, reason, learning, blind;
 You who, through frailty, stepp'd aside;
 And you, who never fell from pride:
 You who in different sects were sham'm'd, 15
 And come to see each other damn'd:
 (So some folk told you, but they knew
 No more of Jove's designs than you);
 —The world's mad business now is o'er,
 And I resent these pranks no more. 20
 —I to such blockheads set my wit!
 I damn such fools!—Go, go, you're bit."

ODE. "THE SPACIOUS FIRMAMENT"

(From the Spectator, No. 465, 1712)

The spacious firmament on high,
 With all the blue ethereal sky,
 And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
 Their great Original proclaim:
 The unwearied sun from day to day 5
 Does his Creator's power display,
 And publishes to every land
 The work of an Almighty hand.

<sup>1</sup> A distinguished physician, and friend of Swift, Pope, etc. See Pope's Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, p. 304.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
 The moon takes up the wondrous tale, 10
 And nightly to the listening earth
 Repeats the story of her birth;
 Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
 And all the planets, in their turn,
 Confirm the tidings as they roll, 15
 And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What though, in solemn silence, all
 Move round the dark terrestrial ball?
 What though nor real voice nor sound
 Amid their radiant orbs be found? 20
 In reason's ear they all rejoice,
 And utter forth a glorious voice,
 For ever singing, as they shine,
 "The hand that made us is Divine."

CATO'S SOLILOQUY

(From Cato, 1713)

Cato. It must be so—Plato, thou reason'st well!—

Else, whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
 This longing after immortality?

Or whence this secret dread, and inward horror,
 Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul 5
 Back on herself, and startles at destruction?

'Tis the divinity that stirs within us;
 'Tis heaven itself, that points out an hereafter,

And intimates eternity to man.
 Eternity! thou pleasing, dreadful thought! 10

Through what variety of untried being,
 Through what new scenes and changes must we pass!

The wide, the unbounded prospect lies before
 me;

But shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.
 Here will I hold. If there's a power above us 15

(And that there is all nature cries aloud Through all her works), he must delight in virtue;

 And that which he delights in must be happy.

But when? or where?—This world was made for Cæsar. 19

I'm weary of conjectures—This must end 'em.
 Laying his hand on his sword.

Thus am I doubly armed: my death and life,
 My bane and antidote are both before me:

This in a moment brings me to an end;
 But this informs me I shall never die. 25

The soul, secured in her existence, smiles
 At the drawn dagger, and defies its point.

The stars shall fade away, the sun himself
 Grow dim with age, and nature sink in years,

But thou shalt flourish in immortal youth,
 Unhurt amidst the war of elements, 30

The wrecks of matter, and the crush of worlds.
 What means this heaviness that hangs upon
 me?

This lethargy that creeps through all my senses?
 Nature, oppressed and harassed out with care,

Sinks down to rest. This once I'll favour her, 35

That my awakened soul may take her flight.
Renewed in all her strength, and fresh with life,
An offering fit for heaven. Let guilt or fear
Disturb man's rest: Cato knows neither of 'em.
Indifferent in his choice to sleep or die. 40

THE RAPE OF THE LOCK<sup>1</sup>

(Final version published 1717)

CANTO I

What dire offence from am'rous causes springs,
What mighty contests rise from trivial things,
I sing.—This verse to Caryll, Muse! is due;
This, ev'n Belinda may vouchsafe to view;
Slight is the subject, but not so the praise, 5
If she inspire, and he approve my lays.
Say what strange motive, goddess! could compel

A well-bred lord t' assault a gentle belle?
O say what stranger cause, yet unexplored,
Could make a gentle belle reject a lord? 10
In tasks so bold, can little men engage,
And in soft bosoms, dwells such mighty rage?
Sol through white curtains shot a tim'rous ray,

And op'd those eyes that must eclipse the day;
Now lap-dogs give themselves the rousing
shake, 15
And sleepless lovers, just at twelve, awake:
Thrice rung the bell, the slipper knock'd the
ground,

And the pressed watch returned a silver sound.
Belinda still her downy pillow pressed,
Her guardian sylph prolonged the balmy rest:
'Twas he had summoned to her silent bed 21
The morning dream that hovered o'er her head,
A youth more glitt'ring than a birth-night<sup>2</sup>
beau,

(That ev'n in slumber caused her cheek to glow)
Seemed to her ear his winning lips to lay, 25
And thus in whispers said, or seemed to say.

"Fairest of mortals, thou distinguishing care
Of thousand bright inhabitants of air!
If e'er one vision touched thy infant thought,
Of all the nurse and all the priest have taught;
Of airy elves by moonlight shadows seen, 31
The silver token, and the circled green,
Or virgins visited by angel-pow'rs,
With golden crowns and wreaths of heav'nly
flow'rs; 34
Hear and believe! thy own importance know,
Nor bound thy narrow views to things below.

<sup>1</sup> This poem was written at the request of a Mr. Caryll. One Lord Petre had contrived to abstract a lock of Mistress Arabella Fermor's hair, and as a result, the families of the daring lord and the offended beauty had become estranged. Mr. Caryll, anxious to restore peace, asked Pope to write a poem which should suggest to both sides the absurdity of quarreling over so trifling an affair.

<sup>2</sup> The dressing at the court balls given to celebrate the birthdays of members of the royal family was unusually splendid.

Some secret truths, from learned pride concealed,
To maids alone and children are revealed.
What though no credit doubting wits may give?

The fair and innocent shall still believe. 40
Know then, unnumbered spirits round thee fly,
The light militia of the lower sky:

These, though unseen, are ever on the wing,
Hang o'er the box,<sup>3</sup> and hover round the ring.
Think what an equipage thou hast in air, 45
And view with scorn two pages and a chair.
As now your own, our beings were of old,
And once inclosed in woman's beauteous mould;
Thence, by a soft transition, we repair
From earthly vehicles to these of air. 50

Think not, when woman's transient breath is fled,
That all her vanities at once are dead;
Succeeding vanities she still regards,
And though she plays no more, o'erlooks the cards.

Her joy in gilded chariots, when alive, 55
And love of ombre, after death survive.
For when the fair in all their pride expire,
To their first elements, their souls retire:

The sprites of fiery termagants in flame
Mount up, and take a salamander's name. 60
Soft yielding minds to water glide away,
And sip, with nymphs, their elemental tea.
The graver prude sinks downward to a gnome,
In search of mischief still on earth to roam.
The light coquettes in sylphs aloft repair, 65
And sport and flutter in the fields of air.

"Know further yet; whoever fair and chaste
Rejects mankind, is by some sylph embraced:
For spirits, freed from mortal laws, with ease Assume what sexes and what shapes they
please. 70

What guards the purity of melting maids,
In courtly balls, and midnight masquerades,
Safe from the treach'rous friend, the daring spark,

The glance by day, the whisper in the dark,
When kind occasion prompts their warm desires, 75

When music softens, and when dancing fires?
'Tis but their sylph, the wise celestials know,
Though honour is the word with men below.

Some nymphs there are, too conscious of their face,

For life predestined to the gnomes' embrace. 80
These swell their prospects and exalt their
pride,

When offers are disdained, and love denied:
Then gay ideas crowd the vacant brain,
While peers, and dukes, and all their sweeping
train,

And garters, stars, and coronets appear, 85
And in soft sounds, 'Your Grace' salutes their ear.

'Tis these that early taint the female soul,
Instruct the eyes of young coquettes to roll,

<sup>3</sup> "The Box, at the theatre, and the Ring in Hyde Park are frequently mentioned as the two principal places for the display of beauty and fashion." (Elwin).

Teach infant-cheeks a bidden blush to know,
And little hearts to flutter at a beau. 90

"Off", when the world imagine women stray,
The sylphs through mystic mazes guide their way;

Through all the giddy circle they pursue,
And old impertinence expel by new.

What tender maid but must a victim fall 95
To one man's treat, but for another's ball?

When Florio speaks what virgin could withstand,

If gentle Damon did not squeeze her hand?
With varying vanities, from ev'ry part,
They shift the moving toshop of their heart;
Where wigs with wigs, with sword-knots sword-knots strive, 101

Beaus banish beaus, and coaches coaches drive.
This erring mortals levity may call;
Oh blind to truth! the sylphs contrive it all.

"Of these am I, who thy protection claim, 105
A watchful sprite, and Ariel is my name.

Late, as I ranged the crystal wilds of air,
In the clear mirror of thy ruling star

I saw, alas! some dread event impend,
Ere to the main this morning sun descend. 110

But heaven reveals not what, or how, or where:
Warned by the sylph, oh pious maid, beware!

This to disclose is all thy guardian can;
Beware of all, but most beware of man!"

He said; when Shock, who thought she slept too long, 115

Leaped up, and waked his mistress with his tongue.

'Twas then, Belinda, if report say true,
Thy eyes first opened on a billet-doux;

Wounds, charms, and ardours, were no sooner read,

But all the vision vanished from thy head. 120
And now, unveiled, the toilet stands displayed,

Each silver vase in mystic order laid.
First, rob'd in white, the nymph intent adores,

With head uncover'd, the cosmetic pow'rs.
A heav'nly image in the glass appears, 125

To that she bends, to that her eyes she rears;
Th' inferior priestess, at her altar's side,

Trembling begins the sacred rites of pride.
Unnumbered treasures ope at once, and here

The various off'rings of the world appear; 130
From each she nicely culls with curious toil,

And decks the goddess with the glitt'ring spoil.
This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,

And all Arabia breathes from yonder box,
The tortoise here and elephant unite, 135

Transformed to combs, the speckled and the white.

Here files of combs extend their shining rows,
Puffs, powders, patches, Bibles, billets-doux.

Now awful beauty puts on all its arms;
The fair each moment rises in her charms, 140

Repairs her smiles, awakens ev'ry grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face;

Sees by degrees a purer blush arise,
And keener lightnings quicken in her eyes.

The busy sylphs surround their darling care,
These set the head, and those divide the hair,

Some fold the sleeve, whilst others plait the gown; 147

And Betty's praised for labors not her own.

CANTO II

Not with more glories, in th' ethereal plain,
The sun first rises o'er the purpled main,

Than, issuing forth, the rival of his beams
Launched on the bosom of the silver Thames.

Fairy nymphs, and well-dressed youths around her shone, 5

But ev'ry eye was fixed on her alone.
On her white breast a sparkling cross she wore,

Which Jews might kiss, and infidels adore.
Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose,

Quick as her eyes, and as unfixed as those. 10
Favours to none, to all she smiles extends;

Oh she rejects, but never once offends.
Bright as the sun, her eyes the gazers strike,

And, like the sun, they shine on all alike.
Yet graceful ease, and sweetness void of pride,

Might hide her faults, if belles had faults to hide; 16

If to her share some female errors fall,
Look on her face, and you'll forget 'em all.

This nymph, to the destruction of mankind,
Nourished two locks, which graceful hung behind 20

In equal curls, and well conspired to deck,
With shining ringlets, the smooth iv'ry neck.

Love in these labyrinths his slaves detains,
And mighty hearts are held in slender chains.

With hairy springes we the birds betray, 25
Slight lines of hair surprise the finny prey,

Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare,
And beauty draws us with a single hair.

Th' advent'rous baron the bright locks admired;

He saw, he wished, and to the prize aspired. 30
Resolv'd to win, he meditates the way,

By force to ravish, or by fraud betray;
For when success a lover's toil attends,

Few ask, if fraud or force attained his ends.
For this, ere Phœbus rose, he had implored

Propitious heav'n, and ev'ry pow'r adored, 36
But chiefly Love—to Love an altar built,

Of twelve vast French romances, neatly gilt.
There lay three garters, half a pair of gloves,

And all the trophies of his former loves; 40
With tender billets-doux he lights the pyre,

And breathes three am'rous sighs to raise the fire.

Then prostrate falls, and begs with ardent eyes
Soon to obtain, and long possess the prize:

The pow'rs gave ear, and granted half his pray'r, 45

The rest, the winds dispersed in empty air.
But now secure the painted vessel glides,

The sun-beams trembling on the floating tides:
While melting music steals upon the sky,

And softened sounds along the waters die; 50
Smooth flow the waves, the zephyrs gently play,

Belinda smiled, and all the world was gay.
All but the sylph—with careful thoughts oppressed,

Th' impending woe sat heavy on his breast.

He summons strait his denizens of air; 55
 The lucid squadrons round the sails repair:
 Soft o'er the shrouds aerial whispers breathe,
 That seemed but zephyrs to the train beneath.
 Some to the sun their insect-wings unfold,
 Waft on the breeze, or sink in clouds of gold; 60
 Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight,
 Their fluid bodies half dissolv'd in light,
 Loose to the wind their airy garments flew,
 Thin glitt'ring textures of the filmy dew,
 Dipped in the richest tincture of the skies, 65
 Where light disports in ever-mingling dyes;
 While ev'ry beam new transient colours flings,
 Colours that change whene'er they wave their wings.

Amid the circle, on the gilded mast,
 Superior by the head, was Ariel plac'd; 70
 His purple pinions opening to the sun,
 He raised his azure wand, and thus begun:
 "Ye sylphs and sylphids, to your chief give ear!

Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and demons, hear!
 Ye know the spheres and various tasks assigned 75

By laws eternal to th' aerial kind.
 Some in the fields of purest ether play,
 And bask and whiten in the blaze of day.
 Some guide the course of wandering orbs on high,

Or roll the planets through the boundless sky; 80
 Some less refined, beneath the moon's pale light
 Pursue the stars that shoot athwart the night,
 Or suck the mists in grosser air below,
 Or dip their pinions in the painted bow,
 Or brew fierce tempests on the wintry main, 85
 Or o'er the globe distil the kindly rain.
 Others on earth o'er human race preside,
 Watch all their ways, and all their actions guide:
 Of these the chief the care of nations own,
 And guard with arms divine the British throne.

"Our humbler province is to tend the fair, 91
 Not a less pleasing, though less glorious care;
 To save the powder from too rude a gale,
 Nor let th' imprisoned essences exhale;
 To draw fresh colours from the vernal flow'rs, 95
 To steal from rainbows ere they drop in show'rs
 A brighter wash to curl their waving hairs,
 Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs;
 Nay, oft, in dreams, invention we bestow,
 To change a founce, or add a furbelow. 100

"This day, black omens threat the brightest fair

That e'er deserved a watchful spirit's care;
 Some dire disaster, or by force, or slight;
 But what, or where, the fates have wrapped in night.

Whether the nymph shall break Diana's law,
 Or some frail China jar receive a flaw; 106
 Or stain her honour, or her new brocade;
 Forget her pray'rs, or miss a masquerade;
 Or lose her heart, or necklace, at a ball;
 Or whether heav'n has doom'd that Shock must fall. 110

Haste, then, ye spirits! to your charge repair:
 The flutt'ring fan be Zephyretta's care;
 The drops to thee, Brillante, we consign;

And, Momentilla, let the watch be thine;
 Do thou, Crispissa, tend her fav'rite lock; 115
 Ariel himself shall be the guard of Shock.

"To fifty chosen Sylphs, of special note,
 We trust th' important charge, the petticoat:
 Oft have we known that seven-fold fence to fail,
 Though stiff with hoops and armed with ribs of whale;

Form a strong line about the silver bound, 121
 And guard the wide circumference around.

"Whatever spirit, careless of his charge,
 His post neglects, or leaves the fair at large,
 Shall feel sharp vengeance soon o'ertake his sins, 125

Be stopped in vials, or transfixed with pins;
 Or plunged in lakes of bitter washes lie,
 Or wedged, whole ages in a bodkin's eye;
 Gums and pomatums shall his flight restrain,
 While clogged he beats his silken wings in vain;
 Or alum styptics with contracting pow'r, 131
 Shrink his thin essence like a rivelled flower;
 Or, as Ixion fixed, the wretch shall feel
 The giddy motion of the whirling mill,
 In fumes of burning chocolate shall glow, 135
 And tremble at the sea that froths below!"

He spoke; the spirits from the sails descend:
 Some, orb in orb, around the nymph extend;
 Some thrid the mazy ringlets of her hair;
 Some hang upon the pendants of her ear; 140
 With beating hearts the dire event they wait,
 Anxious, and trembling for the birth of fate.

CANTO III

Close by those meads, for ever crowned with flow'rs,

Where Thames with pride surveys his rising tow'rs,

There stands a structure of majestic frame,
 Which from the neighb'ring Hampton<sup>c</sup> takes its name.

Here Britain's statesmen oft the fall foredoom
 Of foreign tyrants, and of nymphs at home; 6
 Here thou, great ANNA! whom three realms obey,

Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea.

Hither the heroes and the nymphs resort,
 To taste a while the pleasures of a court; 10
 In various talk th' instructive hours they pass;
 Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last;
 One speaks the glory of the British Queen,
 And one describes a charming Indian screen;
 A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes; 15
 At ev'ry word a reputation dies.

Snuff, or the fan, supply each pause of chat,
 With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that.

Meanwhile, declining from the noon of day,
 The sun obliquely shoots his burning ray; 20
 The hungry judges soon the sentence sign,
 And wretches hang that jury-men may dine;
 The merchant from th' Exchange returns in peace,

And the long labours of the toilet cease.
 Belinda now, whom thirst of fame invites, 25
 Burns to encounter two advent'rous knights,

<sup>c</sup> The Royal palace of Hampton Court.

At ombre<sup>5</sup> singly to decide their doom;
And swells her breast with conquests yet to come.
Straight the three bands prepare in arms to join,

Each band the number of the sacred nine. 30
Soon as she spreads her hand, th' aërial guard
Descend, and sit on each important card:
First Ariel perched upon a Matadore,
Then each according to the rank they bore;
For sylphs, yet mindful of their ancient race, 35
Are, as when women, wondrous fond of place.

Behold four kings in majesty revered,
With hoary whiskers and a forked beard;
And four fair queens whose hands sustain a flow'r,

Th' expressive emblem of their softer pow'r; 40
Four knaves in garbs succinct, a trusty band;
Caps on their heads, and halberts in their hand;
And parti-coloured troops, a shining train,
Draw forth to combat on the velvet plain.
The skillful nymph reviews her force with care:
Let spades be trumps! she said, and trumps they were. 46

Now move to war her sable Matadores,
In show like leaders of the swarthy Moors.
Spadillio first, unconquerable lord!
Led off two captive trumps, and swept the board. 50

As many more Manillio forced to yield,
And marched a victor from the verdant field.
Him Basto followed, but his fate more hard
Gained but one trump and one plebeian card.
With his broad sabre next, a chief in years, 55
The hoary majesty of spades appears,
Puts forth one manly leg, to sight revealed,
The rest his many coloured robe concealed.
The rebel knave, who dares his prince engage,
Proves the just victim of his royal rage. 60
Ev'n mighty Pam,<sup>6</sup> that kings and queens o'er-threw,

And mowed down armies in the fights of loo,
Sad chance of war! now destitute of aid,
Falls undistinguished by the victor spade!

Thus far both armies to Belinda yield; 65
Now to the baron fate inclines the field.
His warlike Amazon her host invades,
Th' imperial consort of the crown of spades.
The club's black tyrant first her victim died,
Spite of his haughty mien, and barb'rous pride: 70

What boots the regal circle on his head,
His giant limbs, in state unwieldy spread;
That long behind he trails his pompous robe,
And of all monarchs only grasps the globe?

The baron now his diamonds pours apace! 75
Th' embroidered king who shows but half his face,

And his refulgent queen, with pow'rs combined,
Of broken troops, an easy conquest find.
Clubs, diamonds, hearts, in wild disorder seen,
With throngs promiscuous strew the level green.

<sup>5</sup> A game of cards of Spanish origin played by three persons, the one naming the trump being opposed to the other two. The names of some of the cards are given in the passage following.

<sup>6</sup> The highest card in the game of Loo.

Thus when dispersed a routed army runs, 81
Of Asia's troops, and Afric's sable sons,
With like confusion different nations fly,
Of various habit, and of various dye;
The pierced battalions disunited fall, 85
In heaps on heaps; one fate o'erwhelms them all.

The knave of diamonds tries his wily arts,
And wins (oh shameful chance!) the queen of hearts.

At this, the blood the virgin's cheek forsook,
A livid paleness spreads o'er all her look; 90
She sees, and trembles at th' approaching ill,
Just in the jaws of ruin, and codille.<sup>7</sup>

And now (as oft in some distempered state)
On one nice trick depends the gen'ral fate:
An ace of hearts steps forth: the king unseen 95
Lurked in her hand, and mourned his captive queen:

He springs to vengeance with an eager pace,
And falls like thunder on the prostrate ace.
The nymph exulting fills with shouts the sky;
The walls, the woods, and long canals reply. 100

Oh thoughtless mortals! ever blind to fate,
Too soon dejected, and too soon elate.
Sudden these honours shall be snatched away,
And cursed for ever this victorious day.

For lo! the board with cups and spoons is crowned, 105

The berries crackle, and the mill turns round;
On shining altars of japan they raise
The silver lamp; the fiery spirits blaze:
From silver spouts the grateful liquors glide,
While China's earth receives the smoking tide: 110

At once they gratify their scent and taste,
And frequent cups prolong the rich repast.
Straight hover round the fair her airy band;
Some, as she sipped, the fuming liquor fanned,
Some o'er her lap their careful plumes displayed, 115

Trembling, and conscious of the rich brocade.
Coffee (which makes the politician wise,
And see through all things with his half-shut eyes)

Sent up in vapours to the baron's brain
New stratagems, the radiant look to gain. 120
Ah cease, rash youth! desist ere 'tis too late,
Fear the just gods, and think of Scylla's fate!
Changed to a bird, and sent to flit in air,
She dearly pays for Nisus' injured hair!

But when to mischief mortals bend their will,

How soon they find fit instrument of ill! 126
Just then, Clarissa drew with tempting grace
A two-edged weapon from her shining case:
So ladies in romance assist their knight,
Present the spear, and arm him for the fight. 130
He takes the gift with reverence, and extends
The little engine on his fingers' ends;
This just behind Belinda's neck he spread,
As o'er the fragrant steams she bends her head.
Swift to the lock a thousand sprites repair; 135
A thousand wings, by turns, blow back the hair;

<sup>7</sup> Failure to secure the requisite tricks.

And thrice they twitched the diamond in her
ear;
Thrice she looked back, and thrice the foe
drew near.
Just in that instant, anxious Ariel sought
The close recesses of the virgin's thought; 140
As on the nosegay in her breast reclined,
He watched th' ideas rising in her mind,
Sudden he viewed in spite of all her art,
An earthly lover lurking at her heart.
Amazed, confused, he found his pow'r expired,
Resigned to fate, and with a sigh retired. 146
The peer now spreads the glitt'ring forfex
wide
T' inclose the lock; now joins it, to divide.
Ev'n then, before the fatal engine closed,
A wretched sylph too fondly interposed; 150 Fate urged the shears, and cut the sylph in twain,
(But airy substance soon unites again,)
The meeting points the sacred hair dissever
From the fair head, for ever, and for ever!
Then flashed the living lightning from her
eyes, 155
And screams of horror rend th' affrighted skies.
Not louder shrieks to pitying heav'n are cast,
When husbands, or when lap-dogs breathe
their last;
Or when rich China vessels fall'n from high,
In glitt'ring dust, and painted fragments lie! 160
"Let wreaths of triumph now my temples twine,"
(The victor cried,) "the glorious prize is mine!
While fish in streams, or birds delight in air,
Or in a coach and six the British fair,
As long as Atalantis<sup>6</sup> shall be read, 165
Or the small pillow grace a lady's bed,
While visits shall be paid on solemn days,
When num'rous wax-lights in bright order blaze,
While nymphs take treats, or assignations give,
So long my honour, name, and praise shall live!" 170
What time would spare, from steel receives its date,
And monuments, like men, submit to fate!
Steel could the labour of the gods destroy,
And strike to dust th' imperial tow'rs of Troy;
Steel could the works of mortal pride con-
found,
And hew triumphal arches to the ground. 176
What wonder then, fair nymph! thy hair should feel
The conqu'ring force of unresisted steel?

CANTO IV

But anxious cares the pensive nymph oppressed,
And secret passions laboured in her breast.
Not youthful kings in battle seized alive,
Not scornful virgins who their charms survive,
Not ardent lovers robbed of all their bliss, 5
Not ancient ladies when refused a kiss,
Not tyrants fierce that unrepenting die,
Not Cynthia when her manteau's pinned awry,
E'er felt such rage, resentment, and despair,
As thou, sad virgin! for thy ravished hair. 10

<sup>6</sup> A popular book of the day.

For, that sad moment, when the sylphs withdrew,
And Ariel weeping from Belinda flew,
Umbriel, a dusky, melancholy sprite,
As ever sullied the fair face of light,
Down to the central earth, his proper scene, 15
Repaired to search the gloomy cave of Spleen.
Swift on his sooty pinions flits the gnome,
And in a vapour reached the dismal dome.
No cheerful breeze this sullen region knows,
The dreaded east is all the wind that blows, 20
Here in a grotto, sheltered close from air,
And screened in shades from day's detested
glare,
She sighs for ever on her pensive bed,
Pain at her side, and Megrim at her head.
Two handmaids wait the throne; alike in
place, 25
But diff'ring far in figure and in face.
Here stood Ill-nature like an ancient maid,
Her wrinkled form in black and white arrayed;
With store of pray'rs, for mornings, nights, and noons,
Her hand is filled; her bosom with lampoons. 30
There Affectation, with a sickly mien,
Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen,
Practised to lisp and hang the head aside,
Faints into airs, and languishes with pride,
On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe, 35
Wrapt in a gown, for sickness, and for show.
The fair ones feel such maladies as these,
When each new night-dress gives a new disease.
A constant vapour o'er the palace flies;
Strange phantoms rising as the mists arise; 40
Dreadful, as hermit's dreams in haunted shades,
Or bright, as visions of expiring maids.
Now glaring fiends, and snakes on rolling spires,
Pale spectres, gaping tombs, and purple fires;
Now lakes of liquid gold, Elysian scenes, 45
And crystal domes, and angels in machines.
Unnumbered throngs on ev'ry side are seen,
Of bodies changed to various forms by Spleen.
Here living tea-pots stand, one arm held out,
One bent; the handle this, and that the spout;
A pipkin there, like Homer's tripod walks; 51
Here sighs a jar, and there a goose-pye talks;
Men prove with child, as pow'rful fancy works,
And maids turned bottles call aloud for corks.
Safe past the gnome through this fantastic band, 55
A branch of healing spleenwort in his hand.
Then thus addressed the pow'r—"Hail, wayward queen!
Who rule the sex to fifty from fifteen;
Parent of vapours and of female wit,
Who give th' hysteric, or poetic fit, 60
On various tempers act by various ways,
Make some take physic, others scribble plays;
Who cause the proud their visits to delay,
And send the godly in a pet to pray;
A nymph there is, that all thy pow'r disdains, 65
And thousands more in equal mirth maintains.
But, oh! if e'er thy gnome could spoil a grace,
Or raise a pimple on a beauteous face,

Like citron-waters<sup>9</sup> matrons' cheeks inflame,
Or change complexions at a losing game; . . .
Or caus'd suspicion when no soul was rude, 73
Or discompos'd the head-dress of a prude,
Or e'er to costive lapdog gave disease, 75
Which not the tears of brightest eyes could ease,

Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin,
That single act gives half the world the spleen."

The goddess with a discontented air Seems to reject him, though she grants his prayer. 80
A wond'rous bag with both her hands she binds,

Like that where once Ulysses held the winds;
There she collects the force of female lungs,
Sighs, sobs, and passions, and the war of tongues,

A phial next she fills with fainting fears, 85
Soft sorrows, melting griefs, and flowing tears.
The gnome rejoicing bears her gifts away, Spreads his black wings, and slowly mounts to day.

Sunk in Thalestris' arms the nymph he
found,

Her eyes dejected, and her hair unbound. 90
Full o'er their heads the swelling bag he rent,
And all the furies issued at the vent.

Belinda burns with more than mortal ire,
And fierce Thalestris fans the rising fire.

"O wretched maid!" she spread her hands, and
cried, 95

(While Hampton's echoes "Wretched maid!" replied,)

"Was it for this you took such constant care
The bodkin, comb, and essence to prepare?
For this your locks in paper durance bound?
For this with tort'ring irons wreathed around?
For this with fillets strained your tender
head,

And bravely bore the double loads of lead? 102
Gods! shall the ravisher display your hair,

While the fops envy, and the ladies stare!
Honour forbid! at whose unrivalled shrine 105

Ease, pleasure, virtue, all our sex resign.
Methinks already I your tears survey,

Already hear the horrid things they say,
Already see you a degraded toast,

And all your honour in a whisper lost! 110
How shall I, then, your helpless fame defend?

'Twill then be infamy to seem your friend!
And shall this prize, th' inestimable prize,

Exposed through crystal to the gazing eyes,
And heightened by the diamond's circling rays,

On that rapacious hand for ever blaze? 116
Sooner shall grass in Hyde Park Circus grow,

And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow;<sup>10</sup>
Sooner let earth, air, sea, to chaos fall,

Men, monkeys, lap-dogs, parrots, perish all!"
She said; then raging to Sir Plume repairs, 121

And bids her beau demand the precious hairs:

<sup>9</sup> A drink composed of wine with the rind of lemons and citrons in it.

<sup>10</sup> i. e., within the sound of the bells of St. Mary le Bow, an old and famous church in the heart of London. In Pope's time the old part of London in the vicinity of this church was avoided by fashion and the "wits."

(Sir Plume,<sup>11</sup> of amber snuff-box justly vain,
And the nice conduct of a clouded cane)
With earnest eyes, and round unthinking face,
He first the snuff-box opened, then the case, 126
And thus broke out—"My Lord, why, what the devil!

Zounds! damn the lock! 'fore Gad, you must be civil.

Plague on 't! 'tis past a jest—nay prithee, pox!
Give her the hair"—he spoke, and rapped his
box. 130

"It grieves me much," replied the peer
again,

"Who speaks so well should ever speak in vain,
But by this lock, this sacred lock I swear,
(Which never more shall join its parted hair;
Which never more its honours shall renew, 135
Clipped from the lovely head where late it grew)
That, while my nostrils draw the vital air,
This hand, which won it, shall for ever wear."

He spoke, and speaking, in proud triumph
spread

The long-contended honours of her head. 140
But Umbriel, hateful gnome! forbears not so;

He breaks the phial whence the sorrows flow.
Then see! the nymph in beauteous grief appears,

Her eyes half-languishing, half-drowned in
tears;

On her heaved bosom hung her drooping head,
Which, with a sigh, she raised; and thus she said.

"For ever cursed be this detested day, 147
Which snatched my best, my fav'rite curl
away!

Happy! ah ten times happy had I been,
If Hampton-Court these eyes had never seen!

Yet am not I the first mistaken maid, 151
By love of courts to num'rous ills betrayed.

Oh had I rather unadmired remained
In some lone isle, or distant northern land,

Where the gilt chariot never marks the way, 155
Where none learn ombre, none e'er taste
bohea!<sup>12</sup>

There kept my charms concealed from mortal
eye,

Like roses, that in deserts bloom and die.
What moved my mind with youthful lords to roam?

Oh had I stayed, and said my pray'rs at home!
'Twas this, the morning omens seemed to tell,

Thrice from my trembling hand the patch-box fell; 162

The tott'ring china shook without a wind,
Nay, Poll sat mute, and Shock was most un-
kind!

A sylph too warned me of the threats of fate, 165
In mystic visions, now believed too late!

See the poor remnants of these slighted hairs!
My hands shall rend what ev'n thy rapine
spares:

These in two sable ringlets taught to break,
Once gave new beauties to the snowy neck; 170

The sister-lock now sits uncouth, alone,
And in its fellows' fate foresees its own;

<sup>11</sup> Sir George Brown.

nounced Bahay, as tea was pronounced tay.

Uncurl'd it hangs, the fatal shears demands.
And tempts, once more, thy sacrilegious hands,
Oh-hadst thou, cruel! been content to seize 175
Hairs less in sight, or any hairs but these!"

CANTO V

She said: the pitying audience melt in tears,
But fate and Jove had stopp'd the baron's ears.
In vain Thalestris with reproach assails,
For who can move when fair Belinda fails?
Not half so fix'd the Trojan could remain, 5
While Anna begged and Dido rag'd in vain.
Then grave Clarissa graceful wav'd her fan;
Silence ensued, and thus the nymph began:

"Say, why are beauties praised and honour'd most,

The wise man's passion, and the vain man's toast? 10

Why deck'd with all that land and sea afford,
Why angels call'd, and angel-like ador'd?

Why round our coaches crowd the white-gloved beaux,

Why bows the side-box from<sup>13</sup> its inmost rows?
How vain are all these glories, all our pains, 15

Unless good sense preserve what beauty gains;
That men may say, when we the front box
grace,

Behold the first in virtue as in face!

Oh! if to dance all night, and dress all day,
Charmed the small-pox, or chased old age
away; 20

Who would not scorn what housewife's cares produce,

Or who would learn one earthly thing of use?

To patch, nay ogle, might become a saint,
Nor could it sure be such a sin to paint.

But since, alas! frail beauty must decay, 25
Curled or uncurl'd, since locks will turn to gray;

Since painted, or not painted, all shall fade,
And she who scorns a man, must die a maid;

What then remains but well our pow'r to use,
And keep good-humour, still whate'er we lose?

And trust me, dear! good-humour can prevail,
When airs, and flights, and screams, and scolding fail. 32

Beauties in vain their pretty eyes may roll;
Charms strike the sight, but merit wins the soul."

So spoke the dame, but no applause ensued;
Belinda frowned, Thalestris call'd her prude. 36

"To arms, to arms!" the fierce virago cries,
And swift as lightning to the combat flies.

All side in parties, and begin th' attack;
Fans clap, silks rustle, and tough whalebones crack; 40

Heroes' and heroines' shouts confus'dly rise,
And base and treble voices strike the skies.

No common weapons in their hands are found,
Like gods they fight, nor dread a mortal wound.

So when bold Homer makes the gods engage, 45

And heav'nly breasts with human passions rage;
'Gainst Pallas, Mars; Latona, Hermes arms;

And all Olympus rings with loud alarms:

<sup>13</sup> In the theatres the gentlemen occupied the side, and the ladies, the front boxes.

Jove's thunder roars, heav'n trembles all around,

Blue Neptune storms, the bellowing deeps resound: 50

Earth shakes her nodding tow'rs, the ground gives way,

And the pale ghosts start at the flash of day!
Triumphant Umbriel on a scone's height

Clapp'd his glad wings, and sate to view the fight.

Propp'd on their bodkin spears, the sprites survey 55

The growing combat, or assist the fray.
While through the press enrag'd Thalestris

flies,
And scatters death around from both her eyes,

A beau and witing perished in the throng,
One died in metaphor, and one in song. 60

"O cruel nymph! a living death I bear,"
Cried Dapperwit, and sunk beside his chair.

A mournful glance Sir Fopling upward cast,
"Those eyes are made so killing"—was his last.

Thus on Meander's flow'ry margin lies 65

Th' expiring swan, and as he sings he dies.
When bold Sir Plume had drawn Clarissa

down,
Chloe stepped in, and killed him with a frown;

She smil'd to see the doughty hero slain,
But, at her smile, the beau reviv'd again. 70

Now Jove suspends his golden scales in air,
Weighs the men's wits against the lady's hair;

The doubtful beam long nods from side to side;

At length the wits mount up, the hairs subside.
See fierce Belinda on the baron flies, 75

With more than usual lightning in her eyes:
Nor fear'd the chief th' unequal fight to try,

Who sought no more than on his foe to die.
But this bold lord with manly strength endued,

She with one finger and a thumb subdued; 80
Just where the breath of life his nostrils drew,

A charge of snuff the wily virgin threw;
The gnomes direct, to-ev'ry atom just,

The pungent grains of titillating dust.
Sudden, with starting tears each eye o'erflows,

And the high dome re-echoes to his nose. 86
"Now meet thy fate," incensed Belinda cried,

And drew a deadly bodkin from her side.
(The same, his ancient personage to deck, 89

Her great-great-grand sire wore about his neck,
In three seal-rings; which after, melted down,

Form'd a vast buckle for his widow's gown:
Her infant grandame's whistle next it grew,

The bells she jingled, and the whistle blew;
Then in a bodkin<sup>14</sup> grac'd her mother's hairs, 95

Which long she wore, and now Belinda wears.)
"Boast not my fall," he cried, "insulting foe!

Thou by some other shalt be laid as low:
Nor think, to die dejects my lofty mind;

All that I dread is leaving you behind! 100
Rather than so, ah let me still survive,

And burn in Cupid's flames—but burn alive."
"Restore the lock!" she cries; and all around

"Restore the lock!" the vaulted roofs rebound.

<sup>14</sup> A large ornamental hairpin.

Not fierce Othello in so loud a strain 105 Roared for the handkerchief that caused his pain.

But see how oft' ambitious aims are crossed,
And chiefs contend till all the prize is lost!

The lock, obtained with guilt, and kept with
pain,

In ev'ry place is sought, but sought in vain: 110
With such a prize no mortal must be blest,
So heav'n decrees: with heav'n who can contest?

Some thought it mounted to the lunar
sphere,

Since all things lost on earth are treasured
there.

There heroes' wits are kept in pond'rous vases, 115

And beaus' in snuff-boxes and tweezer-cases.

There broken vows, and death-bed alms are
found,

And lovers' hearts with ends of ribbon bound,
The courtier's promises, and sick man's pray'rs.

The smiles of harlots, and the tears of heirs, 120
Cages for gnats, and chains to yoke a flea,
Dried butterflies, and tomes of casuistry.

But trust the Muse—she saw it upward rise,

Tho' mark'd by none but quick, poetic eyes:
(So Rome's great founder to the heav'ns withdrew, 125

To Proculus alone confessed in view)
A sudden star, it shot through liquid air,

And drew behind a radiant trail of hair.
Not Berenice's locks first rose so bright,

The heav'n's bespangling with disheveled light.
The sylphs behold it kindling as it flies, 131

And pleased pursue its progress through the skies.

This the beau monde shall from the Mall
survey,

And hail with music its propitious ray;
This the bless'd lover shall for Venus take, 135

And send up vows from Rosamonda's lake;<sup>15</sup>
This Partridge<sup>16</sup> soon shall view in cloudless
skies,

When next he looks through Galileo's eyes;
And hence th' egregious wizard shall fore-doom

The fate of Louis,<sup>17</sup> and the fall of Rome. 140
Then cease, bright nymph! to mourn thy ravished hair,

Which adds new glory to the shining sphere!
Not all the tresses that fair head can boast,

Shall draw such envy as the Lock you lost.
For after all the murders of your eye, 145

When, after millions slain, yourself shall die;
When those fair suns shall set, as set they must,

And all those tresses shall be laid in dust,
This lock, the Muse shall consecrate to fame,

And 'midst the stars inscribe Belinda's name.

ELEGY TO THE MEMORY OF AN UN- FORTUNATE LADY

(1717)

What beck'ning ghost, along the moon-light
shade

Invites my steps, and points to yonder glade?
'Tis she!—but why that bleeding bosom gored?

Why dimly gleams the visionary sword?
Oh ever beauteous, ever friendly! tell, 5

Is it, in heav'n, a crime to love too well?
To bear too tender, or too firm a heart,

To act a lover's or a Roman's part?
Is there no bright reversion in the sky,

For those who greatly think, or bravely die? 10
Why bade ye else, ye pow'rs! her soul aspire
Above the vulgar flight of low desire?

Ambition first sprung from your blessed abodes;
The glorious fault of angels and of gods:

Thence to their images on earth it flows, 15
And in the breasts of kings and heroes glows.
Most souls, 'tis true, but peep out once an age,
Dull sullen pris'ners in the body's cage:

Dim lights of life, that burn a length of years
Useless, unseen, as lamps in sepulchres; 20

Like Eastern kings a lazy state they keep,
And, close confined to their own palace, sleep.

From these perhaps (ere nature bade her die)

Fate snatched her early to the pitying sky.
As into air the purer spirits flow, 25

And sep'rate from their kindred dregs below;
So flew the soul to its congenial place,

Nor left one virtue to redeem her race.

But thou, false guardian of a charge too good,
Thou mean deserter of thy brother's blood! 30

See on these ruby lips the trembling breath,
These cheeks now fading at the blast of death;

Cold is that breast which warmed the world before,

And those love-darting eyes must roll no more.
Thus, if eternal justice rules the ball, 35

Thus shall your wives, and thus your children
fall:

On all the line a sudden vengeance waits,
And frequent hearses shall besiege your gates;

Their passengers shall stand, and pointing say,
(While the long fun'ral's blacken all the way) 40

"Lo! these were they, whose souls the furies
steeled,

"And cursed with hearts unknowing how to yield."

Thus unlamented pass the proud away,
The gaze of fools, and pageant of a day!

So perish all, whose breast ne'er learned to glow
For others' good, or melt at others' woe. 46

What can atone, oh ever-injured shade!
Thy fate unpitied, and thy rites unpaid?

No friend's complaint, no kind domestic tear Pleased thy pale ghost, or graced thy mournful bier. 50

By foreign hands thy dying eyes were closed,
By foreign hands thy decent limbs composed,

By foreign hands thy humble grave adorned,
By strangers honoured and by strangers mourned!

What though no friends in sable weeds appear,
Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn a year,
And bear about the mockery of woe 57
To midnight dances, and the public show?
What though no weeping loves thy ashes
grace,
Nor polished marble emulate thy face? 60
What though no sacred earth allow thee room,
Nor hallowed dirge be muttered o'er thy tomb?
Yet shall thy grave with rising flowers be dressed,
And the green turf lie lightly on thy breast:
There shall the morn her earliest tears bestow,
There the first roses of the year shall blow; 66
While angels with their silver wings o'ershade
The ground, now sacred by thy reliques made.
So peaceful rests, without a stone, a name,
What once had beauty, titles, wealth, and fame. 70
How loved, how honoured once, avails thee not,
To whom related, or by whom begot;
A heap of dust alone remains of thee;
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be!
Poets themselves must fall like those they sung, 75
Deaf the praised ear, and mute the tuneful
tongue.
Ev'n he, whose soul now melts in mournful lays,
Shall shortly want the gen'rous tear he pays;
Then from his closing eyes thy form shall part,
And the last pang shall tear thee from his heart,
Life's idle business at one gasp be o'er, 81
The muse forgot, and thou beloved no more!

UNIVERSAL PRAYER

(Published 1738)

Father of all! in ev'ry age,
In ev'ry clime adored,
By saint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord!
Thou Great First Cause, least understood! 5
Who all my sense confined
To know but this, that Thou art good,
And that myself am blind;
Yet gave me in this dark estate,
To see the good from ill: 10
And binding nature fast in fate,
Left free the human will.
What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns me not to do,
This teach me more than hell to shun, 15
That, more than heav'n pursue.
What blessings thy free bounty gives
Let me not cast away;
For God is paid when man receives:
T' enjoy is to obey. 20
Yet not to earth's contracted span
Thy goodness let me bound,
Or think Thee Lord alone of man,
When thousand worlds are round:

Let not this weak, unknowing hand 25
Presume thy bolts to throw,
And deal damnation round the land
On each I judge thy foe.
If I am right, thy grace impart
Still in the right to stay: 30
If I am wrong, oh teach my heart
To find that better way.
Save me alike from foolish pride,
Or impious discontent,
At aught thy wisdom has denied, 35
Or aught thy goodness lent.
Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me. 40
Mean though I am, not wholly so,
Since quickened by thy breath:
Oh lead me wheresoe'er I go,
Through this day's life or death.
This day be bread and peace my lot: 45
All else beneath the sun,
Thou know'st if best bestowed or not,
And let thy will be done.
To Thee, whose temple is all space,
Whose altar, earth, sea, skies, 50
One chorus let all being raise;
All nature's incense rise!

EPISTLE TO DR. ARBUTHNOT<sup>1</sup>

BEING THE PROLOGUE TO THE SATIRES

(Published 1735)

P. Shut, shut the door, good John!<sup>2</sup> fatigued I said:
Tie up the knocker, say I'm sick, I'm dead.
The Dog-star rages! nay, 'tis past a doubt,
All Bedlam, or Parnassus is let out:
Fire in each eye, and papers in each hand, 5
They rave, recite, and madden round the land.
What walls can guard me, or what shades can hide?
They pierce my thickets, through my grot<sup>3</sup> they glide,
By land, by water, they renew the charge,
They stop the chariot, and they board the barge. 10
No place is sacred, not the church is free,
Ev'n Sunday shines no Sabbath-day to me:
Then from the Mint<sup>4</sup> walks forth the man of rhyme,
Happy! to catch me, just at dinner-time.

<sup>4</sup> A district in Southwark, so called from a Mint established there by Henry VIII. As persons were exempt from arrest within this district, it became a refuge for insolvent debtors, criminals and poor authors.

Is there a parson, much be-mus'd<sup>5</sup> in beer,
 A maudlin poetess, a rhyming peer; 16
 A clerk, foredoomed his father's soul to cross,
 Who pens a stanza, when he should engross?
 Is there, who, locked from ink and paper,
 scrawls
 With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls! 20
 All fly to Twit'nam, and in humble strain
 Apply to me, to keep them mad or vain.
 Arthur,<sup>6</sup> whose giddy son neglects the laws, Imputes to me and my damned works the
 cause:

Poor Cornus<sup>7</sup> sees his frantic wife elope, 25
 And curses wit, and poetry, and Pope.

Friend to my life! (which did not you pro-
 long,

The world had wanted many an idle song),
 What drop or nostrum can this plague remove?
 Or which must end me, a fool's wrath or love? 30
 A dire dilemma! either way I'm sped,<sup>8</sup>
 If foes, they write, if friends, they read me dead.
 Seized and tied down to judge, how wretched I!
 Who can't be silent, and who will not lie:
 To laugh, were want of goodness and of grace, 35
 And to be grave, exceeds all power of face.

I sit with sad civility, I read
 With honest anguish, and an aching head;
 And drop at last, but in unwilling ears,
 This saving counsel—"Keep your piece nine years." 40

"Nine years!" cried he, who, high in Drury
 Lane,<sup>9</sup>

Lulled by soft zephyrs through the broken pane,

Rhymes ere he wakes, and prints before Term ends,<sup>10</sup>

Obliged by hunger and request of friends:
 "The piece you think is incorrect? why take
 it; 45

I'm all submission; what you'd have it, make
 it."

Three things another's modest wishes bound,
 My friendship, and a prologue, and ten pound.

Pitholeon<sup>11</sup> sends to me: "You know his
 grace,

I want a patron; ask him for a place." 50

Pitholeon libelled me—"but here's a letter informs you, sir, 'twas when he knew no better.

Dare you refuse him? Curll<sup>12</sup> invites to dine;
 He'll write a journal, or he'll turn divine."

Bless me! a packet. "Tis a stranger sues, 55
 A virgin tragedy, an orphan Muse."

<sup>6</sup> Arthur Moore, a prominent man in politics and society. His son was a dissipated fop who had excited Pope's resentment.

<sup>9</sup> A fashionable quarter in the days of the Stuarts, it had become the abode of vice, poverty, and poor authors even before Pope's time.

<sup>10</sup> I. e., before the end of the Trinity Term of the London Courts, which about coincided with the end of the London Season.

<sup>11</sup> Referred to by Horace as a poet who gloried in mixing Greek and Latin in his epigrams.

<sup>12</sup> A bookseller with whom Pope was on bad terms for twenty years.

If I dislike it, "Furies, death, and rage!"

If I approve, "Commend it to the stage."

There (thank my stars) my whole commission ends,

The players and I are, luckily, no friends. 60

Fired that the house reject him, "Sdeath I'll print it,

And shame the fools—your interest, sir, with Lintot."<sup>13</sup>

Lintot, dull rogue, will think your price too much:

"Not, sir, if you revise it, and retouch."

All my demurs but double his attacks: 65

At last he whispers, "Do; and we go snacks."

Glad of a quarrel, straight I clap the door: 67

"Sir, let me see your works and you no
 more." . . .

One dedicates in high heroic prose, 109

And ridicules beyond a hundred foes:

One from all Grub Street<sup>14</sup> will my fame defend,

And, more abusive, calls himself my friend.

This prints my letters, that expects a bribe,

And others roar aloud, "Subscribe, subscribe!"

There are who to my person pay their court:

I cough like Horace, and, though lean, am short.

Ammon's great son<sup>15</sup> one shoulder had too
 high,— 117

Such Ovid's nose,—and, "sir, you have an eye."

Go on, obliging creatures, make me see

All that disgraced my betters met in me. 120

Say, for my comfort, languishing in bed,

"Just so immortal Maro<sup>16</sup> held his head:"

And, when I die, be sure you let me know

Great Homer died three thousand years ago.

Why did I write? what sin to me unknown

Dipped me in ink, my parents', or my own? 126

As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame,

I lisped in numbers, for the numbers came.

I left no calling for this idle trade,

No duty broke, no father disobeyed: 130

The muse but served to ease some friend, not wife,

To help me through this long disease, my life;

To second, Arbuthnot! thy art and care, 133

And teach the being you preserved to bear. . . .

Soft were my numbers; who could take offence 147

While pure description held the place of sense? . . .

Did some more sober critic come abroad— 157

If wrong, I smiled; if right, I kissed the rod.

Pains, reading, study, are their just pretence,

And all they want is spirit, taste, and sense. 160

Commas and points they set exactly right,

And 't were a sin to rob them of their mite. . . .

Were others angry—I excused them too; 173

Well might they rage, I gave them but their due.

A man's true merit 'tis not hard to find; 175

But each man's secret standard in his mind,

 of the Egyptian god Ammon. <sup>16</sup> Virgil.

That casting-weight pride adds to emptiness,
 This, who can gratify, for who can guess?
 The bard<sup>17</sup> whom pilfered Pastorals renown,
 Who turns a Persian tale for half-a-crown, 180
 Just writes to make his barrenness appear,
 And strains from hard-bound brains, eight lines
 a-year;

He, who still wanting, though he lives on theft,
 Steals much, spends little, yet has nothing left:
 And he, who now to sense, now nonsense lean-
 ing, 185

Means not, but blunders round about a meaning;

And he, whose fustian's so sublimely bad,
 It is not poetry but prose run mad:

All these, my modest satire bade translate,
 And owned that nine such poets made a Tate.<sup>18</sup>
 How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe! 191

And swear, not Addison<sup>19</sup> himself was safe.

Peace to all such! but were there one whose fires

True genius kindles, and fair fame inspires;
 Blest with each talent, and each art to please,
 And born to write, converse, and live with ease:
 Should such a man, too fond to rule alone, 197
 Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne,
 View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes,
 And hate for arts that caused himself to rise; 200
 Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
 And without sneering, teach the rest to sneer;
 Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
 Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike,
 Alike reserved to blame, or to commend, 205
 A timorous foe, and a suspicious friend;
 Dreading e'en fools, by flatterers besieged,
 And so obliging, that he ne'er obliged;
 Like Cato, give his little senate laws,
 And sit attentive to his own applause; 210
 While wits and templars every sentence raise,
 And wonder with a foolish face of praise—
 Who but must laugh, if such a man there be?
 Who would not weep, if Atticus where he?

"IN VAIN, IN VAIN"

(From The Dunciad,<sup>1</sup> Bk. IV., 1742)

In vain, in vain, the all-composing Hour
 Resistless falls: the Muse obeys the Pow'r.
 She comes! she comes! the sable Throne behold
 Of Night primaeval and of Chaos old! 630
 Before her, Fancy's gilded clouds decay,
 And all its varying Rain-bows die away.
Wit shoots in vain its momentary fires,
 The meteor drops, and in a flash expires.

<sup>1</sup> Pope made many enemies, and while the Dunciad, or epic of Dunces, is one of the most famous and brilliant of English satires, it is also a malicious and too often unworthy attack upon Pope's literary contemporaries. In the first three books (1728), the prize for dullness is given to Lewis Theobald, an early editor of Shakespeare, but in a fourth book, added in 1742, Pope's anger led him to depose Theobald and put Colley Cibber in his place.

As one by one, at dread Medea's strain, 635
 The sick'ning stars fade off th'ethereal plain;
 As Argus' eyes by Hermes' wand oppress,
 Clos'd one by one to everlasting rest;
 Thus at her felt approach, and secret might,
 Art after Art goes out, and all is Night. 640
 See skulking Truth to her old cavern fled,
 Mountains of Casuistry heap'd o'er her head!
Philosophy, that lean'd on Heav'n before,
 Shrinks to her second cause, and is no more.
Physic of Metaphysic begs defense, 645
 And Metaphysic calls for aid on Sense!
 See Mystery to Mathematics fly!
 In vain! they gaze, turn giddy, rave, and die.
Religion blushing veils her sacred fires,
 And unawares Morality expires. 650
 For public Flame, nor private, dares to shine;
 Nor human Spark is left, nor Glimpse divine!
 Lo! thy dread Empire, CHAOS! is restor'd;
 Light dies before thy uncreating word;
 Thy hand, great Anarch! lets the curtain fall 655
 And universal Darkness buries All!

AN ESSAY ON MAN,<sup>1</sup>

IN FOUR EPISTLES

TO

HENRY ST. JOHN, LORD BOLINGBROKE

(Selections)

Written in the Year 1732

EPISTLE I

Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things
 To low ambition and the pride of kings.
 Let us, since life can little more supply
 Than just to look about us and to die,
 Expatriate free o'er all this scene of man; 5
 A mighty maze! but not without a plan;
 A wild, where weeds and flowers promiscuous shoot;
 Or garden tempting with forbidden fruit.
 Together let us beat this ample field,
 Try what the open, what the covert yield; 10
 The latent tracts, the giddy heights, explore,
 Of all who blindly creep, or sightless soar;
 Eye Nature's walks, shoot Folly as it flies,
 And catch the manners living as they rise;
 Laugh where we must, be candid where we can;
 But vindicate the ways of God to man. 16

Say first, of God above or man below,
 What can we reason but from what we know?
 Of man, what see we but his station here,
 From which to reason, or to which refer? 20
 Through worlds unnumbered though the God be known,
 'Tis ours to trace Him only in our own.
 He, who through vast immensity can pierce,
 See worlds on worlds compose one universe,

Observe how system into system runs, 25
 What other planets circle other suns,
 What varied being peoples every star,
 May tell why Heaven has made us as we are.
 But of this frame, the bearings and the ties,
 The strong connections, nice dependencies, 30
 Gradations just, has thy pervading soul Looked through, or can a part contain the whole?

Is the great chain that draws all to agree,
 And drawn supports, upheld by God or thee?

Presumptuous man! the reason wouldst
 thou find, 35

Why formed so weak, so little, and so blind?
 First, if thou canst, the harder reason guess,
 Why formed no weaker, blinder, and no less?
 Ask of thy mother earth, why oaks are made Taller or stronger than the weeds they shade! 40
 Or ask of yonder argent fields above
 Why Jove's satellites are less than Jove!

Of systems possible, if 'tis confessed
 That wisdom infinite must form the best,
 Where all must full or not coherent be, 45
 And all that rises rise in due degree,
 Then, in the scale of reasoning life, 'tis plain
 There must be somewhere such a rank as man:
 And all the question (wrangle e'er so long)
 Is only this, if God has placed him wrong. 50

Respecting man, whatever wrong we call,
 May, must be right, as relative to all.
 In human works, though labored on with
 pain,
 A thousand movements scarce one purpose gain;

In God's, one single can its end produce; 55
 Yet serves to second too some other use.
 So man, who here seems principal alone,
 Perhaps acts second to some sphere unknown,
 Touches some wheel, or verges to some goal;
 'Tis but a part we see, and not a whole. 60

When the proud steed shall know why man
 restrains

His fiery course, or drives him o'er the plains;
 When the dull ox, why now he breaks the clod,

Is now a victim, and now Egypt's god;
 Then shall man's pride and dullness comprehend 65

His actions, ' passions', being's, use and end;
 Why doing, suff'ring, checked, impelled; and why

This hour a slave, the next a deity.

Then say not man's imperfect, Heaven in fault;

Say rather man's as perfect as he ought: 70
 His knowledge measured to his state and place,
 His time a moment, and a point his space.

If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
 What matter, soon or late, or here or there?
 The blest to-day is as completely so, 75
 As who began a thousand years ago.

Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate.

All but the page prescribed, their present state;

From brutes what men, from men what spirits know;

Or who could suffer being here below? 80

The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
 Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?
 Pleased to the last, he crops the flowery food,
 And licks the hand just raised to shed his blood.

Oh blindness to the future! kindly given, 85

That each may fill the circle marked by Heaven:

Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,

A hero perish, or a sparrow fall,

Atoms or systems into ruin hurled,

And now a bubble burst, and now a world. 90

Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions
 soar;

Wait the great teacher Death, and God adore.

What future bliss He gives not thee to know,

But gives that hope to be thy blessing now.

Hope springs eternal in the human breast; 95

Man never is, but always to be, blest.

The soul, uneasy, and confined from home,

Rests and expatiates in a life to come.

Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind

Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind; 100

His soul proud science never taught to stray

Far as the solar walk or milky way;

Yet simple Nature to his hope has given,

Behind the cloud-topped hill, an humbler
 heaven;

Some safer world in depth of woods embraced,

Some happier island in the watery waste. 106

Where slaves once more their native land behold,

No finds torment, no Christians thirst for gold.

To be, contents his natural desire;

He asks no angel's wings, no seraph's fire; 110

But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,

His faithful dog shall bear him company.

Go, wiser thou! and in thy scale of sense,

Weigh thy opinion against Providence;

Call imperfection what thou fanciest such, 115

Say, Here He gives too little, there too much!

Destroy all creatures for thy sport or gust,

Yet cry, If man's unhappy, God's unjust;

If man alone engross not Heaven's high care,

Alone made perfect here, immortal there: 120

Snatch from His hand the balance and the rod,

Re-judge His justice, be the god of God.

In pride, in reasoning pride, our error lies;

All quit their sphere and rush into the skies!

Pride still is aiming at the blest abodes, 125

Men would be angels, angels would be gods.

Aspiring to be gods if angels fell,

Aspiring to be angels men rebel:

And who but wishes to invert the laws

Of order, sins against the Eternal Cause. 130

Ask for what end the heavenly bodies shine,

Earth for whose use? Pride answers, "'Tis for mine!

For me kind Nature wakes her genial power,

Suckles each herb, and spreads out every flower;

Annual for me, the grape, the rose renew, 135

The juice nectareous and the balmy dew;

For me the mine a thousand treasures brings;
 For me health gushes from a thousand springs;
 Seas roll to waft me, suns to light me rise;
 My footstool earth, my canopy the skies!" 140

But errs not Nature from this gracious end,
 From burning suns when livid deaths descend,
 When earthquakes swallow, or when tempests sweep

Towns to one grave, whole nations to the deep?
 "No," 'tis replied, "the first Almighty Cause
 Acts not by partial but by general laws: 146
 The exceptions few; some change since all began;

And what created perfect?"—Why then man?
 If the great end be human happiness,
 Then Nature deviates; and can man do less? 150
 As much that end a constant course requires
 Of showers and sunshine, as of man's desires:
 As much eternal springs and cloudless skies,
 As men forever temperate, calm, and wise.
 If plagues or earthquakes break not Heaven's design, 155

Why then a Borgia<sup>2</sup> or a Catiline?<sup>3</sup>
 Who knows but He, whose hand the lightning
 forms,

Who heaves old ocean, and who wings the storms,

Pours fierce ambition in a Cæsar's mind,
 Or turns young Ammon<sup>4</sup> loose to scourge mankind? 160

From pride, from pride our very reasoning
 springs;

Account for moral, as for natural things:
 Why charge we Heaven in those, in these acquit?

In both to reason right is to submit.

Better for us, perhaps, it might appear, 165
 Were there all harmony, all virtue here;
 That never air or ocean felt the wind;
 That never passion discomposed the mind.
 But all subsists by elemental strife;
 And passions are the elements of life. 170
 The general order, since the whole began,
 Is kept in nature, and is kept in man.

What would this man? Now upward will he soar,
 And little less than angel, would be more!
 Now looking downwards, just as grieved appears 175

To want the strength of bulls, the fur of bears.
 Made for his use, all creatures if he call,
 Say what their use, had he the powers of all:
 Nature to these without profusion kind,
 The proper organs, proper powers assigned; 180
 Each seeming want compensated of course,
 Here with degrees of swiftness, there of force:
 All in exact proportion to the state;
 Nothing to add, and nothing to abate:
 Each beast, each insect happy in its own: 185
 Is Heaven unkind to man, and man alone?

Shall he alone, whom rational we call,
 Be pleased with nothing, if not blessed with all?
 The bliss of man (could pride that blessing find),

Is not to act or think beyond mankind; 190
 No powers of body or of soul to share,
 But what his nature and his state can bear.
 Why has not man a microscopic eye?
 For this plain reason, man is not a fly.

Say what the use, were finer optics given, 195
 To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?
 Or touch, if tremblingly alive all o'er,
 To smart and agonize at every pore?
 Or quick effluvia darting through the brain,
 Die of a rose in aromatic pain? 200

If Nature thundered in his opening ears,
 And stunned him with the music of the spheres,
 How would he wish that Heaven had left him still

The whispering zephyr and the purling rill!
 Who finds not Providence all good and wise, 205
 Alike in what it gives, and what denies?

Far as creation's ample range extends,
 The scale of sensual, mental powers ascends.
 Mark how it mounts to man's imperial race,
 From the green myriads in the peopled grass;
 What modes of sight betwixt each wide extreme,
 The mole's dim curtain, and the lynx's beam:
 Of smell, the headlong lioness between, 213
 And hound sagacious on the tainted green:
 Of hearing, from the life that fills the flood, 215
 To that which warbles through the vernal wood!
 The spider's touch how exquisitely fine!
 Feels at each thread, and lives along the line:
 In the nice bee, what sense so subtly true
 From poisonous herbs extracts the healing dew?
 How instinct varies in the groveling swine, 221
 Compared, half-reasoning elephant, with thine!
 'Twixt that and reason, what a nice barrier!
 Forever separate, yet for ever near!
 Remembrance and reflection, how allied; 225
 What thin partitions sense from thought divide;
 And middle natures, how they long to join,
 Yet never pass the insuperable line!
 Without this just gradation, could they be Subjected, these to those, or all to thee? 230
 The powers of all subdued by thee alone,
 Is not thy reason all these powers in one?

See, through this air, this ocean, and this
 earth,

All matter quick, and bursting into birth.
 Above, how high progressive life may go! 235
 Around, how wide! how deep extend below!
 Vast chain of being! which from God began,
 Natures ethereal, human, angel, man,
 Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see,
 No glass can reach; from infinite to thee, 240
 From thee to nothing. On superior powers
 Were we to press, inferior might on ours:
 Or in the full creation leave a void,
 Where, one step broken, the great scale's destroyed:

From Nature's chain whatever link you strike,
 Tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike.

<sup>2</sup> Cæsar Borgia, son of Pope Alexander VI. He was a monster of wickedness.

And if each system in gradation roll 247
 Alike essential to the amazing whole,
 The least confusion but in one, not all
 That system only, but the whole must fall. 250
 Let earth unbalanced from her orbit fly,
 Planets and suns run lawless through the sky;
 Let ruling angels from their spheres be hurled,
 Being on being wrecked, and world on world;
 Heaven's whole foundations to their center nod,
 And Nature tremble to the throne of God! 256
 All this dread order break—for whom? for thee?
 Vile worm!—Oh! madness! pride! impiety!

What if the foot, ordained the dust to tread,
 Or hand, to toil, aspired to be the head? 260
 What if the head, the eye, or ear repined
 To serve mere engines to the ruling mind?
 Just as absurd for any part to claim
 To be another in this general frame;
 Just as absurd to mourn the tasks or pains 265
 The great directing Mind of all ordains.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
 Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
 That, changed through all, and yet in all the
 same,
 Great in the earth, as in the ethereal frame, 270
 Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
 Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees,
 Lives through all life, extends through all extent,
 Spreads undivided, operates unspent;
 Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
 As full, as perfect in a hair as heart; 276
 As full, as perfect in vile man that mourns,
 As the rapt seraph that adores and burns:
 To Him no high, no low, no great, no small;
 He fills, He bounds, connects, and equals all. 280

Cease then, nor Order imperfection name:
 Our proper bliss depends on what we blame.
 Know thy own point: this kind, this due degree
 Of blindness, weakness, Heaven bestows on thee.

Submit: in this or any other sphere, 285
 Secure to be as blessed as thou canst bear;
 Safe in the hand of one disposing Power,
 Or in the natal, or the mortal hour.
 All nature is but art unknown to thee;
 All chance, direction which thou cast not see;
 All discord, harmony not understood; 291
 All partial evil, universal good;
 And, spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
 One truth is clear, Whatever is, is right.

FABLE XVIII

THE PAINTER WHO PLEASED NOBODY AND EVERYBODY

(From Fables, 1727)

Lest men suspect your tale untrue,
 Keep probability in view.
 The traveller leaping o'er those bounds,
 The credit of his book confounds.

Who with his tongue hath armies routed, 5
 Makes ev'n his real courage doubted.
 But flattery never seems absurd;
 The flatter'd always take your word:
 Impossibilities seem just:
 They take the strongest praise on trust. 10
 Hyperboles, though ne'er so great,
 Will still come short of self-conceit.

So very like a Painter drew,
 That every eye the picture knew;
 He hit complexion, feature, air, 15
 So just, the life itself was there.
 No flattery with his colours laid,
 To bloom restor'd the faded maid;
 He gave each muscle all its strength;
 The mouth, the chin, the nose's length; 20
 His honest pencil touch'd with truth,
 And mark'd the date of age and youth.

He lost his friends, his practice fail'd;
 Truth should not always be reveal'd;
 In dusty piles his pictures lay, 25
 For no one sent the second pay.
 Two bustos,<sup>1</sup> fraught with every grace,
 A Venus' and Apollo's face,
 He plac'd in view; resolv'd to please,
 Who ever sat he drew from these, 30
 From these corrected every feature,
 And spirited each awkward creature.

All things were set; the hour was come,
 His palette ready o'er his thumb;
 My Lord appear'd; and, seated right, 35
 In proper attitude and light,
 The Painter look'd, he sketch'd the piece,
 Then dipt his pencil, talk'd of Greece,
 Of Titian's tints, of Guido's air;
 "Those eyes, my Lord, the spirit there, 40
 Might well a Raphael's hand require,
 To give them all the native fire;
 The features, fraught with sense and wit,
 You'll grant are very hard to hit:
 But yet with patience you shall view, 45
 As much as paint and art can do."

Observe the work. My Lord replied,
 "Till now I thought my mouth was wide;
 Besides, my nose is somewhat long;
 Dear, sir, for me, 'tis far too young!" 50

"Oh! pardon me, (the artist cried)
 In this we Painters must decide.
 The piece ev'n common eyes must strike,
 I warrant it extremely like."

My Lord examin'd it a-new; 55
 No looking-glass seem'd half so true.

A lady came, with borrow'd grace,
 He from his Venus form'd her face.
 Her lover prais'd the Painter's art;
 So like the picture in his heart! 60
 To every age some charm he lent;
 Ev'n beauties were almost content.

Through all the town his art they prais'd;
 His custom grew, his price was rais'd.
 Had he the real likeness shown, 65
 Would any man the picture own?
 But when thus happily he wrought,
 Each found the likeness in his thought.

ON A LAP DOG

Shock's fate I mourn; poor Shock is now no more!

Ye Muses! mourn, ye Chambermaids! deplore,
Unhappy Shock! Yet more unhappy fair,
Doom'd to survive thy joy and only care.

Thy wretched fingers now no more shall deck, 5
And tie the favorite ribband round his neck;
No more thy hand shall smooth his glossy hair,

And comb the wavings of his pendent ear.
Let cease thy flowing grief, forsaken maid!
All mortal pleasures in a moment fade: 10

Our surest hope is in an hour destroy'd,
And love, best gift of Heaven, not long enjoy'd.
Methinks I see her frantic with despair,
Her streaming eyes, wrung hands, and flowing hair;

Her Mechlin pinnars,<sup>1</sup> rent, the floor bestrow, 15
And her torn face gives real signs of woe.
Hence, Superstition! that tormenting guest,
That haunts with fancied fears the coward breast;

No dread events upon this fate attend,
Stream eyes no more, no more thy tresses rend.
Though certain omens oft forwarn a state, 21
And dying lions show the monarch's fate,
Why should such fears bid Celia's sorrow rise?
For when a lap dog falls, no lover dies.

Cease, Celia, cease; restrain thy flowing tears, 25

Some warmer passion will dispel thy cares.
In man you'll find a more substantial bliss,
More grateful toying and a sweeter kiss.

He's dead. Oh! lay him gently in the ground!
And may his tomb be by this verse renown'd. 30
Here Shock, the pride of all his kind, is laid,
Who fawn'd like man, but ne'er like man betray'd.

BLACK EYED SUSAN

All in the Downs the fleet was moored,
The streamers waving in the wind,
When Black-eyed Susan came aboard,
"Oh! where shall I my true love find?
Tell me, ye jovial sailors, tell me true, 5
If my sweet William sails among the crew?"

William, who high upon the yard
Rocked with the billow to and fro,
Soon as her well-known voice he heard
He sighed and cast his eyes below; 10
The cord slides swiftly through his glowing hands,
And, quick as lightning, on the deck he stands.

So the sweet lark, high poised in air,
Shuts close his pinions to his breast—
If chance his mate's shrill call he hear— 15
And drops at once into her nest.
The noblest captain in the British fleet
Might envy William's lips those kisses sweet.

<sup>1</sup> The long flaps belonging to a lady's headdress of that period. They hung down upon either side of the face.

"O Susan, Susan, lovely dear,
My vows shall ever true remain; 20
Let me kiss off that falling tear;
We only part to meet again.

Change as ye list, ye winds! my heart shall be
The faithful compass that still points to thee.

"Believe not what the landmen say, 25
Who tempt with doubts thy constant mind;
They'll tell thee, sailors, when away,
In every port a mistress find;
Yes, yes, believe them when they tell thee so,
For thou art present wheresoe'er I go. 30

"If to fair India's coast we sail,
Thy eyes are seen in diamonds bright;
Thy breath is Afric's spicy gale,
Thy skin is ivory so white.
Thus every beauteous object that I view, 35
Wakes in my soul some charm of lovely Sue.

"Though battle call me from thy arms,
Let not my pretty Susan mourn;
Though cannons roar, yet, safe from harms,
William shall to his dear return. 40
Love turns aside the balls that round me fly,
Lest precious tears should drop from Susan's eye."

The boatswain gave the dreadful word;
The sails their swelling bosom spread;
No longer must she stay abroad; 45
They kissed—she sighed—he hung his head.
Her lessening boat unwilling rows to land,
"Adieu!" she cries, and waved her lily hand.

TRIVIA, OR THE ART OF WALKING
THE STREETS OF LONDON

Book I. Selections. (1716)

Through winter streets to steer your course aright,
How to walk clean by day, and safe by night,
How jostling crowds, with prudence to decline,
When to assert<sup>1</sup> the wall, and when resign,
I sing: thou, Trivia!<sup>2</sup> goddess, aid my song, 5
Through spacious streets conduct thy bard
along;

By thee transported, I securely stray
Where winding alleys lead the doubtful way,
The silent court and opening square explore,
And long perplexing lanes untrod before. 10
To pave thy realm, and smooth the broken
ways,

Earth from her womb a flinty tribute pays;
For thee the sturdy paver thumps the ground,
Whilst every stroke his labouring lungs resound;
For thee the scavenger bids kennels glide 15
Within their bounds, and heaps of dirt subside.
My youthful bosom burns with thirst of fame,
From the great theme to build a glorious name,

<sup>1</sup> To lay claim to; i. e. to take the best part of the walk next to the houses and farthest from the gutter.

<sup>2</sup> From the Latin trivium, crossroads. Gay addresses Trivia as the goddess either of the streets or of trivial things.

To tread in paths to ancient bards unknown,
And bind my temples with a civic crown; 20
But more, my country's love demands the lays;
My country's be the profit; mine the praise.

The changing weather certain signs reveal.
Ere winter sheds her snow, or frosts con-
geal,
You'll see the coals in brighter flame aspire, 25
And sulphur tinge with blue the rising fire;
Your tender shins the scorching heat decline,
And at the dearth of coals the poor repine;
Before her kitchen hearth the nodding dame,
In flannel mantle wrapt, enjoys the flame; 30
Hovering upon her feeble knees she bends,
And all around the grateful warmth ascends.

Nor do less certain signs the Town advise
Of milder weather and serener skies.
The ladies, gaily dress'd, the Mall<sup>3</sup> adorn 35
With various dyes, and paint the sunny morn;
The wanton fawns with frisking pleasure range,
And chirping sparrows greet the welcome
change;
Not that their minds with greater skill are fraught,

Endued by instinct, or by reason taught, 40
The seasons operate on every breast;
'Tis hence that fawns are brisk, and ladies drest.

When on his box the nodding coachman snores,
And dreams of fancied fares; when tavern-
doors

The chairmen idly crowd, then ne'er refuse 45
To trust thy busy steps in thinner shoes.
But when the swinging signs your ears offend
With creaking noise, then rainy floods impend;

Soon shall the kennels swell with rapid streams,

And rush in muddy torrents to the Thames. 50
The bookseller, whose shop's an open square,
Foresees the tempest, and with early care
Of learning strips the rails: the rowing crew,
To tempt a fare, clothe all their tilts<sup>4</sup> in blue.

On hosiers' poles depending stockings tied, 55
Flag with the slacken'd gale from side to side.

Church-monuments foretell the changing air;
Then Niobe dissolves into a tear,
And sweats with secret grief. You'll hear the sounds

Of whistling winds, ere kennels break their bounds; 60

Ungrateful odours common sewers diffuse,
And dropping vaults distil unwholesome
dews,

Ere the tiles rattle with the smoking shower,
And spouts on heedless men their torrents pour.

BOOK II. Selections

Thus far the Muse has trac'd, in useful lays, 65
The proper implements for wintry ways;
Has taught the walker, with judicious eyes
To read the various warnings of the skies.
Now, venture, Muse! from home to range the
town,

And for the public safety risk thine own. 70
For ease and for despatch the morning's best;

No tides of passengers the street molest:
You'll see a draggled damsel here and there,
From Billingsgate<sup>5</sup> her fishy traffic bear:
On doors the sallow milkmaid chalks her gains;

Ah! how unlike the milkmaid of the plains! 76
Before proud gates attending asses<sup>6</sup> bray,
Or arrogate with solemn pace the way;
These grave physicians, with their milky cheer,
The love-sick maid and dwindling beau repair. 80

Here rows of drummers stand in martial file,

And with their vellum thunder shake the pile,

To greet the new-made bride. Are sounds like these

The proper prelude to a state of peace?
Now industry awakes her busy sons; 85

Full charg'd with news the breathless hawker runs;

Shops open, coaches roll, carts shake the
ground,

And all the streets with passing cries resound.
If cloth'd in black you tread the busy
town,

Or if distinguished by the reverend gown, 90
Three trades avoid. Oft in the mingling press
The barber's apron soils the sable dress:
Shun the perfumer's touch with cautious eye;
Nor let the baker's step advance too high.

Ye walkers too, that youthful colours wear, 95
Three sullyng trades avoid with equal care,
The little chimney-sweeper skulks along,
And marks with sooty stains the heedless throng;

When small-coal murmurs in the hoarser throat,
From smutty dangers guard thy threaten'd coat; 100

The dust-man's cart offends thy clothes and
eyes,

When through the street a cloud of ashes
flies;

But whether black or lighter dyes are worn,
The chandler's basket, on his shoulder borne,
With tallow spots thy coat; resign the way, 105
To shun the surly butcher's greasy tray;
Butchers! whose hands are dy'd with blood's foul stain,

And always foremost in the hangman's train.

Let due civilities be strictly paid;
The wall surrender to the hooded maid; 110

<sup>5</sup> A district in London along the Thames, which was the centre of the fish trade.

<sup>6</sup> Asses' milk was in great demand in the early 18th century.

Nor let thy sturdy elbow's hasty rage
Jostle the feeble steps of trembling age:
And when the porter bends beneath his load,
And pants for breath, clear thou the crowded road:

But, above all, the groping blind direct, 115
And from the pressing throng the lame protect.
You'll sometimes meet a fop, of nicest tread,
Whose mantling peruke veils his empty head:
At every step he dreads the wall to lose,
And risks, to save a coach, his red-heel'd 10 shoes; 120

Him, like the miller, pass with caution by,
Lest from his shoulder clouds of powder fly:
But when the bully, with assuming pace,
Cocks his broad hat, edg'd round with tarnished lace,

Yield not the way; defy his strutting pride, 125
And thrust him to the muddy kennel's side:
He never turns again, nor dares oppose,
But mutters coward curses as he goes.

When waggish boys the stunted besom ply
To rid the slabby pavement, pass not by 130
Ere thou hast held their hands; some heedless flirt

Will overspread thy calves with spattering dirt.
Where porters hogheads roll from carts aslope,
Or brewers down steep cellars stretch the rope,
Where counted billets are by carmen toss'd, 135
Stay thy rash step, and walk without the post.

What though the gathering mire thy feet
besmear?

The voice of industry is always near.
Hark! the boy calls thee to his destin'd stand,
And the shoe shines beneath his oily hand. 140

Now, heav'n-born Charity! thy blessing shed,
Bid meagre Want uprear her sickly head:
Bid shivering limbs be warm; let Plenty's bowl

In humble roofs make glad the needy soul.
See, see! the heav'n-born maid her blessings
shed; 145

Lo! meagre Want uprears her sickly head; 40
Cloth'd are the naked, and the needy glad,
While selfish Avarice alone is sad.

Proud coaches pass, regardless of the moan
Of infant orphans, and the widow's groan, 150
While charity still moves the walker's mind,
His liberal purse relieves the lame and blind.
Judiciously thy halfpence are bestow'd,

Where the laborious beggar sweeps the road.
Whate'er you give, give ever at demand, 155
Nor let old age long stretch his palsied hand.

Those who give late are importun'd each day, 50
And still are teas'd because they still delay.

If e'er the miser durst his farthings spare,
He thinly spreads them through the public square, 160

Where, all beside the rail, rang'd beggars lie,
And from each other catch the doleful cry;

With Heav'n, for two-pence, cheaply wipes
his score,

Lifts up his eyes, and hastes to beggar more.

5 A TRUE RELATION OF THE APPARI- TION OF MRS. VEAL,

THE NEXT DAY AFTER HER DEATH, TO MRS.
BARGRAVE, AT CANTERBURY, THE EIGHTH
OF SEPTEMBER, 1705, WHICH APPARITION
RECOMMENDS THE PERUSAL OF DRELIN-COURT'S BOOK OF CONSOLATIONS AGAINST THE FEARS OF DEATH.

THE PREFACE

This relation is matter of fact, and attended with such circumstances as may induce any reasonable man to believe it. It was sent by a gentleman, a justice of peace at Maidstone, 20 in Kent, and a very intelligent person, to his friend in London, as it is here worded; which discourse is attested by a very sober and understanding gentleman, who had it from his kinswoman, who lives in Canterbury, 25 within a few doors of the house in which the within-named Mrs. Bargrave lived; and who he believes to be of so discerning a spirit, as not to be put upon by any fallacy, and who positively assured him that the whole matter 30 as it is related and laid down is really true, and what she herself had in the same words, as near as may be, from Mrs. Bargrave's own mouth, who, she knows, had no reason to invent and publish such a story, or any design 35 to forge and tell a lie, being a woman of much honesty and virtue, and her whole life a course, as it were, of piety. The use which we ought to make of it is to consider that there is a life to come after this, and a just God who will retribute to every one according to the deeds done in the body, and therefore to reflect upon our past course of life we have led in the world; that our time is short and uncertain; and that if we would escape the punish-45 ment of the ungodly and receive the reward of the righteous, which is the laying hold of eternal life, we ought, for the time to come to return to God by a speedy repentance, ceasing to do evil, and learning to do well; to seek after God early, if haply He may be found of us, and lead such lives for the future as may be well pleasing in His sight.

A RELATION, &c

55 This thing is so rare in all its circumstances, and on so good authority, that my reading and conversation have not given me anything like it. It is fit to gratify the most ingenious and serious inquirer. Mrs. Bargrave is the person to whom Mrs. Veal appeared after her death; she is my intimate friend, and I can avouch for her reputation for these last fifteen or sixteen years, on my own knowledge; and I can confirm the good character she had from her youth to the time of my acquaintance; though since this relation she is calumniated by some people that are friends to the brother of Mrs. Veal who appeared, who think the relation of this appearance to be a reflection, and endeavour what they can to blast Mrs. Bargrave's reputation, and to laugh the story out of countenance. But by the circumstances thereof, and the cheerful disposition of Mrs. Bargrave, notwithstanding the ill-usage of a very wicked husband, there is not the least sign of dejection in her face; nor did I ever hear her let fall a desponding or murmuring expression; nay, not when actually under her husband's barbarity, which I have been witness to, and several other persons of undoubted reputation.

Now you must know Mrs. Veal was a maiden gentlewoman of about thirty years of age, and for some years last past had been troubled with fits, which were perceived coming on by her going off from her discourses very abruptly to some impertinence. She was maintained by an only brother, and kept his house in Dover. She was a very pious woman, and her brother a very sober man, to all appearance; but now he does all he can to null or quash the story. Mrs. Veal was intimately acquainted with Mrs. Bargrave from her childhood. Mrs. Veal's circumstances were then mean; her father did not take care of his children as he ought, so that they were exposed to hardships; and Mrs. Bargrave in those days had as unkind a father, though she wanted neither for food nor clothing, whilst Mrs. Veal wanted for both, insomuch that she would often say, "Mrs. Bargrave, you are not only the best, but the only friend I have in the world; and no circumstance in life shall ever dissolve my friendship." They would often condole each other's adverse fortunes, and read together, "Drelincourt upon Death," and other good books; and so, like two Christian friends, they comforted each other under their sorrow.

Some time after Mr. Veal's friends got him a place in the custom-house at Dover, which occasioned Mrs. Veal, by little and little, to fall off from her intimacy with Mrs. Bargrave, though there never was any such thing as a quarrel; but an indifferency came on by degrees, till at last Mrs. Bargrave had not seen her in two years and a half; though about a twelvemonth of the time Mrs. Bargrave had been absent from Dover, and this last half-year had been in Canterbury about two months of the time, dwelling in a house of her own.

In this house, on the 8th of September, 1705, she was sitting alone, in the forenoon, thinking over her unfortunate life, and arguing herself into a due resignation to Providence, though her condition seemed hard. "And," said she, "I have been provided for hitherto, and doubt not but I shall be still; and am well satisfied that my afflictions shall end when it is most fit for me;" and then took up her sewing-work, which she had no sooner done but she hears a knocking at the door. She went to see who was there, and this proved to be Mrs. Veal, her old friend, who was in a riding-habit; at that moment of time the clock struck twelve at noon.

"Madam," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I am surprised to see you, you have been so long a stranger;" but told her she was glad to see her, and offered to salute her, which Mrs. Veal complied with, till their lips almost touched; and then Mrs. Veal drew her hand across her own eyes and said, "I am not very well," and so waived it. She told Mrs. Bargrave she was going a journey, and had a great mind to see her first. "But," says Mrs. Bargrave, "how came you to take a journey alone? I am amazed at it, because I know you have a good brother." "Oh," says Mrs. Veal, "I gave my brother the slip, and came away, because I had so great a desire to see you before I took my journey." So Mrs. Bargrave went in with her into another room within the first, and Mrs. Veal set her down in an elbow-chair, in which Mrs. Bargrave was sitting when she heard Mrs. Veal knock. Then says Mrs. Veal, "My dear friend, I am come to renew our old friendship again, and beg your pardon for my breach of it; and if you can forgive me, you are the best of women." "Oh," says Mrs. Bargrave, "do not mention such a thing. I have not had an uneasy thought about it; I can easily forgive it." "What did you think of me?" said Mrs. Veal. Says Mrs. Bargrave, "I thought you were like the rest of the world, and that prosperity had made you forget yourself and me." Then Mrs. Veal reminded Mrs. Bargrave of the many friendly offices she did in her former days, and much of the conversation they had with each other in the times of their adversity; what books they read, and what comfort in particular they received from "Drelincourt's

Book of Death," which was the best, she said, on that subject ever written. She also mentioned Dr. Sherlock,<sup>2</sup> the two Dutch books which were translated, written upon Death, and several others; but Drelincourt, she said, had the clearest notions of death and of the future state of any who had handled that subject. Then she asked Mrs. Bargrave whether she had Drelincourt. She said, "Yes." Says Mrs. Veal, "Fetch it." And so Mrs. Bargrave goes up stairs and brings it down. Says Mrs. Veal, "Dear Mrs. Bargrave, if the eyes of our faith were as open as the eyes of our body, we should see numbers of angels about us for our guard. The notions we have of heaven now are nothing like to what it is, as Drelincourt says. Therefore be comforted under your afflictions, and believe that the Almighty has a particular regard to you, and that your afflictions are marks of God's favour; and when they have done the business they are sent for, they shall be removed from you. An believe me, my dear friend, believe what I say to you, one minute of future happiness will infinitely reward you for all your sufferings; for I can never believe" (and claps her hands upon her knees with great earnestness, which indeed ran through most of her discourse) "that ever God will suffer you to spend all your days in this afflicted state; but be assured that your afflictions shall leave you, or you them, in a short time." She spake in that pathetic and heavenly manner that Mrs. Bargrave wept several times, she was so deeply affected with it.

Then Mrs. Veal mentioned Dr. Horneck's "Ascetick,"<sup>3</sup> at the end of which he gives an account of the lives of the primitive Christians. Their pattern she recommended to our imitation, and said, "Their conversation was not like this of our age; for now," says she, "there is nothing but frothy, vain discourse, which is far different from theirs. Theirs was to edification, and to build one another up in faith; so that they were not as we are, nor are we as they were; but," said she, "we ought to do as they did. There was a hearty friendship among them; but where is it now to be found?" Says Mrs. Bargrave, "It is hard indeed to find a true friend in these days." Says Mrs. Veal, "Mr. Norris has a fine copy of verses, called 'Friendship in Perfection,' which I wonderfully admire. Have you seen the book?" says Mrs. Veal. "No," says

Mrs. Bargrave, "but I have the verses of my own writing out." "Have you?" says Mrs. Veal; "then fetch them." Which she did from above-stairs, and offered them to Mrs. Veal to read, who refused, and waived the thing, saying holding down her head would make it ache; and then desired Mrs. Bargrave to read them to her, which she did. As they were admiring "Friendship" Mrs. Veal said, "Dear Mrs. Bargrave, I shall love you for ever." In these verses there is twice used the word Elysian. "Ah!" says Mrs. Veal, "these poets have such names for heaven!" She would often draw her hand across her own eyes and say, "Mrs. Bargrave, do not you think I am mightily impaired by my fits?" "No," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I think you look as well as ever I knew you."

After all this discourse, which the apparition put in much finer words than Mrs. Bargrave said she could pretend to, and as much more than she can remember, for it cannot be thought that an hour and three-quarters' conversation could be retained, though the main of it she thinks she does, she said to Mrs. Bargrave she would have her write a letter to her brother, and tell him she would have him give rings to such and such, and that there was a purse of gold in her cabinet, and that she would have two broad pieces given to her cousin Watson.

Talking at this rate, Mrs. Bargrave thought that a fit was coming upon her, and so placed herself in a chair just before her knees, to keep her from falling to the ground, if her fits should occasion it (for the elbow-chair, she thought, would keep her from falling on either side); and to divert Mrs. Veal, as she thought, took hold of her gown-sleeve several times and commended it. Mrs. Veal told her it was a scoured silk, and newly made up. But for all this, Mrs. Veal persisted in her request, and told Mrs. Bargrave that she must not deny her, and she would have her tell her brother all their conversation when she had an opportunity. "Dear Mrs. Veal," said Mrs. Bargrave, "this seems so impertinent that I cannot tell how to comply with it; and what a mortifying story will our conversation be to a young gentleman? Why," says Mrs. Bargrave, "it is much better, methinks, to do it yourself." "No," says Mrs. Veal, "though it seems impertinent to you now, you will see more reason for it hereafter." Mrs. Bargrave then, to satisfy her importunity, was going to fetch a pen and ink, but Mrs. Veal said, "Let it alone now, but do it when I am gone; but you must be sure to do it;" which was one of the last things she enjoined her at parting. So she promised her.

Then Mrs. Veal asked for Mrs. Bargrave's daughter. She said she was not at home, "but if you have a mind to see her," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I'll send for her." "Do," says Mrs. Veal. On which she left her, and went to a neighbour's to see for her; and by the time Mrs. Bargrave was returning, Mrs. Veal was got without the door into the street, in the face of the beast-market, on a Saturday (which is market-day), and stood ready to 10 part. As soon as Mrs. Bargrave came to her, she asked her why she was in such haste. She said she must be going, though perhaps she might not go her journey until Monday; and told Mrs. Bargrave she hoped she should see 15 her again at her cousin Watson's before she went whither she was going. Then she said she would take her leave of her, and walked from Mrs. Bargrave in her view, till a turning interrupted the sight of her, which was three- 20 quarters after one in the afternoon.

Mrs. Veal died the 7th of September, at twelve o'clock at noon, of her fits, and had not above four hours' sense before death, in which time she received the sacrament. The 25 next day after Mrs. Veal's appearing, being Sunday, Mrs. Bargrave was so mightily indisposed with a cold and a sore throat, that she could not go out that day; but on Monday morning she sent a person to Captain Watson's 30 to know if Mrs. Veal was there. They wondered at Mrs. Bargrave's inquiry, and sent her word that she was not there, nor was expected. At this answer, Mrs. Bargrave told the maid she had certainly mistook the name or made 35 some blunder. And though she was ill, she put on her hood, and went herself to Captain Watson's, though she knew none of the family, to see if Mrs. Veal was there or not. They said they wondered at her asking, for that she 40 had not been in town; they were sure, if she had, she would have been there. Says Mrs. Bargrave, "I am sure she was with me on Saturday almost two hours." They said it was impossible; for they must have seen her, 45 if she had. In comes Captain Watson while they are in dispute, and said that Mrs. Veal was certainly dead, and her escutcheons<sup>4</sup> were making. This strangely surprised Mrs. Bargrave, when she sent to the person immediately 50 who had the care of them, and found it true. Then she related the whole story to Captain Watson's family, and what gown she had on, and how striped, and that Mrs. Veal told her it was scoured. Then Mrs. Watson cried out, "You have seen her indeed, for none knew but Mrs. Veal and myself that the gown was scoured." And Mrs. Watson owned that she 5 described the gown exactly; "for," said she, "I helped her to make it up." This Mrs. Watson blazed all about the town, and avouched the demonstration of the truth of Mrs. Bargrave's seeing Mrs. Veal's apparition; and 10 Captain Watson carried two gentlemen immediately to Mrs. Bargrave's house to hear the relation from her own mouth. And when it spread so fast that gentlemen and persons of quality, the judicious and sceptical part of 15 the world, flocked in upon her, it at last became such a task that she was forced to go out of the way; for they were in general extremely well satisfied of the truth of the thing, and plainly saw that Mrs. Bargrave was no hypochondriac, for she always appears with such a cheerful air and pleasing mien, that she has gained the favour and esteem of all the gentry, and it is thought a great favour if they can but get the relation from her own mouth. I should 20 have told you before that Mrs. Veal told Mrs. Bargrave that her sister and brother-in-law were just come down from London to see her. Says Mrs. Bargrave, "How came you to order matters so strangely?" "It could not be 25 helped," said Mrs. Veal. And her brother and sister did come to see her, and entered the town of Dover just as Mrs. Veal was expiring. Mrs. Bargrave asked her whether she would drink some tea. Says Mrs. Veal, "I do not 30 care if I do; but I'll warrant you this mad fellow" (meaning Mrs. Bargrave's husband) "has broken all your trinkets." "But," says Mrs. Bargrave, "I'll get something to drink in for all that." But Mrs. Veal waived it, and said, "It is no matter; let it alone;" and so it passed.

All the time I sat with Mrs. Bargrave, which was some hours, she recollected fresh sayings of Mrs. Veal. And one material thing more 45 she told Mrs. Bargrave—that old Mr. Breton allowed Mrs. Veal ten pounds a year, which was a secret, and unknown to Mrs. Bargrave till Mrs. Veal told it her. Mrs. Bargrave never varies in her story, which puzzles those who doubt of the truth or are unwilling to believe it. A servant in the neighbour's yard adjoining to Mrs. Bargrave's house heard her talking to somebody an hour of the time Mrs. Veal was with her. Mrs. Bargrave went out 50 to her next neighbour's the very moment she parted with Mrs. Veal, and told her what ravishing conversation she had with an old friend, and told the whole of it. Drelincourt's "Book of Death" is, since this happened, bought up strangely. And it is to be observed that, notwithstanding all the trouble and fatigue Mrs. Bargrave has undergone upon this account, she never took the value of a farthing, nor suffered her daughter to take anything of anybody, and therefore can have no interest in telling the story.

<sup>4</sup> An escutcheon or hatchment, (see Cent. Diet.), "an armorial shield granted in recognition of some distinguished achievement." . . . "A square tablet, set diagonally and bearing the arms of a deceased person, placed over a tomb, or upon the exterior of the house in which the person dwelt."

But Mr. Veal does what he can to stifle the matter, and said he would see Mrs. Bargrave; but yet it is certain matter of fact that he has been at Captain Watson's since the death of his sister, and yet never went near Mrs. Bargrave; and some of his friends report her to be a liar, and that she knew of Mr. Breton's ten pounds a year. But the person who pretends to say so has the reputation of a notorious liar among persons whom I know to be of undoubted credit. Now, Mr. Veal is more of a gentleman than to say she lies, but says a bad husband has crazed her. But she needs only present herself and it will effectually confute that pretence. Mr. Veal says he asked his sister on her death-bed whether she had a mind to dispose of anything, and she said no. Now, the things that Mrs. Veal's apparition would have disposed of were so trifling, and nothing of justice aimed at in their disposal, that the design of it appears to me to be only in order to make Mrs. Bargrave so to demonstrate the truth of her appearance, as to satisfy the world of the reality thereof as to what she had seen and heard, and to secure her reputation among the reasonable and understanding part of mankind. And then again Mr. Veal owns that there was a purse of gold; but it was not found in her cabinet, but in a comb-box. This looks improbable; for that Mrs. Watson owned that Mrs. Veal was so very careful of the key of the cabinet that she would trust nobody with it; and if so, no doubt she would not trust her gold out of it. And Mrs. Veal's often drawing her hand over her eyes, and asking Mrs. Bargrave whether her fits had not impaired her, looks to me as if she did it on purpose to remind Mrs. Bargrave of her fits, to prepare her not to think it strange that she should put her upon writing to her brother to dispose of rings and gold, which looks so much like a dying person's request; and it took accordingly with Mrs. Bargrave, as the effects of her fits coming upon her; and was one of the many instances of her wonderful love to her and care of her that she should not be affrighted, which indeed appears in her whole management, particularly in her coming to her in the daytime, waiving the salutation, and when she was alone, and then the manner of her parting to prevent a second attempt to salute her.

Now, why Mr. Veal should think this relation a reflection, as it is plain he does by his endeavouring to stifle it, I cannot imagine, because the generality believe her to be a good spirit, her discourse was so heavenly. Her two great errands were to comfort Mrs. Bargrave in her affliction, and to ask her forgiveness for the breach of friendship, and with a pious discourse to encourage her. So that after all to suppose that Mrs. Bargrave could hatch such an invention as this from Friday noon to Saturday noon, supposing that she knew of Mrs. Veal's death the very first moment, without jumbling circumstances, and without any interest too, she must be more witty, fortunate, and wicked too than any indifferent person, I dare say, will allow. I asked Mrs. Bargrave several times if she was sure she felt the gown. She answered modestly, "If my senses are to be relied on, I am sure of it." I asked her if she heard a sound when she clapped her hands upon her knees. She said she did not remember she did, but said she appeared to be as much a substance as I did, who talked with her. "And I may," said she, "be as soon persuaded that your apparition is talking to me now as that I did not really see her; for I was under no manner of fear, and received her as a friend, and parted with her as such. I would not," says she, "give one farthing to make any one believe it; I have no interest in it. Nothing but trouble is entailed upon me for a long time, for aught I know; and had it not come to light by accident, it would never have been made public." But now she says she will make her own private use of it, and keep herself out of the way as much as she can; and so she has done since. She says she had a gentleman who came thirty miles to her to hear the relation, and that she told it to a room full of people at a time. Several particular gentlemen have had the story from Mrs. Bargrave's own mouth.

This thing has very much affected me, and I am as well satisfied as I am of the best grounded matter of fact. And why we should dispute matter of fact because we cannot solve things of which we have no certain or demonstrative notions, seems strange to me. Mrs. Bargrave's authority and sincerity alone would have been undoubted in any other case.

THE PLAGUE IN LONDON

But now the fury of the distemper increased to such a degree, that even the markets were but very thinly furnished with provisions, or frequented with buyers, compared to what they were before; and the Lord mayor caused the country people who brought provisions, to be stopped in the streets leading into the town, and to sit down there with their goods, where they sold what they brought, and went immediately away; and this encouraged the country people greatly to do so, for they sold their provisions at the very entrances into the town, and even in the fields; as, particularly in the fields beyond Whitechapel, in Spital-fields. Note, those streets, now called Spital-fields, were then, indeed, open fields: also, in St. George's Fields, in Southwark; in Bunhill Fields, and in a great field, called Wood's Close, near Islington; thither the lord mayor, aldermen, and magistrates, sent their officers and servants to buy for their families, themselves keeping within doors as much as possible, and the like did many other people; and after this method was taken, the country people came with great cheerfulness, and brought provisions of all sorts and very seldom got any harm; which I suppose added also to that report of their being miraculously preserved.

As for my little family, having thus, as I have said, laid in a store of bread, butter, cheese, and beer, I took my friend and physician's advice, and locked myself up, and my family, and resolved to suffer the hardship of living a few months without fresh meat, rather than purchase it by the hazard of our lives.

But, though I confined my family, I could not prevail upon my unsatisfied curiosity to stay within entirely myself; and, though I generally came frightened and terrified home, yet I could not restrain; only, that indeed I did not do it so frequently as at first.

I had some little obligations indeed upon me, to go to my brother's house, which was in Coleman Street parish, and which he had left to my care; and I went at first every day, but afterwards only once or twice a week.

In these walks I had many dismal scenes before my eyes; as, particularly, of persons falling dead in the streets, terrible shrieks and screechings of women, who, in their agonies, would throw open their chamber windows, and cry out in a dismal surprising manner. It it is often called, will help to explain its general character. A Journal of the Plague Year, being observations or memorials of the most remarkable occurrences, as well Public as Private, which happened in London during the last Great Visitation in 1665—Written by a citizen who continued all the while in London. Never made public before.

The Plague began in the autumn of 1664 (De Foe begins his journal in September of that year), and while it had begun to abate by the middle of September, 1665, after a year of terrible suffering and mortality, it still lingered on until the Great Fire of Sept. 1666. By the Plague nearly one hundred thousand persons are said to have perished, or about one-fifth of the entire population of London.

is impossible to describe the variety of postures in which the passions of the poor people would express themselves.

Passing through Token House Yard, in 5 Lothbury, of a sudden a casement violently opened just over my head, and a woman gave three frightful screeches, and then cried, "Oh! death, death, death!" in a most inimitable tone, and which struck me with horror, and a chillness in my very blood. There was nobody to be seen in the whole street, neither did any other window open, for people had no curiosity now in any case, nor could anybody help one another; so I went on to pass into Bell Alley. . . . As this puts me upon mentioning my walking the streets and fields, I cannot omit taking notice what a desolate place the city was at that time. The great street I lived in, which is known to be one of the broadest of all the streets of London, I mean of the suburbs as well as the liberties,<sup>2</sup> all the side where the butchers lived, especially without the bars, was more like a green field than a paved street, and the people generally went in the middle 25 with the horses and carts. It is true, that the farthest end, towards Whitechapel church, was not all paved, but even the part that was paved was full of grass also; but this need not seem strange, since the great streets within the city, such as Leadenhall Street, Bishopsgate Street, Cornhill, and even the Exchange itself had grass growing in them in several places; neither cart nor coach was seen in the streets from morning till evening, except some country carts to bring roots and beans, or peas, hay, and straw, to the market, and those but very few compared to what was usual. As for coaches, they were scarce used but to carry people to the pest house and to other hospitals, and some few to carry physicians to such places as they thought fit to venture to visit; for really coaches were dangerous things, and people did not care to venture into them, because they did not know who might have been carried in them last; and sick infected people were, as I have said, ordinarily carried in them to the pest houses, and sometimes people expired in them as they went along. . . . As the desolation was greater during those terrible times, so the amazement of the people increased; and a thousand unaccountable things they would do in the violence of their fright, as others did the same in the agonies of their distemper; and this part was very affecting. Some went roaring, and crying, and wringing their hands along the street; some would go praying and lifting up their hands to heaven, calling upon God for mercy. I cannot say, indeed, whether this was not in their distraction; but, be it so, it was still an indication of a more serious mind, when they had the use of their senses, and was much better, even as it was, than the frightful yellings and cryings that every day, and especially in the evenings, were heard in some streets. I suppose the world has heard of the famous Solomon Eagle, an enthusiast; he, though not infected at all, but in his head, went about, denouncing of judgment upon the city in a frightful manner; sometimes quite naked, and with a pan of burning charcoal on his head. What he said or pretended, indeed, I could not learn.

I will not say whether the clergyman was distracted or not, or whether he did it out of pure zeal for the poor people, who went every evening through the streets of Whitechapel, and, with his hands lifted up, repeated that part of the liturgy of the church, continually, "Spare us, good Lord; spare thy people whom thou hast redeemed with thy most precious blood;" I say, I cannot speak positively of these things, because these were only the dismal objects which represented themselves to me as I looked through my chamber windows, for I seldom opened the casements, while I confined myself within doors during that most violent raging of the pestilence, when, indeed, many began to think, and even to say, that there would none escape; and, indeed, I began to think so too, and, therefore kept within doors for about a fortnight, and never stirred out. But I could not hold it. Besides, there were some people, who, notwithstanding the danger, did not omit publicly to attend the worship of God, even in the most dangerous times. And, though it is true that a great many of the clergy did shut up their churches and fled, as other people did, for the safety of their lives, yet all did not do so; some ventured to officiate, and keep up the assemblies of the people by constant prayers, and sometimes sermons or brief exhortations to repentance and reformation; and this as long as they would hear them. And dissenters did the like also, and even in the very churches where the parish ministers were either dead or fled; nor was there any room for making any difference at such a time as this was.

It pleased God that I was still spared, and very hearty and sound in health, but very impatient of being pent up within doors without air, as I had been for fourteen days or thereabouts; and I could not restrain myself, but I would go and carry a letter for my brother to the post-house; then it was, indeed, that I observed a profound silence in the streets.

When I came to the post-house, as I went to put in my letter, I saw a man stand in one corner of the yard and talking to another at a window, and a third had opened a door belonging to the office. In the middle of the yard lay a small leather purse, with two keys hanging at it, with money in it, but nobody would meddle with it. I asked how long it had lain there; the man at the window said it had lain almost an hour, but they had not meddled with it, because they did not know but the person who dropt it might come back to look for it. I had no such need of money, nor was the sum so big, that I had any inclination to meddle with it, or to get the money at the hazard it might be attended with; so I seemed to go away,<sup>3</sup> when the man who had opened the door said he would take it up; but so that if the right owner came for it he should be sure to have it. So he went in and fetched a pail of water, and set it down hard by the purse, then went again and fetched some gunpowder, and cast a good deal of powder upon the purse, and then made a train from that which he had thrown loose upon the purse; the train reached about two yards; after this he goes in a third time, and fetches out a pair of tongs red-hot, and which he had prepared, I suppose, on purpose; and first setting fire to the train of powder, that singed the purse and also smoked the air sufficiently. But he was not content with that, but he then takes up the purse with the tongs, holding it so long till the tongs burnt through the purse, and then he shook the money out into the pail of water, so he carried it in. The money, as I remember, was about thirteen shillings, and some smooth groats and brass farthings.

Much about the same time, I walked out into the fields towards Bow; for I had a great mind to see how things were managed in the river and among the ships; and as I had some concern in shipping, I had a notion that it had been one of the best ways of securing one's self from the infection to have retired into a ship; and, musing how to satisfy my curiosity in that point, I turned away over the fields, from Bow to Bromley and down to Blackwall, to the stairs that are there for landing or taking water.

Here I saw a poor man walking on the bank or sea-wall, as they call it, by himself. I walked awhile also about, seeing the houses all shut up; at last I fell into some talk, at a distance, with this poor man. First I asked how people did thereabouts? "Alas! sir," says he, "almost desolate, all dead or sick: here are very few families in this part, or in that village," pointing at Poplar, "where half of them are not dead already, and the rest sick." Then he, pointing to one house, "They are all dead," said he, "and the house stands open; nobody dares go into it. A poor thief," says he, "ventured into to steal something, but he paid dear for his theft, for he was carried to the churchyard too, last night." Then he pointed to several other houses. "There," says he, "they are all dead, the man and his wife and five children. There," says he, "they are shut up; you see a watchman at the door;" and so, of other houses. "Why," says I, "what lo you here all alone?" "Why," says he, "I am a poor desolate man; it hath pleased God I am not yet visited, though my family is, and one of my children dead." "How do you mean then," said I "that you are not visited?"

"Why," says he "that is my house," pointing to a very little, low, boarded house, "and there my poor wife and two children live," said he, "if they may be said to live; for my wife and one of the children are visited, but I do not come at them." And with that word I saw the tears run very plentifully down his face; and so they did down mine too, I assure you.

"But," said I, "why do you not come at them? How can you abandon your own flesh and blood?" "Oh, sir," says he, "the Lord forbid; I do not abandon them; I work for them as much as I am able; and, blessed be the Lord, I keep them from want." And with that I observed he lifted up his eyes to heaven with a countenance that presently told me I had happened on a man that was no hypocrite, but a serious, religious, good man; and his ejaculation was an expression of thankfulness, that in such a condition as he was in, he should be able to say his family did not want. "Well," says I, "honest man, that is a great mercy, as things go now with the poor. But how do you live then, and how are you kept from the dreadful calamity that is now upon us all?" "Why, sir," says he, "I am a waterman, and there is my boat," says he, "and the boat serves me for a house; I work in it in the day, and I sleep in it in the night, and what I get I lay it down upon that stone," says he, showing me a broad stone on the other side of the street, a good way from his house; "and then," says he, "I halloo and call to them till I make them hear, and they come and fetch it."

"Well, friend," says I, "but how can you get money as a waterman? Does anybody go by water these times?" "Yes, sir," says he, "in the way I am employed there does. Do you see there," says he, "five ships lie at anchor," pointing down the river a good way below the town; "and do you see," says he, "eight or ten ships lie at the chain there, and at anchor yonder," pointing above the town. "All those ships have families on board, of their merchants and owners, and such-like, who have locked themselves up, and live on board, close shut in, for fear of the infection; and I tend on them to fetch things for them, carry letters, and do what is absolutely necessary, that they may not be obliged to come on shore; and every night I fasten my boat on board one of the ship's boats, and there I sleep by myself, and, blessed be God, I am preserved hitherto."

"Well," said I, "friend, will they let you come on board after you have been on shore here, when this has been such a terrible place, and so infected as it is?"

"Why, as to that," said he, "I very seldom go up the ship side, but deliver what I bring to their boat, or lie by the side and they hoist it on board: if I did I think they are in no danger from me, for I never go into any house on shore, or touch anybody, no, not of my own family; but I fetch provisions for them."

"Nay," says I, "but that may be worse, for you must have those provisions of somebody or other; and since all this part of the town is so infected, it is dangerous so much as to speak with anybody; for the village," said I, "is as it were the beginning of London, though it be at some distance from it."

"That is true," added he, "but you do not understand me right. I do not buy provisions for them here; I row up to Greenwich, and buy fresh meat there, and sometimes I row down the river to Woolwich and buy there; then I go to single farm houses on the Kentish side, where I am known, and buy fowls, and eggs and butter, and bring to the ships as they direct me, sometimes one, sometimes the other. I seldom come on shore here; and I came only now to call my wife and hear how my little family do, and give them a little money which I received last night."

"Poor man," said I, "and how much hast thou gotten for them?"

"I have gotten four shillings," said he, "which is a great sum, as things go now with poor men; but they have given me a bag of bread, too, and a salt fish, and some flesh; so all helps out."

"Well," said I, "and have you given it them yet?"

"No," said he, "but I have called, and my wife has answered that she cannot come out yet, but in half an hour she hopes to come, and I am waiting for her. Poor woman!"

says he, "she is brought sadly down; she has had a swelling, and it is broke, and I hope she will recover, but I fear the child will die; but it is the Lord!" Here he stopt, and wept very much.

"Well, honest friend," said I, "thou hast a sure comforter, if thou hast brought thyself to be resigned to the will of God; he is dealing with us all in judgment."

"Oh, sir," says he, "it is infinite mercy if 10 any of us are spared; and who am I to repine!"

"Say'st thou so," said I, "and how much less is my faith than thine?" And here my heart smote me, suggesting how much better this poor man's foundation was, on which he 15 stayed in the danger, than mine; that he had nowhere to fly; that he had a family to bind him to attendance, which I had not; and mine was mere presumption, his a true dependance, and a courage resting on God; and yet, that 20 he used all possible caution for his safety.

I turned a little way from the man, while these thoughts engaged me; for, indeed, I could no more refrain from tears than he.

At length, after some further talk, the poor 25 woman opened the door, and called, "Robert, Robert;" he answered and bid her stay a few moments, and he would come; so he ran down the common stairs to his boat, and fetched up a sack in which was the provisions he had 30 brought from the ships; and when he returned, he hallooed again; then he went to the great stone which he showed me, and emptied the sack, and laid all out, everything by themselves, and then retired; and his wife came 35 with a little boy to fetch them away; and he called, and said such a captain had sent such a thing, and such a captain such a thing, and at the end adds, "God has sent it all, give thanks to Him." When the poor woman had 40 taken up all, she was so weak she could not carry it at once in, though the weight was not much neither; so she left the biscuit, which was in a little bag, and left a little boy to watch it, till she came again.

"Well, but," says I to him, "did you leave her four shillings, too, which you said was your week's pay?"

"Yes, yes," says he, "you shall hear her own it." So he calls again, "Rachel, Rachel," 50 which, it seems was her name, "did you take up the money?" "Yes," said she. "How much was it?" said he. "Four shillings and a groat," said she. "Well, well," says he, "the Lord keep you all;" and so he turned to 55 go away.

As I could not refrain from contributing tears to this man's story, so neither could I refrain my charity for his assistance; so I called him; "Hark thee, friend," said I, "come hither, for I believe thou art in health, that I may venture thee;" so I pulled out my hand, which was in my pocket before. "Here,"

5 says I, "go and call thy Rachel once more, and give her a little more comfort from me. God will never forsake a family that trusts in him as thou dost;" so I gave him four other shillings, and bid him go lay them on the stone, and call his wife.

I have not words to express the poor man's thankfulness, neither could he express it himself but by tears running down his face. He called his wife, and told her God had moved the heart of a stranger, upon hearing their condition, to give them all that money, and a great deal more such as that he said to her. The woman, too, made signs of the like thankfulness, as well to heaven as to me, and joyfully 10 picked it up; and I parted with no money all that year that I thought better bestowed.

MEDITATION UPON A BROOMSTICK

(1704)

This single stick, which you now behold ingloriously lying in that neglected corner, I once knew in a flourishing state in a forest; it was full of sap, full of leaves, and full of boughs; but now, in vain does the busy art of man pretend to vie with nature, by tying that withered bundle of twigs to its sapless trunk; it is now, at best, but the reverse of what it was, a tree 10 turned upside down, the branches on the earth, and the root in the air; it is now, handled by every dirty wench, condemned to do her drudgery, and by a capricious kind of fate, destined to make other things clean, and be nasty itself; at length, worn to the stumps in the service of the maids, it is either thrown out of doors, 15 or condemned to the last use, of kindling a fire. When I beheld this, I sighed, and said within myself, Surely mortal Man is a Broomstick! Nature sent him into the world strong and lusty, in a thriving condition, wearing his own 20 hair on his head, the proper branches of this reasoning vegetable, until the axe of intemperance has lopped off his green boughs, and left him a withered trunk; he then flies to art, and puts on a perriwig, valuing himself upon an unnatural bundle of hairs (all covered with powder) that never grew on his head; but now, should this our broomstick pretend to enter the scene, proud of those birchen spoils it never bore, and all covered with dust, though the sweepings of the finest lady's chamber, we should be apt to ridicule and despise its vanity. Partial judges that we are of our own excellencies, and other men's defaults!

But a broomstick, perhaps you will say, is an emblem of a tree standing on its head; and pray what is a man but a topsy-turvey creature, his animal faculties perpetually mounted on his rational, his head where his heels should be, grovelling on the earth! And yet, with all his faults, he sets up to be a universal reformer and corrector of abuses, a remover of grievances, rakes into every slut's corner of nature, bringing hidden corruptions to the light, and raises a mighty dust where there was none before; sharing deeply all the while in the very same pollutions he pretends to sweep away: his last days are spent in slavery to women, and generally the least deserving; till worn to the stumps, like his brother besom, he is either kicked out of doors, or made use of to kindle flames for others to warm themselves by.

PREDICTIONS FOR THE YEAR 1708:

Wherein The Month, And The Day Of The Month, Are Set Down, The Persons Named, And The Great Actions And Events Of Next Year Particularly Related, As They Will Come To Pass.

Written to Prevent The People Of England From Being Further Imposed On By Vulgar Almanac-Makers.

By ISAAC BICKERSTAFF, Esq.<sup>1</sup>

I have considered the gross abuse of astrology in this kingdom, and upon debating the matter with myself, I could not possibly lay the fault upon the art, but upon those gross impostors who set up to be the artists. I know several learned men have contended that the whole is a cheat; that it is absurd and ridiculous to imagine the stars can have any influence at all upon human actions, thoughts, or inclinations; and whoever has not bent his studies that way may be excused for thinking so, when he sees in how wretched a manner that noble art is treated by a few mean, illiterate traders between us and the stars, who import a yearly stock of nonsense, lies, folly, and impertinence, which they offer to the world as genuine from the planets, though they descend from no greater a height than their own brains.

I intend in a short time to publish a large and rational defence of this art, and therefore shall say no more in its justification at present than that it has been in all ages defended by many learned men, and among the rest by Socrates himself, whom I look upon as undoubtedly the wisest of uninspired mortals; to which if we add that those who have condemned this art, though otherwise learned, having been such as either did not apply their studies this way, or at least did not succeed in their applications, their testimony will not be of much weight to its disadvantage, since they are liable to the common objection of condemning what they did not understand.

Nor am I at all offended, or do I think it an injury to the art, when I see the common dealers in it, the students in astrology, the Philomaths,<sup>2</sup> and the rest of that tribe, treated by wise men with the utmost scorn and contempt, but rather wonder, when I observe gentlemen in the country, rich enough to serve the nation in Parliament, poring in Partridge's Almanac<sup>3</sup> to find out the events of the year at home and abroad, not daring to propose a hunting-match till Gadbury<sup>4</sup> or he have fixed the weather.

I will allow either of the two I have mentioned, or any other of the fraternity, to be not only astrologers, but conjurers too, if I do not produce a hundred instances in all their almanacs to convince any reasonable man that they do not so much as understand common grammar and syntax; that they are not able to spell any word out of the usual road, nor, even in their prefaces to write common sense or intelligible English. Then for their observations and predictions, they are such as will equally suit any age or country in the world. "This month a certain great person will be threatened with death or sickness." This the newspapers will tell them; for there we find at the end of the year that no month passes without the death of some person of

<sup>1</sup> When Swift wrote these predictions the belief in fortune-tellers and astrologers was very general, and numbers of impostors took advantage of the popular credulity. Not content with the patronage of those who consulted them personally, some of these astrologers published their "predictions" in almanacs, which were bought by people of the poorer classes, or circulated outside of London. Swift's attention having been attracted by one of these prophetic almanacs (the Merlinus Literatus for 1707, published by John Partridge), he wrote his Predictions, humorously exposing the folly of the prevalent superstition, as well as holding up poor Partridge to ridicule. After writing his Predictions, Swift, casting about for a pseudonym, happened to see the name Bickerstaff on a locksmith's sign. The name appealed to him, and he made his prophecies as Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq. The success of Swift's pamphlet made the name of Bickerstaff familiar to the world of London, and Steele, taking advantage of its popularity, assumed it when he began the publication of The Tatler in 1709.

note; and it would be hard if it should be otherwise, when there are at least two thousand persons of note in this kingdom, many of them old, and the almanac-maker has the liberty of choosing the sickliest season of the year where he may fix his prediction. Again, "This month an eminent clergyman will be preferred;" of which there may be many hundreds, half of them with one foot in the grave. Then "Such a planet in such a house shows great machinations, plots, and conspiracies, that may in time be brought to light;" after which, if we hear of any discovery, the astrologer gets the honour; if not, his predictions still stand good. And at last, "God preserve King William from all his open and secret enemies, Amen;" when if the King should happen to have died, the astrologer plainly foretold it; otherwise it passes but for the pious ejaculation of a loyal subject; though it unlikely happened in some of their almanacs that poor King William was prayed for many months after he was dead, because it fell out that he died about the beginning of the year.

To mention no more of their impertinent predictions, what have we to do with their advertisements about "pills and drinks for disease," or their mutual quarrels in verse and prose of Whig and Tory, wherewith the stars have little to do?

Having long observed and lamented these, and a hundred other abuses of this art, too tedious to repeat, I resolved to proceed in a new way, which I doubt not will be to the general satisfaction of the kingdom. I can this year produce but a specimen of what I design for the future, having employed most part of my time in adjusting and correcting the calculations I made for some years past, because I would offer nothing to the world of which I am not as fully satisfied as that I am now alive. For these two last years I have not failed in above one or two particulars, and those of no very great moment. I exactly foretold the miscarriage at Toulon, with all its particulars, and the loss of Admiral Shovel,<sup>5</sup> though I was mistaken as to the day, placing that article about thirty-six hours sooner than it happened; but upon reviewing my schemes, I quickly found the cause of that error. I likewise foretold the Battle of Almanza<sup>6</sup> to the very day and hour, with the loss on both sides, and the consequences thereof, all which I showed to some friends many months before they happened—that is, I gave them papers sealed up, to open at such a time, after which they were at liberty to read them; and there they found my predictions true in every article, except one or two very minute.

As for the few following predictions I now offer the world, I forbore to publish them till I had perused the several almanacs for the year we are now entered upon. I found them all in the usual strain, and I beg the reader will compare their manner with mine. And here I make bold to tell the world that I lay the whole credit of my art upon the truth of these predictions; and I will be content that Partridge, and the rest of his clan, may hoot me for a cheat and impostor if I fail in any single particular of moment. I believe any man who reads this paper will look upon me to be at least a person of as much honesty and understanding as a common maker of almanacs. I do not lurk in the dark; I am not wholly unknown in the world; I have set my name at length, to be a mark of infamy to mankind, if they shall find I deceive them.

In one thing I must desire to be forgiven, that I talk more sparingly of home affairs; as it will be imprudence to discover secrets of State, so it might be dangerous to my person; but in smaller matters, and such as are not of public consequence, I shall be very free; and the truth of my conjectures will as much appear from these as the other. As for the most signal events abroad, in France, Flanders, Italy, and Spain, I shall make no scruple to predict them in plain terms: some of them are of importance, and I hope I shall seldom mistake the day they will happen; therefore I think good to inform the reader that I shall all along make use of the Old Style observed in England,<sup>7</sup> which I desire he will compare with that of the newspapers at the time they relate the actions I mention.

I must add one word more. I know it has been the opinion of several learned persons, who think well enough of the true art of astrology, that the stars do only incline, and not force the actions or wills of men; and therefore, however I may proceed by right rules, yet I cannot in prudence so confidently assure the events will follow exactly as I predict them.

I hope I have maturely considered this objection, which in some cases is of no little weight. For example: a man may, by the influence of an overruling planet, be disposed or inclined to lust, rage, or avarice, and yet by the force of reason overcome that evil influence; and this was the case of Socrates: but as the great events of the world usually depend upon numbers of men, it cannot be expected they should all unite to cross their inclinations for pursuing a general design wherein they unanimously agree. Besides, the influence of the stars reaches to many actions and events which are not any way in the power of reason, as sickness, death, and what we commonly call accidents, with many more, needless to repeat.

<sup>6</sup> A victory of the French and Spanish over the British and their allies, April 25, 1707, in the "War of the Spanish Succession."

But now it is time to proceed to my predictions, which I have begun to calculate from the time that the sun enters into Aries; and this I take to be properly the beginning of the natural year. I pursue them to the time that he enters Libra, or somewhat more, which is the busy period of the year. The remainder I have not yet adjusted, upon account of several impediments needless here to mention; besides, I must remind the reader again that this is but a specimen of what I design in succeeding years to treat more at large, if I may have liberty and encouragement.

My first prediction is but a trifle, yet I will mention it, to show how ignorant those sottish pretenders to astrology are in their own concerns. It relates to Partridge, the almanac-maker. I have consulted the star of his nativity by my own rules, and find he will infallibly die upon the 29th of March next, about eleven at night, of a raging fever; therefore I advise him to consider of it, and settle his affairs in time.

The month of April will be observable for the death of many great persons. On the 4th will die the Cardinal de Noailles, Archbishop of Paris; on the 11th, the young Prince of Asturias, son to the Duke of Anjou; on the 14th, a great peer of this realm will die at his country house; on the 19th, an old layman of great fame for learning; and on the 23rd, an eminent goldsmith in Lombard Street. I could mention others, both at home and abroad, if I did not consider such events of very little use or instruction to the reader, or to the world.

As to public affairs: On the 7th of this month there will be an insurrection in Dauphiné, occasioned by the oppressions of the people, which will not be quieted in some months.

On the 15th will be a violent storm on the south-east coast of France, which will destroy many of their ships, and some in the very harbour.

The 19th will be famous for the revolt of a whole province or kingdom, excepting one city, by which the affairs of a certain prince in the Alliance will take a better face.

May, against common conjectures, will be no very busy month in Europe, but very signal for the death of the Dauphin, which will happen on the 7th, after a short fit of sickness, and grievous torments with the strangury. He dies less lamented by the Court than the kingdom. . . .

I shall add but one prediction more, and that in mystical terms, which shall be included in a verse out of Virgil—

Delectos Heroas.*”<sup>8</sup>

Upon the 25th day of this month, the fulfilling of this prediction will be manifest to everybody.

This is the furthest I have proceeded in my calculations for the present year. I do not pretend that these are all the great events which will happen in this period, but that those I have set down will infallibly come to pass. It will perhaps still be objected why I have not spoke more particularly of affairs at home, or of the success of our armies abroad, which I might, and could very largely have done; but those in power have wisely discouraged men from meddling in public concerns, and I was resolved by no means to give the least offence. This I will venture to say, that it will be a glorious campaign for the Allies, wherein the English forces, both by sea and land, will have their full share of honour; that Her Majesty Queen Anne will continue in health and prosperity; and that no ill accident will arrive to any in the chief Ministry.

As to the particular events I have mentioned, the reader may judge by the fulfilling of them, whether I am on the level with common astrologers, who, with an old paltry cant, and a few pothooks for planets, to amuse the vulgar, have, in my opinion, too long been suffered to abuse the world; but an honest physician ought not to be despised because there are such things as mountebanks. I hope I have some share of reputation, which I would not willingly forfeit for a frolic or humour, and I believe no gentleman who reads this paper will look upon it to be of the same cast or mould with the common scribbles that are every day hawked about. My fortune has placed me above the little regard of writing for a few pence, which I neither value nor want; therefore, let not wise men too hastily condemn this essay, intended for a good design, to cultivate and improve an ancient art, long in disgrace, by having fallen into mean, unskilful hands. A little time will determine whether I have deceived others or myself; and

<sup>8</sup> Then there will be another Tethys and another Argo which shall carry chosen heroes. Ecl. iv., 34

I think it is no very unreasonable request that men would please to suspend their judgments till then. I was once of the opinion with those who despise all predictions from the stars, till the year 1686 a man of quality showed me, written in his album, that the most learned astronomer, Captain Halley,<sup>9</sup> assured him, that he would never believe anything of the stars' influence if there were not a great revolution in England in the year 1688. Since that time I began to have other thoughts, and after eighteen years' diligent study and application, I think I have no reason to repent of my pains. I shall detain the reader no longer than to let him know that the account I design to give of next year's events shall take in the principal affairs that happened in Europe; and if I be denied the liberty of offering it to my own country, I shall appeal to the learned world, by publishing it in Latin, and giving order to have it printed in Holland.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THE FIRST OF MR. BICKERSTAFF'S PREDICTIONS:

Being an Account of the Death of Mr. Partridge the Almanac-Maker, upon the 29th instant

In a Letter to a Person of Honour, Written in the Year 1708

My Lord,—In obedience to your lordship's commands, as well as to satisfy my own curiosity, I have for some days past inquired constantly after Partridge the almanac-maker, of whom it was foretold in Mr. Bickerstaff's Predictions, published about a month ago, that he should die the 29th instant, about eleven at night, of a raging fever. I had some sort of knowledge of him when I was employed in the Revenue, because he used every year to present me with his almanac, as he did other gentlemen, upon the score of some little gratuity we gave him. I saw him accidentally once or twice about ten days before he died, and observed he began very much to droop and languish, though I hear his friends did not seem to apprehend him in any danger. About two or three days ago he grew ill, was confined first to his chamber, and in a few hours after to his bed, where Dr. Case<sup>1</sup> and Mrs. Kirleus<sup>2</sup> were sent for, to visit and to prescribe to him. Upon this intelligence I sent thrice every day one servant or other to inquire after his health, and yesterday, about four in the afternoon, word was brought me "that he was past hopes;" upon which, I prevailed with myself to go and see him, partly out of commiseration, and I confess, partly out of curiosity. He knew me very well, seemed surprised at my condescension, and made me compliments upon it as well as he could in the condition he was. The people about him said he had been for some time delirious; but when I saw him, he had his understanding as well as ever I knew, and spoke strong and hearty, without any seeming uneasiness or constraint. After I had told him how sorry I was to see him in those melancholy circumstances, and said some other civilities suitable to the occasion, I desired him to tell me freely and ingenuously, whether the predictions Mr. Bickerstaff had published relating to his death had not too much affected and worked on his imagination. He confessed he had often had it in his head, but never with much apprehension, till about a fortnight before; since which time it had the perpetual possession of his mind and thoughts, and he did verily believe was the true natural cause of his present distemper: "For," said he, "I am thoroughly persuaded, and I think I have very good reasons, that Mr. Bickerstaff spoke altogether by guess, and knew no more what will happen this year than I did myself."

I told him his discourse surprised me, and I would be glad he were in a state of health to be able to tell me what reason he had to be convinced of Mr. Bickerstaff's ignorance. He replied, "I am a poor, ignorant fellow, bred to a mean trade, yet I have sense enough to know that all pretences of foretelling by astrology are deceits, for this manifest reason, because the wise and the learned, who can only judge whether there be any truth in this science, do all unanimously agree to laugh at and despise it; and none but the poor ignorant vulgar give it any credit, and that only upon the word of such silly wretches as I and my fellows, who can hardly write or read." I then asked him why he had not calculated his own nativity, to see whether it agreed with Bickerstaff's prediction, at which he shook his head and said, "Oh, sir, this is no time for jesting, but for repenting those fooleries, as I do now from the very bottom of my heart." "By what I can gather from you," said I, "the observations and predictions you printed with your almanacs were mere impositions on the people." He replied, "If it were otherwise, I should have the less to answer for. We have a common form for all those things; as to foretelling the weather, we never meddle with that, but leave it to the printer, who takes it out of any old almanac as he thinks fit; the rest was my own invention, to make my almanac sell, having a wife to maintain, and no other way to get my bread; for mending old shoes is a poor livelihood; and," added he, sighing, "I wish I may not have done more mischief by my physic than my astrology; though I had some good receipts from my grandmother, and my own compositions were such as I thought could at least do no hurt."

I had some other discourse with him, which now I cannot call to mind; and I fear I have already tired your lordship. I shall only add one circumstance, that on his death-bed he declared himself a Nonconformist, and had a fanatic preacher to be his spiritual guide. After half an hour's conversation I took my leave, being almost stifled by the closeness of the room. I imagined he could not hold out long, and therefore withdrew to a little coffee-house hard by, leaving a servant at the house with orders to come immediately and tell me, as near as he could, the minute when Partridge should expire, which was not above two hours after, when, looking upon my watch, I found it to be above five minutes after seven; by which it is clear that Mr. Bickerstaff was mistaken almost four hours in his calculation. In the other circumstances he was exact enough. But whether he has not been the cause of this poor man's death, as well as the predictor, may be very reasonably disputed. However, it must be confessed the matter is odd enough, whether we should endeavor to account for it by chance, or the effect of imagination. For my own part, though I believe no man has less faith in these matters, yet I shall wait with some impatience, and not without some expectation, the fulfilling of Mr. Bickerstaff's second prediction, that the Cardinal de Noailles is to die upon the 4th of April, and if that should be verified as exactly as this of poor Partridge, I must own I should be wholly surprised, and at a loss, and should infallibly expect the accomplishment of all the rest.

GULLIVER AMONG THE LILLIPUTIANS<sup>1</sup>

(From The Travels of Lemuel Gulliver, 1726)

My gentleness and good behavior had gained so far on the emperor and his court, and indeed upon the army and people in general,

that I began to conceive hopes of getting my liberty in a short time. I took all possible methods to cultivate this favorable disposition. The natives came, by degrees, to be less apprehensive of any danger from me. I would sometimes lie down, and let five or six of them dance on my hand; and at last the boys and girls would venture to come and play at hide-and-seek in my hair. I had now made a good progress in understanding and speaking their language. The emperor had a mind one day to entertain me with several of the country shows, wherein they exceed all nations I have known, both for dexterity and magnificence. I was diverted with none so much as that of the rope-dancers, performed upon a slender white thread, extended about two foot and twelve inches from the ground. Upon which I shall desire liberty, with the reader's patience, to enlarge a little.

This diversion is only practised by those persons who are candidates for great employments and high favor at court. They are trained in this art from their youth, and are not always of noble birth or liberal education. When a great office is vacant, either by death or disgrace (which often happens), five or six of those candidates petition the emperor to entertain his majesty and the court with a dance on the rope; and whoever jumps the highest without falling, succeeds in the office. Very often the chief ministers themselves are commanded to show their skill, and to convince the emperor that they have not lost their faculty. Flimnap, the treasurer, is allowed to cut a caper on the straight rope, at least an inch higher than any other lord in the whole empire. I have seen him do the summerset several times together, upon a trencher fixed on the rope, which is no thicker than a common pack-thread in England. My friend Reldresal, principal secretary for private affairs, is, in my opinion, if I am not partial, the second after the treasurer; the rest of the great officers are much upon a par.

These diversions are often attended with fatal accidents, whereof great numbers are on record. I myself have seen two or three candidates break a limb. But the danger is much greater when the ministers themselves are commanded to show their dexterity; for, by contending to excel themselves and their fellows, they strain so far that there is hardly one of them who hath not received a fall, and some of them two or three. I was assured months later he was shipwrecked on the way to the East Indies, and found himself in the country of Lilliput, which was inhabited by a diminutive race of men, not more than six inches high. After various adventures he met the Emperor of Lilliput, and went to the Court.

that, a year or two before my arrival, Flimnap would have infallibly broke his neck if one of the king's cushions, that accidentally lay on the ground, had not weakened the force of his fall.

There is likewise another diversion, which is only shown before the emperor and empress, and first minister, upon particular occasions. The emperor lays on a table three fine silken threads of six inches long; one is blue, the other red, and the third green. These threads are proposed as prizes for those persons whom the emperor hath a mind to distinguish by a peculiar mark of his favor. The ceremony is performed in his majesty's great chamber of state, where the candidates are to undergo a trial of dexterity, very different from the former, and such as I have not observed the least resemblance of in any other country of the old or the new world. The emperor holds a stick in his hands, both ends parallel to the horizon, while the candidates advancing, one by one, sometimes leap over the stick, sometimes creep under it, backward and forward, several times, according as the stick is advanced or depressed. Sometimes the emperor holds one end of the stick, and his first minister the other; sometimes the minister has it entirely to himself. Whoever performs his part with most agility, and holds out the longest in leaping and creeping, is rewarded with the blue colored silk; and red is given to the next, and the green to the third, which they all wear girt twice round about the middle; and you see few great persons about this court who are not adorned with one of these girdles.

The horses of the army, and those of the royal stables, having been daily led before me, were no longer shy, but would come up to my very feet without starting. The riders would leap them over my hand, as I held it on the ground; and one of the emperor's huntsmen, upon a large courser, took my foot, shoe and all, which was indeed a prodigious leap. I had the good fortune to divert the emperor one day after a very extraordinary manner. I desired he would order several sticks of two foot high, and the thickness of an ordinary cane, to be brought me; whereupon his majesty commanded the master of his woods to give directions accordingly; and the next morning six woodmen arrived with as many carriages, drawn by eight horses to each. I took nine of these sticks, and fixing them firmly in the ground in a quadrangular figure, two foot and a half square, I took four other sticks, and tied them parallel at each corner, about two foot from the ground; then I fastened my handkerchief to the nine sticks that stood erect, and extended it on all sides, till it was as tight as the top of a drum; and the four parallel sticks, rising about five inches higher than the handkerchief, served as ledges on each side. When I had finished my work, I desired the emperor to let a troop of his best horse, twenty-four in number, come and exercise upon this plain. His majesty approved of the proposal, and I took them up, one by one, in my hands, ready mounted and armed, with the proper officers to exercise them. As soon as they got into order they divided into two parties, performed mock skirmishes, discharged blunt arrows, drew their swords, fled and pursued, attacked, and retired, and, in short, discovered the best military discipline I ever beheld. The parallel sticks secured them and their horses from falling over the stage; and the emperor was so much delighted that he ordered this entertainment to be repeated several days, and once was pleased to be lifted up and give the word of command; and with great difficulty persuaded even the empress herself to let me hold her in her close chair within two yards of the stage, from whence she was able to take a full view of the whole performance. It was my good fortune that no ill accident happened in these entertainments; only once a fiery horse, that belonged to one of the captains, pawing with his hoof, struck a hole in my handkerchief, and his foot slipping, he overthrew his rider and himself; but I immediately relieved them both, and covering the hole with one hand, I set down the troop with the other, in the same manner as I took them up. The horse that fell was strained in the left shoulder, but the rider got no hurt; and I repaired my handkerchief as well as I could: however, I would not trust to the strength of it any more in such dangerous enterprises.

HOW GULLIVER CONQUERED THE FLEET OF THE BLEFUSCUDIANS

The empire of Blefuseu is an island, situated to the northeast of Lilliput, from which it is parted only by a channel of eight hundred yards wide. I had not yet seen it, and upon this notice of an intended invasion I avoided appearing on that side of the coast, for fear of being discovered by some of the enemy's ships, who had received no intelligence of me; all intercourse between the two empires having been strictly forbidden during the war, upon pain of death, and an embargo laid by our emperor upon all vessels whatsoever. I communicated to his majesty a project I had formed, of seizing the enemy's whole fleet; which, as our scouts assured us, lay at anchor in the harbor, ready to sail with the first fair wind. I consulted the most experienced seamen upon the depth of the channel, which they had often plumbed; who told me that in the middle, at high-water, it was seventy glumgluffs deep, which is about six foot of European measure; and the rest of it fifty glumgluffs at most. I walked toward the northeast coast, over against Blefuscu, and, lying down behind a hillock, took out my small pocket perspective glass, and viewed the enemy's fleet at anchor, consisting of about fifty-men-of-war, and a great number of transports: I then came back to my house, and gave order (for which I had a warrant) for a great quantity of the strongest cable and bars of iron. The cable was about as thick as pack-thread, and the bars of the length and size of a knitting-needle. I trebled the cable to make it stronger, and for the same reason I twisted three of the iron bars together, bending the extremities into a hook. Having thus fixed fifty hooks to as many cables, I went back to the northeast coast, and, putting off my coat, shoes, and stockings, walked into the sea, in my leathern jerkin, about half an hour before high-water. I waded with what haste I could, and swam in the middle about thirty yards, till I felt ground. I arrived at the fleet in less than half an hour. The enemy was so frightened when they saw me that they leaped out of their ships, and swam to shore, where there could not be fewer than thirty thousand souls: I then took my tackling, and, fastening a hook to the hole at the prow of each, I tied all the cords together at the end. While I was thus employed the enemy discharged several thousand arrows, many of which stuck in my hands and face; and, besides the excessive smart, gave me much disturbance in my work. My greatest apprehension was for mine eyes, which I should have infallibly lost, if I had not suddenly thought of an expedient. I kept, among other little necessities, a pair of spectacles in a private pocket, which, as I observed before, had escaped the emperor's searchers. These I took out, and fastened as strongly as I could upon my nose, and, thus armed, went on boldly with my work, in spite of the enemy's arrows, many of which struck against the glasses of my spectacles, but without any other effect further than a little to discompose them. I had now fastened all the hooks, and, taking the knot in my hand, began to pull; but not a ship would stir, for they were all too fast held by their anchors, so that the bold part of my enterprise remained. I therefore let go the cord, and, leaving the hooks fixed to the ships, I resolutely cut with my knife the cables that fastened the anchors, receiving about two hundred shots in my face and hands; then I took up the knotted end of the cables, to which my hooks were tied, and with great ease drew fifty of the enemy's largest men-of-war after me.

The Blefuscudians, who had not the least imagination of what I intended, were at first confounded with astonishment. They had seen me cut the cables, and thought my design was only to let the ships run adrift, or fall foul on each other; but when they perceived the whole fleet moving in order, and saw me pulling at the end, they set up such a scream of grief and despair that it is almost impossible to describe or conceive. When I had got out of danger I stopped a while to pick out the arrows that stuck in my hands and face; and rubbed on some of the same ointment that was given me at my first arrival, as I have formerly mentioned. I then took off my spectacles, and, waiting about an hour, till the tide was a little fallen, I waded through the middle with my cargo, and arrived safe at the royal port of Lilliput.

The emperor and his whole court stood on the shore, expecting the issue of this great adventure. They saw the ships move forward in a large half-moon, but could not discern me, who was up to my breast in water. When I advanced to the middle of the channel they were yet more in pain, because I was under water to my neck. The emperor concluded me to be drowned, and that the enemy's fleet was approaching in a hostile manner; but he was soon eased of his fears: for, the channel growing shallower every step I made, I came in a short time within hearing, and, holding up the end of the cable by which the fleet was fastened, I cried in a loud voice, "Long live the most puissant Emperor of Lilliput!" This great prince received me at my landing with all possible encomiums, and created me a nardac upon the spot, which is the highest title of honor among them.

A VOYAGE TO BROBDIGNAG<sup>1</sup>

On the 16th day of June, 1703, a boy on the topmast discovered land. On the 17th we came in full view of a great island, or continent

(for we knew not whether), on the south side whereof was a small neck of land jutting out into the sea, and a creek too shallow to hold a ship of above one hundred tons. We cast anchor within a league of this creek, and our captain sent a dozen of his men well armed in the long-boat, with vessels for water, if any could be found. I desired his leave to go with them, that I might see the country, and make what discoveries I could. When we came to land we saw no river or spring, nor any sign of inhabitants. Our men therefore wandered on the shore to find out some fresh water near the sea, and I walked alone about a mile on the other side, where I observed the country all barren and rocky. I now began to be weary, and, seeing nothing to entertain my curiosity, I returned gently down toward the creek; and the sea being full in my view, I saw our men already got into the boat, and rowing for life to the ship. I was going to halloo after them, although it had been to little purpose, when I observed a huge creature walking after them in the sea, as fast as he could; he waded not much deeper than his knees, and took prodigious strides; but our men had got the start of him half a league, and the sea thereabouts being full of sharp pointed rocks, the monster was not able to overtake the boat. This I was afterward told, for I durst not stay to see the issue of that adventure; but ran as fast as I could the way I first went, and then climbed up a steep hill, which gave me some prospect of the country. I found it fully cultivated; but that which first surprised me was the length of the grass, which in those grounds that seemed to be kept for hay was above twenty foot high.

I fell into a highroad, for so I took it to be, though it served to the inhabitants only as a footpath through a field of barley. Here I walked on for some time, but could see little on either side, it being now near harvest, and the corn rising at least forty foot. I was an hour walking to the end of this field, which was fenced in with a hedge of at least one hundred and twenty foot high, and the trees so lofty that I could make no computation of their altitude. There was a stile to pass from this field into the next. It had four steps, and a stone to cross over when you came to the uppermost. It was impossible for me to climb this stile, because every step was six foot high, and the upper stone above twenty. I was endeavoring to find some gap in the hedge, when I discovered one of the inhabitants in the next field, advancing toward the stile, of the same size with him whom I saw in the sea pursuing our boat. He appeared as tall as an ordinary spire steeple, and took about ten yards at every stride, as near as I could guess. I was struck with the utmost fear and astonishment, and ran to hide myself in the corn, from whence I saw him at the top of the stile, looking back into the next field on the right hand, and heard him call in a voice many degrees louder than a speaking-trumpet; but the noise was so high in the air that at first I certainly thought it was thunder. Whereupon seven monsters, like himself, came toward him with reaping hooks in their hands, each hook about the largeness of six scythes. These people were not so well clad as the first, whose servants or laborers they seemed to be; for, upon some words he spoke, they went to reap the corn in the field where I lay. I kept from them at as great a distance as I could, but was forced to move with extreme difficulty, for the stalks of the corn were sometimes not above a foot distant, so that I could hardly squeeze my body betwixt them. However, I made a shift to go forward till I came to a part of the field where the corn had been laid by the rain and wind. Here it was impossible for me to advance a step; for the stalks were so interwoven that I could not creep through, and the beards of the fallen ears so strong and pointed that they pierced through my clothes into my flesh. At the same time I heard the reapers not above an hundred yards behind me. Being quite dispirited with toil, and wholly overcome by grief and despair, I lay down between two ridges, and heartily wished I might there end my days. I bemoaned my desolate widow and fatherless children. I lamented my own folly and willfulness in attempting a second voyage, against the advice of all my friends and relations. In this terrible agitation of mind I could not forbear thinking of Lilliput, whose inhabitants looked upon me as the greatest prodigy that ever appeared in the world; where I was able to draw an imperial fleet in my hand, and perform those other actions which will be recorded forever in the chronicles of that empire, while posterity shall hardly believe them, although attested by millions. I reflected what a mortification it must prove to me to appear as inconsiderable in this nation as one single Lilliputian would be among us. But this I conceived was to be the least of my misfortunes; for, as human creatures are observed to be more savage and cruel in proportion to their bulk, what could I expect but to be a morsel in the mouth of the first among these enormous barbarians that should happen to seize me? Undoubtedly philosophers are in the right when they tell us that nothing is great or little otherwise than by comparison.

It might have pleased fortune to let the Lilliputians find some nation, where the people were as diminutive with respect to them as they were to me. And who knows but that even this prodigious race of mortals might be equally overmatched in some distant part of the world, whereof we have yet no discovery.

Scared and confounded as I was, I could not forbear going on with these reflections, when one of the reapers, approaching within ten yards of the ridge where I lay, made me apprehend that with the next step I should be squashed to death under his foot, or cut in two with his reaping-hook. And therefore when he was again about to move, I screamed as loud as fear could make me; whereupon the huge creature trod short, and, looking round about under him for some time, at last espied me as I lay on the ground. He considered awhile, with the caution of one who endeavors to lay hold on a small dangerous animal in such a manner that it may not be able either to scratch or to bite him, as I myself have sometimes done with a weasel in England. At length he ventured to take me up behind, by the middle, between his forefinger and thumb, and brought me within three yards of his eyes, that he might behold my shape more perfectly. I guessed his meaning, and my good fortune gave me so much presence of mind that I resolved not to struggle in the least as he held me in the air above sixty foot from the ground, although he grievously pinched my sides, for fear I should slip through his fingers. All I ventured was to raise mine eyes toward the sun, and place my hands together in a supplicating posture, and to speak some words in an humble, melancholy tone, suitable to the condition I then was in; for I apprehended every moment that he would dash me against the ground, as we usually do any little hateful animal which we have a mind to destroy. But my good star would have it that he appeared pleased with my voice and gestures, and began to look upon me as a curiosity, much wondering to hear me pronounce articulate words, although he could not understand them. In the meantime I was not able to forbear groaning and shedding tears, and turning my head toward my sides; letting him know as well as I could how cruelly I was hurt by the pressure of his thumb and finger. He seemed to apprehend my meaning; for, lifting up the lappet of his coat, he put me gently into it, and immediately ran along with me to his master, who was a substantial farmer, and the same person I had first seen in the field.

The farmer having (as I supposed by their talk) received such an account of me as his servant could give him, took a piece of a small straw, about the size of a walking-staff, and therewith lifted up the lappets of my coat; which, it seems, he thought to be some kind of covering that nature had given me. He blew my hairs aside to take a better view of my face. He called his hands about him, and asked them, as I afterward learned, whether they had ever seen in the fields any little creature that resembled me? He then placed me softly on the ground upon all four, but I got immediately up and walked slowly backward and forward, to let those people see I had no intent to run away. They all sate down in a circle about me, the better to observe my motions. I pulled off my hat, and made a low bow toward the farmer. I fell on my knees, and lifted up my hands and eyes, and spoke several words as loud as I could; I took a purse of gold out of my pocket, and humbly presented it to him. He received it on the palm of his hand, then applied it close to his eye to see what it was, and afterward turned it several times with the point of a pin (which he took out of his sleeve), but could make nothing of it. Whereupon I made a sign that he should place his hand on the ground. I then took the purse, and opening it, poured all the gold into his palm. There were six Spanish pieces of four pistoles each, besides twenty or thirty smaller coins. I saw him wet the tip of his little finger upon his tongue, and take up one of my largest pieces, and then another; but he seemed to be wholly ignorant what they were. He made me a sign to put them again into my purse, and the purse again into my pocket, which, after offering to him several times, I thought it best to do.

The farmer, by this time, was convinced I must be a rational creature. He spoke often to me; but the sound of his voice pierced my ears like that of a water-mill, yet his words were articulate enough. I answered as loud as I could in several languages, and he often laid his ear within two yards of me; but all in vain, for we were wholly unintelligible to each other. He then sent his servants to their work, and taking his handkerchief out of his pocket, he doubled, and spread it on his left hand, which he placed flat on the ground, with the palm upward, making me a sign to step into it, as I could easily do, for it was not above a foot in thickness. I thought it my part to obey; and for fear of falling laid myself at full length upon the handkerchief, with the remainder of which he lapped me up to the head for further security, and in this manner carried me home to his house. There he called his wife, and showed me to her; but she screamed and ran back, as women in England do at the sight of a toad or spider. However, when she had awhile seen my behavior, and how well I observed the signs her husband made, she was soon reconciled, and by degrees grew extremely tender of me. . . .

The king, who, . . . was a prince of excellent understanding, would frequently order that I should be brought in my box, and set upon the table in his closet: he would then command me to bring one of my chairs out of the box, and sit down within three yards' distance upon the top of the cabinet, which brought me almost to a level with his face. In this manner I had several conversations with him. I one day took the freedom to tell his majesty that the contempt he discovered toward Europe, and the rest of the world, did not seem answerable to those excellent qualities of mind that he was master of; that reason did not extend itself with the bulk of the body; on the contrary, we observed in our country that the tallest persons were usually least provided with it; that among other animals, bees and ants had the reputation of more industry, art, and sagacity, than many of the larger kinds; and that, as inconsiderable as he took me to be, I hoped I might live to do his majesty some signal service. The king heard me with attention, and began to conceive a much better opinion of me than he had ever before. He desired I would give him as exact an account of the government of England as I possibly could; because, as fond as princes commonly are of their own customs (for so he conjectured of other monarchs by my former discourses), he should be glad to hear of anything that might deserve imitation.

Imagine with thyself, courteous reader, how often I then wished for the tongue of Demosthenes or Cicero, that might have enabled me to celebrate the praise of my own dear native country in a style equal to its merits and felicity.

I began my discourse by informing his majesty that our dominions consisted of two islands, which composed three mighty kingdoms, under one sovereign, besides our plantations in America. I dwelt long upon the fertility of our soil, and the temperature of our climate. I then spoke at large upon the constitution of an English parliament; partly made up of an illustrious body, called the House of Peers; persons of the noblest blood, and of the most ancient and ample patrimonies. I described that extraordinary care always taken of their education in arts and arms, to qualify them for being counselors both to the king and kingdom: to have a share in the legislature; to be members of the highest court of judicature, from whence there can be no appeal; and to be champions always ready for the defence of their prince and country, by their valor, conduct, and fidelity. That these were the ornament and bulwark of the kingdom, worthy followers of their most renowned ancestors, whose honor have been the reward of their virtue, from which their posterity were never once known to degenerate. To these were joined several holy persons, as part of that assembly, under the title of bishops; whose peculiar business it is to take care of religion, and of those who instruct the people therein. These were searched and sought out through the whole nation, by the prince and his wisest counselors, among such of the priesthood as were most deservedly distinguished by the sanctity of their lives and the depth of their erudition; who were indeed the spiritual fathers of the clergy and the people.

That the other part of the parliament consisted of an assembly called the House of Commons, who were all principal gentlemen, freely picked and culled out by the people themselves, for their great abilities and love of their country, to represent the wisdom of the whole nation. And that these two bodies made up the most august assembly in Europe: to whom, in conjunction with the prince, the whole legislature is committed.

I then descended to the courts of justice; over which the judges, those venerable sages and interpreters of the law, presided, for determining the disputed rights and properties of men, as well as for the punishment of vice and protection of innocence. I mentioned the prudent management of our treasury; the valor and achievements of our forces, by sea and land. I computed the number of our people by reckoning how many millions there might be of each religious sect, or political party, among us. I did not omit even our sports and pastimes, or any other particular which I thought might redound to the honor of my country. And I finished all with a brief historical account of affairs and events in England for about an hundred years past.

This conversation was not ended under five audiences, each of several hours; and the king heard the whole with great attention, frequently taking notes of what I spoke, as well as memorandums of all questions he intended to ask me.

When I had put an end to these long discourses, his majesty, in a sixth audience, consulting his notes, proposed many doubts, queries, and objections upon every article. He asked what methods were used to cultivate the minds and bodies of our young nobility, and in what kind of business they commonly spent the first and teachable part of their lives? What course was taken to supply that assembly, when any noble family became extinct? What qualifications were necessary in those who are to be created new lords; whether the humor of the prince, a sum of money to a court lady or a prime minister, or a design of strengthening a party opposite to the public interest, ever happened to be motives in those advancements? What share of knowledge these lords had in the laws of their country, and how they came by it, so as to enable them to decide the properties of their fellow-subjects in the last resort? Whether they were always so free from avarice, partialities, or want, that a bribe, or some other sinister view, could have no place among them? Whether those holy lords I spoke of were always promoted to that rank upon account of their knowledge in religious matters, and the sanctity of their lives; had never been compliers with the times, while they were common priests; or slavish prostitute chaplains to some nobleman, whose opinions they continued servilely to follow, after they were admitted into that assembly?

He then desired to know what arts were practiced in electing those whom I called commoners; whether a stranger, with a strong purse, would not influence the vulgar voters to choose him before their own landlord, or the most considerable gentleman in the neighborhood? How it came to pass that people were so violently bent upon getting into this assembly, which I allowed to be a great trouble and expense, often to the ruin of their families, without any salary or pension; because this appeared such an exalted strain of virtue and public spirit, that his majesty seemed to doubt it might possibly not be always sincere. And he desired to know whether such zealous gentlemen could have any views of refunding themselves for the charges and trouble they were at, by sacrificing the public good to the designs of a weak and vicious prince, in conjunction with a corrupted ministry. He multiplied his questions, and sifted me thoroughly upon every part of this head, proposing numberless inquiries and objections, which I think it not prudent or convenient to repeat.

Upon what I said in relation to our courts of justice, his majesty desired to be satisfied in several points: and this I was the better able to do, having been formerly almost ruined by a long suit in the Chancery, which was decreed for me, with costs. He asked what time was usually spent in determining between right and wrong, and what degree of expense? Whether advocates and orators had liberty to plead in causes manifestly known to be unjust, vexatious, or oppressive? Whether party, in religion or politics, were observed to be of any weight in the scale of justice? Whether those pleading orators were persons educated in the general knowledge of equity, or only in provincial, national, and other local customs? Whether they or their judges had any part in penning those laws, which they assumed the liberty of interpreting and glossing upon at their pleasure? Whether they had ever, at different times, pleaded for and against the same cause, and cited precedents to prove contrary opinions? Whether they were a rich or a poor corporation? Whether they received any pecuniary reward for pleading or delivering their opinions? And particularly, whether they were ever admitted as members in the lower senate?

He fell next upon the management of our treasury; and said he thought my memory had failed me, because I computed our taxes at about five or six millions a year, and when I came to mention the issues, he found they sometimes amounted to more than double; for the notes he had taken were very particular in this point, because he hoped, as he told me, that the knowledge of our conduct might be useful to him, and he could not be deceived in his calculations. But, if what I told him were true, he was still at a loss how a kingdom could run out of its estate, like a private person. He asked me who were our creditors, and where we found money to pay them? He wondered to hear me talk of such chargeable and expensive wars. That certainly we must be a quarrelsome people, or live among very bad neighbors, and that our generals must needs be richer than our kings. He asked what business we had out of our own islands, unless upon the score of trade, or treaty, or to defend the coasts with our fleet? Above all, he was amazed to hear me talk of a mercenary standing army in the midst of peace and among a free people. He said if we were governed by our own consent, in the persons of our representatives, he could not imagine of whom we were afraid, or against whom we were to fight; and would hear my opinion, whether a private man's house might not better be defended by himself, his children and family, than by half a dozen rascals, picked up at a venture in the streets for small wages, who might get an hundred times more by cutting their throats.

He laughed at my odd kind of arithmetic, as he was pleased to call it, in reckoning the numbers of our people, by a computation drawn from the several sects among us in religion and politics. He said he knew no reason why those who entertain opinions prejudicial to the public should be obliged to change, or should not be obliged to conceal them. And, as it was tyranny in any government to require the first, so it was weakness not to enforce the second; for a man may be allowed to keep poisons in his closet, but not to vend them about for cordials.

He observed, that, among the diversions of our nobility and gentry, I had mentioned gaming: he desired to know at what age this entertainment was usually taken up, and when it was laid down; how much of their time it employed; whether it ever went so high as to affect their fortunes; whether mean, vicious people, by their dexterity in that art, might not arrive at great riches, and sometimes keep our very nobles in dependence, as well as habituate them to vile companions; wholly take them from the improvement of their minds, and force them, by the losses they have received, to learn and practice that infamous dexterity upon others?

He was perfectly astonished with the historical account I gave him of our affairs during the last century; protesting, it was only a heap of conspiracies, rebellions, murders, massacres, revolutions, banishments—the very worst effects that avarice, faction, hypocrisy, perfidiousness, cruelty, rage, madness, hatred, envy, lust, malice, or ambition could produce.

His majesty, in another audience, was at the pains to recapitulate the sum of all I had spoken; compared the questions he made with the answers I had given; then, taking me into his hands, and stroking me gently, delivered himself in these words, which I shall never forget, nor the manner he spoke them in: “My little friend Grildrig, you have made a most admirable panegyric upon your country; you have clearly proved that ignorance, idleness, and vice are the proper ingredients for qualifying a legislator; the laws are best explained, interpreted and applied, by those whose interests and abilities lie in perverting, confounding, and eluding them. I observe among you some lines of an institution, which, in its original, might have been tolerable, but these half-crazed, and the rest wholly blurred and blotted by corruptions. It doth not appear from all you have said how any one perfection is required, toward the procurement of any one station among you; much less, that men are ennobled on account of their virtue; that priests are advanced for their piety or learning; soldiers, for their conduct or valor; judges, for their integrity; senators, for the love of their country; or counselors, for their wisdom. As for yourself,” continued the king, “who have spent the greatest part of your life in travelling, I am well disposed to hope you may hitherto have escaped many vices of your country. But, by what I have gathered from your own relation, and the answers I have with much pains wringed and extorted from you, I cannot but conclude the bulk of your natives to be the most pernicious race of little odious vermin that Nature ever suffered to crawl upon the surface of the earth.”

NED SOFTLY, THE POET

(The Tatler, No. 163, 1709-1711)

*Idem inficeto est inficetior rure,
Simul poemata attigit; neque idem unquam
Æque est beatus, ac poema quum scribit:
Tam gaudet in se, tamque se ipse miratur.*

*Nimirum idem omnes fallimur; neque est quisquam
Quem non in aliqua re videre Suffnum
Possis—*

Catul. de Suffeno, xx, 14.

(Suffenus has no more wit than a mere clown when he attempts to write verses; and yet he is never happier than when he is scribbling: so much does he admire himself and his compositions. And, indeed, this is the foible of every one of us; for there is no man living who is not a Suffenus in one thing or other.)

Will's Coffee-house, April 24.

I yesterday came hither<sup>1</sup> about two hours before the company generally make their appearance, with a design to read over all the newspapers; but upon my sitting down, I was accosted by Ned Softly, who saw me from a corner in the other end of the room, where I found he had been writing something. “Mr. Bickerstaff,”<sup>2</sup> says he, “I observe by a late paper of yours, that you and I are just of a humour; for you must know, of all impertinences, there is nothing which I so much hate as news. I never read a gazette in my life; and never trouble my head about our armies, whether they win or lose; or in what part of the world they lie encamped.” Without giving me time to reply, he drew a paper of verses out of his pocket, telling me, "That he had something which would entertain me more agreeably; and that he would desire my judgment upon every line, for that we had time enough before us until the company came in."

<sup>1</sup> Since the days of Dryden (who patronized it regularly) Will's Coffee-house, on the north side of Russell Street near Covent Garden, was a famous resort for the critics and the wits of the town.

Ned Softly is a very pretty poet, and a great admirer of easy lines. Waller is his favourite;<sup>3</sup> and as that admirable writer has the best and worst verses of any among our great English 10 poets, Ned Softly has got all the bad ones without book; which he repeats upon occasion, to show his reading, and garnish his conversation. Ned is indeed a true English reader, incapable of relishing the great and masterly 15 strokes of this art; but wonderfully pleased with the little Gothic ornaments of epigrammatical conceits, turns, points, and quibbles, which are so frequent in the most admired of our English poets, and practised by those who 20 want genius and strength to represent, after the manner of the ancients, simplicity in its natural beauty and perfection.

Finding myself unavoidably engaged in such a conversation, I was resolved to turn my 25 pain into a pleasure, and to divert myself as well as I could with so very odd a fellow. "You must understand," says Ned, "that the sonnet<sup>4</sup> I am going to read to you was written upon a lady who showed me some 30 verses of her own making, and is, perhaps, the best poet of our age. But you shall hear it."

Upon which he began to read as follows:

TO MIRA, ON HER INCOMPARABLE POEMS

1

When dressed in laurel wreaths you shine,
And tune your soft melodious notes,
You seem a sister of the Nine,
Or Phœbus' self in petticoats.

2

I fancy, when your song you sing,
Your song you sing with so much art,
Your pen was plucked from Cupid's wing;
For, ah! it wounds me like his dart.

"Why," says I, "this is a little nosegay of conceits, a very lump of salt: every verse hath 50 something in it that piques; and then the dart in the last line is certainly as pretty a sting in the tail of an epigram (for so I think you critics call it) as ever entered into the thought of a poet." "Dear Mr. Bickerstaff," says he, 55

<sup>3</sup> Edmund Waller (1605-1687), was looked up to as a great refiner of language and style, and as a master of English versification.

<sup>4</sup> In Addison's time the sonnet form was neglected, and the word Sonnet was applied loosely to any short poem.

shaking me by the hand, "everybody knows you to be a judge of these things; and, to tell you truly, I read over Roscommon's<sup>5</sup> translation of Horace's 'Art of Poetry' three several 5 times before I sat down to write the sonnet which I have shown you. But you shall hear it again, and pray observe every line of it, for not one of them shall pass without your approbation.

When dressed in laurel wreaths you shine.

"This is," says he, "when you have your garland on; when you are writing verses." To which I replied, "I know your meaning: 15 a metaphor!" "The same," said he, and went on.

And tune your soft melodious notes.

"Pray observe the gliding of that verse; there is scarce a consonant in it: I took care to make it run upon liquids. Give me your opinion of it." "Truly," said I, "I think it as good as the former." "I am very glad to hear you say so," says he; "but mind the next

You seem a sister of the Nine.

"That is," says he, "you seem a sister of the Muses; for, if you look into ancient authors, you will find it was their opinion, that there were nine of them." "I remember it very well," said I; "but pray proceed."

Or Phœbus' self in petticoats.

"Phœbus," says he, "was the god of Poetry. 35 These little instances, Mr. Bickerstaff, show a gentleman's reading. Then to take off from the air of learning, which Phœbus and the Muses have given to this first stanza, you may observe, how it falls all of a sudden into the 40 familiar—"in petticoats!"

Or Phœbus' self in petticoats.

"Let us now," says I, "enter upon the second stanza; I find the first line is still a con- 45 tinuation of the metaphor.

I fancy when your song you sing.

"It is very right," says he; "but pray observe the turn of words in those two lines. I was a whole hour in adjusting of them, and have still a doubt upon me whether, in the second line it should be—"Your song you sing; or, You sing your song?" You shall hear them both:—

<sup>5</sup> Wentworth Dillon, Earl of Roscommon, nephew of the famous Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, and a contemporary of Waller. Besides his translation of the Ars Poetica (1680), he wrote an essay On Translated Verse, which influenced Dryden, and which teaches the importance of following set rules in poetical composition.

I fancy, when your song you sing.
(Your song you sing with so much art);

or,

I fancy, when your song you sing,
(You sing your song with so much art).

"Truly," said I, "the turn is so natural either way, that you have made me almost giddy with it." "Dear sir," said he, grasping me by the hand, "you have a great deal of 10 patience; but pray what do you think of the next verse?"

Your pen was pluck'd from Cupid's wing.

"Think!" says I; "I think you have made 15 Cupid look like a little goose." "That was my meaning," says he: "I think the ridicule is well enough hit off. But we come now to the last, which sums up the whole matter.

For, ah! it wounds me like his dart.

"Pray how do you like that Ah! doth it not make a pretty figure in that place? Ah!—it looks as if I felt the dart, and cried out at being pricked with it.

For, ah! it wounds me like his dart.

"My friend Dick Easy," continued he, "assured me he would rather have written that Ah! than to have been the author of the Æneid. He indeed objected, that I made 30 Mira's pen like a quill in one of the lines, and like a dart in the other. But as to that——"

"Oh! as to that," says I, "it is but supposing Cupid to be like a porcupine, and his quills 35 and darts will be the same thing." He was going to embrace me for the hint; but half a dozen critics coming into the room, whose faces he did not like, he conveyed the sonnet into his pocket, and whispered me in the ear, 40 he would show it me again as soon as his man had written it over fair.

THE OBJECT OF THE SPECTATOR

(The Spectator, No. 10, 1711–1714)

*Non aliter quam qui adverso vix flumine lembum

DRYDEN.

It is with much satisfaction that I hear this great city inquiring day by day after these my papers, and receiving my morning lectures with a becoming seriousness and attention. My publisher tells me that there are already three thousand of them distributed every day; 5 so that if I allow twenty readers to every paper, which I look upon as a modest computation, I may reckon about threescore thousand disciples in London and Westminster,<sup>1</sup> who I hope will take care to distinguish themselves from the thoughtless herd of their ignorant and unattentive brethren. Since I have raised to myself so great an audience, I shall spare no pains to make their instruction agreeable, and their diversion useful. For which reasons I shall endeavour to enliven morality with wit, and to temper wit with morality, that my readers may, if possible, both ways find their account in the speculation of the day.<sup>2</sup> And to the end that their virtue and discretion may 20 not be short, transient, intermitting starts of thought. I have resolved to refresh their memories from day to day, till I have recovered them out of that desperate state of vice and folly into which the age is fallen. The mind 25 that lies fallow but a single day, sprouts up in follies that are only to be killed by a constant and assiduous culture. It was said of Socrates that he brought philosophy down from heaven, to inhabit among men; and I shall be ambitious to have it said of me, that I have brought philosophy out of closets and libraries, schools and colleges, to dwell in clubs and assemblies, at tea-tables, and in coffee-houses.<sup>3</sup>

I would, therefore, in a very particular 35 manner, recommend these my speculations to all well-regulated families, that set apart an hour in every morning for tea and bread and butter; and would earnestly advise them for their good, to order this paper to be punctually served up, and to be looked upon as a part of the tea-equipage.

Sir Francis Bacon observes,<sup>4</sup> that a well written book, compared with its rivals and antagonists, is like Moses's serpent, that immediately swallowed up and devoured those 45 of the Egyptians. I shall not be so vain as to think, that where the Spectator appears, the other public prints will vanish; but shall leave it to my reader's consideration, whether it is not much better to be let into the knowledge of one's self, than to hear what passes in Muscovy<sup>5</sup> or Poland; and to amuse ourselves with such writings as tend to the wearing out of ignorance, passion, and prejudice, than such as naturally conduce to inflame hatreds, and make enmities irreconcilable.

In the next place, I would recommend this paper to the daily perusal of those gentlemen whom I cannot but consider as my good brothers and allies, I mean the fraternity of spectators, who live in the world without having anything to do in it; and either by the affluence of their fortunes, or laziness of their dispositions, have no other business with the rest of mankind but to look upon them. Under this class of men are comprehended all contemplative tradesmen, titular physicians,<sup>6</sup> Fellows of the Royal Society, Templars that are not given to be contentious,<sup>7</sup> and statesmen that are out of business; in short, every one that considers the world as a theatre, and desires to form a right judgment of those who are the actors on it.

There is another set of men that I must likewise lay a claim to, whom I have lately called the blanks of society, as being altogether unfurnished with ideas, till the business and conversation of the day has supplied them. I have often considered these poor souls with an eye of great commiseration, when I have heard them asking the first man they have met with, whether there was any news stirring, and, by that means, gathering together materials for thinking. These needy persons do not know what to talk of till about twelve o'clock in the morning; for, by that time, they are pretty good judges of the weather, know which way the wind sits, and whether the Dutch mail<sup>8</sup> be come in. As they lie at the mercy of the first man they meet, and are grave or impertinent all the day long, according to the notions which they have imbibed in the morning, I would earnestly entreat them not to stir out of their chambers till they have read this paper, and do promise them that I will daily instil into them such sound and wholesome sentiments, as shall have a good effect on their conversation for the ensuing twelve hours.

But there are none to whom this paper will be more useful than to the female world. I have often thought there has not been sufficient pains taken in finding out proper employments and diversions for the fair ones. Their amusements seem contrived for them, rather as they are women, than as they are reasonable creatures, and are more adapted to the sex than to the species. The toilet is their great scene of business, and the right adjusting of their hair the principal employment of their lives. The sorting of a suit of ribbons is reckoned a very good morning's work; and if they make an excursion to a mercer's<sup>9</sup> or a toy-shop,<sup>10</sup> so great a fatigue makes them unfit for anything else all the day after.<sup>11</sup> Their more serious occupations are sewing and embroidery, and their greatest drudgery the preparation of jellies and sweet-meats. This I say, is the state of ordinary women; though I know there are multitudes of those of a more elevated life and conversation, that move in an exalted sphere of knowledge and virtue, that join all the beauties of the mind to the ornaments of dress, and inspire a kind of awe and respect, as well as love, into their male beholders. I hope to increase the number of these by publishing this daily paper, which I shall always endeavour to make an innocent, if not an improving entertainment, and by that means at least divert the minds of my female readers from greater trifles. At the same time, as I would fain give some finishing touches to those which are already the most beautiful pieces in human nature, I shall endeavour to point out all those imperfections that are the blemishes, as well as those virtues which are the embellishments of the sex. In the meanwhile I hope these my gentle readers, who have so much time on their hands, will not grudge throwing away a quarter of an hour in a day on this paper, since they may do it without any hindrance to business.

I know several of my friends and well-wishers are in great pain for me, lest I should not be able to keep up the spirit of a paper which I oblige myself to furnish every day: but to make them easy in this particular, I will promise them faithfully to give it over as soon as I grow dull. This I know will be a matter of great raillery to the small wits; who will frequently put me in mind of my promise, desire me to keep my word, assure me that it is high time to give over, with many other little pleasantries of the like nature, which men of a little smart genius cannot forbear throwing out against their best friends, when they have such a handle given them of being

CREECH.

When I am in a serious humour, I very often walk by myself in Westminster Abbey; where 25 the gloominess of the place, and the use to which it is applied, with the solemnity of the building, and the condition of the people who lie in it, are apt to fill the mind with a kind of melancholy, or rather thoughtfulness, that 30 is not disagreeable. I yesterday passed a whole afternoon in the churchyard, the cloisters, and the church, amusing myself with the tombstones and inscriptions that I met with in those several regions of the dead. Most 35 of them recorded nothing else of the buried person, but that he was born upon one day, and died upon another: the whole history of his life being comprehended in those two circumstances, that are common to all mankind. 40 I could not but look upon these registers of existence, whether of brass or marble, as a kind of satire upon the departed persons; who had left no other memorial of them but that they were born and that they died. They 45 put me in mind of several persons mentioned in the battles of heroic poems, who have sounding names given them, for no other reason but that they may be killed, and are celebrated for nothing but being knocked on the head. 50 The life of these men is finely described in holy writ by "the path of an arrow,"<sup>11</sup> which is immediately closed up and lost.

Upon my going into the church, I entertained myself with the digging of a grave; and saw 55 in every shovelful of it that was thrown up, the fragment of a bone or skull intermixed with a kind of fresh mouldering earth, that some time or other had a place in the composition of a human body. Upon this I began to consider with myself what innumerable multitudes of people lay confused together under the pavement of that ancient cathedral; how men and women, friends and enemies, priests and soldiers, monks and prebendaries,<sup>2</sup> were crumbled amongst one another, and blended together in the same common mass; how beauty, strength, and youth, with old age, weakness, and deformity, lay undistinguished 15 in the same promiscuous heap of matter.

After having thus surveyed this great magazine of mortality, as it were in the lump, I examined it more particularly by the accounts which I found on several of the monuments 20 which are raised in every quarter of that ancient fabric. Some of them were covered with such extravagant epitaphs, that, if it were possible for the dead person to be acquainted with them, he would blush at the praises which his friends have bestowed upon him. There are others so excessively modest, that they deliver the character of the person departed in Greek or Hebrew, and by that means are not understood once in a twelve-month. In the poetical quarter,<sup>3</sup> I found there were poets who had no monuments, and monuments which had no poets. I observed indeed, that the present war<sup>4</sup> had filled the church with many of these uninhabited monuments, which had been erected to the memory of persons whose bodies were perhaps buried in the plains of Blenheim,<sup>5</sup> or in the bosom of the ocean.

I could not but be very delighted with several modern epitaphs, which are written with great elegance of expression and justness of thought, and therefore do honour to the living as well as to the dead. As a foreigner is very apt to conceive an idea of the ignorance or the politeness of a nation, from the turn of their public monuments and inscriptions, they should be submitted to the perusal of men of learning and genius, before they are put in execution. Sir Cloudesly Shovel's<sup>6</sup> monument has very often given me great offence: instead of the brave rough English Admiral, which was the distinguishing character of that plain gallant man, he is represented on his tomb by the figure of a beau, dressed in a long periwig, and reposing himself upon velvet cushions under a canopy of state. The inscription is answerable to the monument; for instead of celebrating the many remarkable actions he had performed in the service of his country, it acquaints us only with the manner of his death, in which it was impossible for him to reap any honour. The Dutch, whom we are apt to despise for want of genius, show an infinitely greater taste of antiquity and politeness<sup>7</sup> in their buildings and works of this nature, than what we meet with in those of our own country. The monuments of their admirals, which have been erected at the public expense, represent them like themselves; and are adorned with rostral crowns<sup>8</sup> and naval ornaments, with beautiful festoons of seaweed, shells, and coral.

But to return to our subject. I have left the repository of our English kings for the contemplation of another day, when I shall find my mind disposed for so serious an amusement. I know that entertainments of this nature are apt to raise dark and dismal thoughts in timorous minds and gloomy imaginations; but for my own part, though I am always serious, I do not know what it is to be melancholy; and can therefore take a view of nature in her deep and solemn scenes, with the same pleasure as in her most gay and delightful ones. By this means I can improve myself with those objects which others consider with terror. When I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies in me; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tomb of the parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying by those who deposed them, when I consider rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men that divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions, factions, and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates on the tombs, of some that died yesterday, and some six hundred years ago, I consider that great day when we shall

THE FINE LADY'S JOURNAL

(The Spectator, No. 322, March 11, 1712)

. . . Modo vir, modo femina.

VIRG.

Sometimes a man, sometimes a woman.

The journal with which I presented my reader on Tuesday last,<sup>1</sup> has brought me in several letters, with accounts of many private lives cast into that form. I have the Rake's Journal, the Sot's Journal, and among several others a very curious piece, entitled—"The Journal of a Mohock."<sup>2</sup> By these instances I find that the intention of my last Tuesday's paper has been mistaken by many of my readers. I did not design so much to expose vice as idleness, and aimed at those persons who pass away their time rather in trifle and impertinence, than in crimes and immoralities. Offences of this latter kind are not to be dallied with, or treated in so ludicrous a manner. In short, my journal only holds up folly to the light, and shews the disagreeableness of such actions as are indifferent in themselves, and blamable only as they proceed from creatures endowed with reason.

My following correspondent, who calls herself Clarinda, is such a journalist as I require: she seems by her letter to be placed in a modish state of indifference between vice and virtue, and to be susceptible of either, were there proper pains taken with her. Had her journal been filled with gallantries, or such occurrences as had shewn her wholly divested of her natural innocence, notwithstanding it might have been more pleasing to the generality of readers, I should not have published it; but as it is only the picture of a life filled with a fashionable kind of gaiety and laziness, I shall set down five days of it, as I have received it from the hand of my fair correspondent.

Dear Mr. Spectator,

You having set your readers an exercise in one of your last week's papers, I have performed mine according to your orders, and herewith send it you enclosed. You must know, Mr. Spectator, that I am a maiden lady of a good fortune, who have had several matches offered me for these ten years last past, and have at present warm applications made to me by a very pretty fellow. As I am at my own disposal, I come up to town every winter, and pass my time in it, after the manner you will find in the following journal, which I begun to write upon the very day after your Spectator upon that subject.

Tuesday night. Could not go to sleep till one in the morning for thinking of my journal.

Wednesday. From eight till ten. Drank two dishes of chocolate in bed, and fell asleep after them.

From ten to eleven. Eat a slice of bread and butter, drank a dish of bohea,<sup>3</sup> read the Spectator.

From eleven to one. At my toilette, tried a new head.<sup>4</sup> Gave orders for Veny<sup>5</sup> to be 20 combed and washed. Mem. I look best in blue.

From one till half an hour after two. Drove to the Change. Cheapened<sup>6</sup> a couple of fans.

Till four. At dinner. Mem. Mr. Froth 25 passed by in his new liveries.

From four to six. Dressed, paid a visit to old Lady Blithe and her sister, having before heard they were gone out of town that day.

From six to eleven. At Basset.<sup>7</sup> Mem. Never set again upon the ace of diamonds.

Thursday. From eleven at night to eight in the morning. Dreamed that I punted<sup>8</sup> to Mr. Froth.

From eight to ten. Chocolate. Read two acts in Aurengzebe<sup>9</sup> a-bed.

From ten to eleven. Tea-table. Read the playbills. Received a letter from Mr. Froth. Mem. Locked it up in my strong box.

Rest of the morning. Fontange, the tire-woman, her account of my Lady Blithe's wash. Broke a tooth in my little tortoise shell comb. Sent Frank to know how my Lady Hectic rested after her monkey's leaping out at window. Looked pale. Fontagne tells me my glass is not true. Dressed by three.

From three to four. Dinner cold before I sat down.

From four to eleven. Saw company. Mr. 50 see Mr. Froth till the beginning of the second act. Mr. Froth talked to a gentleman in a black wig. Bowed to a lady in the front box. Mr. Froth and his friend clapped Nicolini<sup>14</sup>

Faddle promises me her woman to cut my hair. Lost five guineas at crimp.<sup>10</sup>

Twelve o'clock at night. Went to bed.

Friday. Eight in the morning. A-bed. Read 5 over all Mr. Froth's letters.

Ten o'clock. Staid within all day, not at home.

From ten to twelve. In conference with my mantua-maker. Sorted a suit of ribbons.

10 Broke my blue china cup.

From twelve to one. Shut myself up in my chamber, practised Lady Betty Modely's skuttle.<sup>11</sup>

One in the afternoon. Called for my flowered handkerchief. Worked half a violet-leaf in it. Eyes ached and head out of order. Threw by my work, and read over the remaining part of Aurengzebe.

From three to four. Dined.

From four to twelve. Changed my mind, dressed, went abroad, and played at crimp till midnight. Found Mrs. Spitley at home. Conversation: Mrs. Brilliant's necklace false stones. Old Lady Loveday going to be married to a young fellow that is not worth a groat.<sup>12</sup> Miss Prue gone into the country. Tom Townley has red hair. Mem. Mrs. Spitley whispered in my ear that she had something to tell me about Mr. Froth, I am sure it is not 30 true.

Between twelve and one. Dreamed that Mr. Froth lay at my feet, and called me Indamora.<sup>13</sup>

Saturday. Rose at eight o'clock in the 35 morning. Sat down to my toilette.

From eight to nine. Shifted a patch for half an hour before I could determine it. Fixed it above my left eyebrow.

From nine to twelve. Drank my tea, and 40 dressed.

From twelve to two. At chapel. A great deal of good company. Mem. The third air in the new opera. Lady Blithe dressed frightfully.

From three to four. Dined. Miss Kitty 45 called upon me to go to the opera, before I was risen from table.

From dinner to six. Drank tea. Turned off a footman for being rude to Veny.

Six o'clock. Went to the opera. I did not see Mr. Froth till the beginning of the second act. Mr. Froth talked to a gentleman in a black wig. Bowed to a lady in the front box. Mr. Froth and his friend clapped Nicolini<sup>14</sup> in the third act. Mr. Froth cried out Ancora.<sup>15</sup> Mr. Froth led me to my chair. I think he squeezed my hand.

Eleven at night. Went to bed. Melancholy dreams. Methought Nicolini said he was Mr. Froth.

Sunday. Indisposed.

Monday. Eight o'clock. Waked by Miss Kitty. Aurengezebe lay upon the chair by me. Kitty repeated without book the eight best lines in the play. Went in our mobs<sup>16</sup> to the dumb man<sup>17</sup> according to appointment. Told me that my lover's name began with a G. Mem. The conjurer was within a letter of Mr. Froth's name, &c.

Upon looking back into this my journal, I find that I am at a loss to know whether I pass my time well or ill; and indeed never thought of considering how I did it before I perused your speculation upon that subject. I scarce find a single action in these five days that I can thoroughly approve of, except the working upon the violet-leaf, which I am resolved to finish the first day I am at leisure. As for Mr. Froth and Veny, I did not think they took up so much of my time and thoughts as I find they do upon my journal. The latter of them I will turn off, if you insist upon it; and if Mr. Froth does not bring matters to a conclusion very suddenly, I will not let my life run away in a dream. Your humble servant,

CLARINDA.

To resume one of the morals of my first paper, and to confirm Clarinda in her good inclinations, I would have her consider what a pretty figure she would make among posterity, were the history of her whole life published like these five days of it. I shall conclude my paper with an epitaph written by an uncertain author<sup>18</sup> on Sir Philip Sidney's sister, a lady who seems to have been of a temper very much different from that of Clarinda. The last thought of it is so very noble, that I dare say my reader will pardon me the quotation.

SIR ROGER AT CHURCH

(The Spectator, No. 112, Monday, July 9, 1711)

I am always very well pleased with a country Sunday, and think, if keeping holy the seventh day were only a human institution, it would be the best method that could have been thought of for the polishing and civilizing of mankind. It is certain the country people would soon degenerate into a kind of savages and barbarians, were there not such frequent returns of a stated time, in which the whole village meet together with their best faces, and in their cleanliest habits, to converse with one another upon indifferent subjects, hear their duties explained to them, and join together in adoration of the Supreme Being. Sunday clears away the rust of the whole week, not only as it refreshes in their minds the notions of religion, but as it puts both the sexes upon appearing in their most agreeable forms, and exerting all such qualities as are apt to give them a figure in the eye of the village. A country fellow distinguishes himself as much in the churchyard, as a citizen does upon the Change, the whole parish politics being generally discussed in that place either after sermon or before the bell rings.

My friend Sir Roger, being a good churchman, has beautified the inside of his church with several texts of his own choosing; he has likewise given a handsome pulpit-cloth, and railed in the communion table at his own expense. He has often told me, that at his coming to his estate he found his parishioners very irregular; and that in order to make them kneel and join in the responses, he gave every one of them a hassock and a common-prayer book: and at the same time employed an itinerant singing master, who goes about the country for that purpose, to instruct them rightly in the tunes of the psalms; upon which they now very much value themselves, and indeed outdo most of the country churches that I have ever heard.

As Sir Roger is landlord to the whole congregation, he keeps them in very good order, and will suffer nobody to sleep in it besides himself; for if by chance he has been surprised into a short nap at sermon, upon recovering out of it he stands up and looks about him, and if he sees anybody else nodding, either wakes them himself, or sends his servants to them. Several other of the old knight's particularities break out upon these occasions: sometimes he will be lengthening out a verse in the singing-psalms, half a minute after the rest of the congregation have done with it; sometimes, when he is pleased with the matter of his devotion, he pronounces "Amen" three or four times to the same prayer; and sometimes stands up when everybody else is upon their knees, to count the congregation, or see if any of his tenants are missing.

I was yesterday very much surprised to hear my old friend, in the midst of the service, calling out to one John Matthews to mind what he was about, and not disturb the congregation. This John Matthews it seems is remarkable for being an idle fellow, and at that time was kicking his heels for his diversion. This authority of the knight, though exerted in that odd manner which accompanies him in all circumstances of life, has a very good effect upon the parish, who are not polite enough to see anything ridiculous in his behaviour; besides that the general good sense and worthiness of his character, makes his friends observe these little singularities as foils that rather set off than blemish his good qualities.

As soon as the sermon is finished, nobody presumes to stir till Sir Roger is gone out of the church. The knight walks down from his seat in the chancel between a double row of his tenants, that stand bowing to him on each side; and every now and then inquires how such an one's wife, or mother, or son, or father do, whom he does not see at church; which is understood as a secret reprimand to the person that is absent.

The chaplain has often told me, that upon a catechizing day, when Sir Roger has been pleased with a boy that answers well, he has ordered a bible to be given him next day for his encouragement; and sometimes accompanies it with a flitch of bacon to his mother. Sir Roger has likewise added five pounds a year to the clerk's place; and that he may encourage the young fellows to make themselves perfect in the church service, has promised upon the death of the present incumbent, who is very old, to bestow it according to merit.

The fair understanding between Sir Roger and his chaplain, and their mutual concurrence in doing good, is the more remarkable, because the very next village is famous for the differences and contentions that rise between the parson and the Squire, who live in a perpetual state of war. The parson is always preaching at the Squire, and the Squire to be revenged on the parson, never comes to church. The Squire has made all his tenants atheists and tithe-stealers; while the parson instructs them every Sunday in the dignity of his order, and insinuates to them in almost every sermon, that he is a better man than his patron. In short, matters are come to such an extremity, that the Squire has not said his prayers either in public or private this half year; and that the parson threatens him, if he does not mend his manners, to pray for him in the face of the whole congregation.

Feuds of this nature, though too frequent in the country, are very fatal to the ordinary people; who are so used to be dazzled with riches, that they pay as much deference to the understanding of a man of an estate, as of a man of learning; and are very hardly brought to regard any truth, how important soever it may be that is preached to them, when they know there are several men of five hundred a year who do not believe it.

ON TRUE DISTINCTION

(The Tatler, No. 69, September 17, 1709)

. . . *Quid oportet
Nos facere, a vulgo longe lateque remotos?*
HOR. 1 Sat. vi, 17.

*But how shall we, who differ far and wide,
From the mere vulgar, this great point decide.*
FRANCIS.

It is, as far as it relates to our present being, the great end of education to raise ourselves above the vulgar; but what is intended by the vulgar, is not, methinks, enough understood. In me, indeed, that word raises a quite different idea from what it usually does in others; but perhaps that proceeds from my being old, and beginning to want the relish of such satisfactions as are the ordinary entertainment of men. However, such as my opinion is in this case, I will speak it; because it is possible that turn of thought may be received by others, who may reap as much satisfaction from it as I do myself.

It is to me a very great meanness, and something much below a philosopher, which is what I mean by a gentleman, to rank a man among the vulgar for the condition of life he is in, and not according to his behaviour, his thoughts, and sentiments, in that condition. For if a man be loaded with riches and honours, and in that state of life has thoughts and inclinations below the meanest artificer; is not such an artificer, who, within his power, is good to his friends, moderate in his demands for his labour, and cheerful in his occupation, very much superior to him who lives for no other end but to serve himself, and assumes a preference in all his words and actions to those who act their part with much more grace than himself? Epictetus has made use of the similitude of a stage-play to human life with much spirit. "It is not," says he, "to be considered among the actors, who is prince, or who is beggar, but who acts prince or beggar best."<sup>1</sup> The circumstance of life should not be that which gives us place, but our behaviour in that circumstance is what should be our solid distinction. Thus a wise man should think no man above him or below him, any further than it regards the outward order or discipline of the world: for, if we conceive too great an idea of the eminence of our superiors, or subordination of our inferiors, it will have an ill effect upon our behaviour to both. He who thinks no man above him but for his virtue, none below him but for his vice, can never be obsequious or assuming in a wrong place; but too frequently emulate men in rank below him, and pity those above him.

This sense of mankind<sup>2</sup> is so far from a leveling principle, that it only sets us upon a true basis of distinction, and doubles the merit of such as become their condition. A man in power, who can, without the ordinary prepossessions which stop the way to the true knowledge and service of mankind, overlook the little distinctions of fortune, raise obscure merit, and discountenance successful indolence, has, in the minds of knowing men, the figure of an angel rather than a man; and is above the rest of men in the highest character he can be, even that of their benefactor.

ON THE FUNERAL OF BETTERTON

Having received notice, that the famous actor, Mr. Betterton,<sup>1</sup> was to be interred this evening in the cloisters near Westminster-abbey, I was resolved to walk thither; and see the last office done to a man whom I had always very much admired, and from whose action I had received more strong impressions of what is great and noble in human nature, than from the arguments of the most solid philosophers, or the descriptions of the most charming poets I had ever read. As the rude and untaught multitude are no way wrought upon more effectually, than by seeing public punishments and executions; so men of letters and education feel their humanity most forcibly exercised, when they attend the obsequies of men who had arrived at any perfection in liberal accomplishments. Theatrical action is to be esteemed as such, except it be objected that we cannot call that an art which cannot be attained by art. Voice, stature, motion, and other gifts, must be very bountifully bestowed by nature, or labour and industry will but push the unhappy endeavourer in that way the further off his wishes.

Act well your part, there all the honour lies."

Such an actor as Mr. Betterton ought to be recorded with the same respect as Roscius<sup>2</sup> among the Romans. The greatest orator<sup>3</sup> has thought fit to quote his judgment, and celebrate his life. Roscius was the example to all that would form themselves into proper and winning behaviour. His action was so well adapted to the sentiments he expressed, that the youth of Rome thought they wanted<sup>4</sup> only to be virtuous, to be as graceful in their appearance as Roscius. The imagination took a lovely impression of what was great and good; and they, who never thought of setting up for the art of imitation, became themselves inimitable characters.

There is no human invention so aptly calculated for the forming a freeborn people as that of a theater. Tully<sup>5</sup> reports, that the celebrated player of whom I am speaking, used frequently to say, "The perfection of an actor is only to become what he is doing." Young men, who are too unattentive to receive lectures, are irresistibly taken with performances. Hence it is, that I extremely lament the little relish the gentry of this nation have, at present, for the just and noble representations in some of our tragedies. The operas, which are of late introduced,<sup>6</sup> can leave no trace behind them that can be of service beyond the present moment. To sing and to dance, are accomplishments very few have any thoughts of practising; but to speak justly, and move gracefully, is what every man thinks he does perform, or wishes he did.

I have hardly a notion, that any performer of antiquity could surpass the action of Mr. Betterton in any of the occasions in which he has appeared on our stage. The wonderful agony which he appeared in, when he examined the circumstance of the handkerchief in Othello; the mixture of love that intruded upon his mind, upon the innocent answers Desdemona makes, betrayed in his gesture such a variety and vicissitude of passions, as would admonish a man to be afraid of his own heart; and perfectly convince him, that it is to stab it, to admit that worst of daggers, jealousy. Whoever reads in his closet this admirable scene, will find that he cannot, except he has as warm an imagination as Shakespeare himself, find any but dry, incoherent, and broken sentences: but a reader that has seen Betterton act it, observes, there could not be a word added; that longer speeches had been unnatural, nay, impossible, in Othello's circumstances. The charming passage in the same tragedy, where he tells the manner of winning the affection of his mistress, was urged with so moving and graceful an energy, that, while I walked in the cloisters, I thought of him with the same concern as if I waited for the remains of a person who had in real life done all that I had seen him represent. The gloom of the place, and faint lights before the ceremony appeared, contributed to the melancholy disposition I was in; and I began to be extremely afflicted that Brutus and Cassius had any difference; that Hotspur's gallantry was so unfortunate; and that the mirth and good humour of Falstaff could not exempt him from the grave. Nay, this occasion, in me who look upon the distinctions amongst men to be merely scenical, raised reflections upon the emptiness of all human perfection and greatness in general; and I could not but regret, that the sacred heads which lie buried in the neighbourhood of this little portion of earth, in which my poor old friend is deposited, are returned to dust as well as he, and that there is no difference in the grave between the imaginary and the real monarch. This made me say of human life itself, with Macbeth,

DRYDEN.

There are those among mankind, who can enjoy no relish of their being, except the world is made acquainted with all that relates to them, and think everything lost that passes unobserved; but others find a solid delight in stealing by the crowd, and modelling their life after such a manner, as is as much above the approbation as the practice of the vulgar. Life being too short to give instances great enough of true friendship or good-will, some sages have thought it pious to preserve a certain reverence for the manes<sup>1</sup> of their deceased friends; and have withdrawn themselves from the rest of the world at certain seasons, to commemorate in their own thoughts such of their acquaintance who have gone before them out of this life. And indeed, when we are advanced in years, there is not a more pleasing entertainment, than to recollect in a gloomy moment the many we have parted with, that have been dear and agreeable to us, and to cast a melancholy thought or two after those, with whom, perhaps, we have indulged ourselves in whole nights of mirth and jollity. With such inclinations in my heart I went to my closet yesterday in the evening, and resolved to be sorrowful; upon which occasion I could not but look with disdain upon myself, that though all the reasons which I had to lament the loss of many of my friends are now as forcible as at the moment of their departure, yet did not my heart swell with the same sorrow which I felt at the time; but I could, without tears, reflect upon many pleasing adventures I have had with some, who have long been blended with common earth. Though it is by the benefit of nature, that length of time thus blots out the violence of afflictions; yet, with tempers too much given to pleasure, it is almost necessary to revive the old places of grief in our memory; and ponder step by step on past life, to lead the mind into that sobriety of thought which poises the heart, and makes it beat with due time, without being quickened with desire, or retarded with despair, from its proper and equal motion. When we wind up a clock that is out of order, to make it go well for the future, we do not immediately set the hand to the present instant, but we make it strike the round of all its hours, before it can recover the regularity of its time. Such, thought I, shall be my method this evening; and since it is that day of the year which I dedicate to the memory of such in another life as I much delighted in when living, an hour or two shall be sacred to sorrow and their memory, while I run over all the melancholy circumstances of this kind which have occurred to me in my whole life.

The first sense of sorrow I ever knew was upon the death of my father, at which time I was not quite five years of age; but was rather amazed at what all the house meant, than possessed with a real understanding why nobody was willing to play with me. I remember I went into the room where his body lay, and my mother sat weeping alone by it. I had my battledore in my hand, and fell a-beating the coffin, and calling Papa; for, I know not how, I had some slight idea that he was locked up there. My mother caught me in her arms, and, transported beyond all patience<sup>2</sup> of the silent grief she was before in, she almost smothered me in her embraces; and told me in a flood of tears, "Papa could not hear me, and would play with me no more, for they were going to put him under ground, whence he could never come to us again." She was a very beautiful woman, of a noble spirit, and there was a dignity in her grief amidst all the wildness of her transport; which, methought, struck me with an instinct of sorrow, that, before I was sensible of what it was to grieve, seized my very soul, and has made pity the weakness of my heart ever since. The mind in infancy is, methinks, like the body in embryo; and receives impressions so forcible, that they are as hard to be removed by reason, as any mark with which a child is born is to be taken away by any future application. Hence it is, that good-nature in me is no merit; but having been so frequently overwhelmed with her tears before I knew the cause of any affliction, or could draw defences from my own judgment, I imbibed commiseration, remorse, and an unmanly gentleness of mind, which has since insnared me into ten thousand calamities; and from whence I can reap no advantage, except it be, that, in such a humour as I am now in, I can the better indulge myself in the softness of humanity, and enjoy that sweet anxiety which arises from the memory of past afflictions.

We, that are very old, are better able to remember things which befel us in our distant youth, than the passages of later days. For this reason it is, that the companions of my strong and vigorous years present themselves more immediately to me in this office of sorrow. Untimely and unhappy deaths are what we are most apt to lament; so little are we able to make it indifferent when a thing happens, though we know it must happen. Thus we groan under life, and bewail those who are relieved from it. Every object that returns to our imagination raises different passions according to the circumstance of their departure. Who can have lived in an army, and in a serious hour reflect upon the many gay and agreeable men that might long have flourished in the arts of peace, and not join with the imprecations of the fatherless and widow on the tyrant to whose ambition they fell sacrifices? But gallant men, who are cut off by the sword, move rather our veneration than our pity; and we gather relief enough from their own contempt of death, to make that no evil, which was approached with so much cheerfulness, and attended with so much honour. But when we turn our thoughts from the great parts of life on such occasions, and instead of lamenting those who stood ready to give death to those from whom they had the fortune to receive it; I say, when we let our thoughts wander from such noble objects, and consider the havoc which is made among the tender and the innocent, pity enters with an unmixed softness, and possesses all our souls at once.

Here (were there words to express such sentiments with proper tenderness) I should record the beauty, innocence, and untimely death, of the first object my eyes ever beheld with love. The beauteous virgin! how ignorantly did she charm, how carelessly excel? Oh Death! thou hast right to the bold, to the ambitious, to the high, and to the haughty; but why this cruelty to the humble, to the meek, to the undiscerning, to the thoughtless? Nor age, nor business, nor distress, can erase the dear image from my imagination. In the same week, I saw her dressed for a ball, and in a shroud. How ill did the habit of death become the pretty trifler? I still behold the smiling earth—A large train of disasters were coming on to my memory, when my servant knocked at my closet-door, and interrupted me with a letter, attended with a hamper of wine, of the same sort with that which is to be put to sale on Thursday next, at Garraway's coffee-house.<sup>3</sup> Upon the receipt of it, I sent for three of my friends. We are so intimate, that we can be company in whatever state of mind we meet, and can entertain each other without expecting always to rejoice. The wine we found to be generous and warming, but with such a heat as moved us rather to be cheerful than frolicsome. It revived the spirits, without firing the blood. We commended it until two of the clock this morning; and having to-day met a little before dinner, we found, that though we drank two bottles a man, we had much more reason to recollect than forget what had passed the night before.

THE SPECTATOR CLUB

(From The Spectator, 1711-12)

Act Alii sex

Et plures uno conclamant ore.<sup>1</sup>

JUV.

Friday, March 2, 1711.

The first of our society is a gentleman of Worcestershire, of ancient descent, a baronet, his name Sir Roger de Coverley. His great-grandfather was inventor of that famous country-dance which is called after him. All who know that shire are very well acquainted with the parts and merits of Sir Roger. He is a gentleman that is very singular in his behaviour, but his singularities proceed from his good sense, and are contradictions to the manners of the world only as he thinks the world is in the wrong. However, this humour creates him no enemies, for he does nothing with sourness or obstinacy; and his being unconfined to modes and forms makes him but the readier and more capable to please and oblige all who know him. When he is in town, he lives in Soho Square. It is said he keeps himself a bachelor by reason he was crossed in love by a perverse beautiful widow of the next county to him. Before this disappointment Sir Roger was what you call a fine gentleman, had often supped with my Lord Rochester and Sir George Etheridge,<sup>2</sup> fought a duel upon his first coming to town, and kicked Bully Dawson<sup>3</sup> in a public coffee-house for calling him youngster. But being ill-used by the above mentioned widow, he was very serious for a year and a half; and though, his temper being naturally jovial, he at last got over it, he grew careless of himself, and never dressed afterward. He continues to wear a coat and doublet of the same cut that were in fashion at the time of his repulse, which, in his merry humours, he tells us, has been in and out twelve times since he first wore it. 'Tis said Sir Roger grew humble in his desires after he had forgot this cruel beauty. He is now in his fifty-sixth year, cheerful, gay, and hearty; keeps a good house both in town and country; a great lover of mankind; but there is such a mirthful cast in his behaviour that he is rather beloved than esteemed. His tenants grow rich, his servants look satisfied, all the young women profess love to him, and the young men are glad of his company. When he comes into a house, he calls the servants by their names, and talks all the way up-stairs to a visit. I must not omit that Sir Roger is a justice of the quorum<sup>4</sup> that he fills the chair at a quarter-session with great abilities, and three months ago gained universal applause by explaining a passage in the game act.

The gentleman next in esteem and authority among us is another bachelor, who is a member of the Inner Temple,<sup>5</sup> a man of great probity, wit, and understanding; but he has chosen his place of residence rather to obey the direction of an old humoursome father than in pursuit of his own inclinations. He was placed there to study the laws of the land, and is the most learned of any of the house in those of the stage. Aristotle and Longinus are much better understood by him than Littleton or Coke.<sup>6</sup> The father sends up every post questions relating to marriage articles, leases, and tenures in the neighbourhood, all which questions he agrees with an attorney to answer and take care of in the lump. He is studying the passions themselves when he should be inquiring into the debates among men which arise from them. He knows the argument of each of the orations of Demosthenes and Tully, but not one case in the reports of our own courts. No one ever took him for a fool; but none, except his intimate friends, know that he has a great deal of wit. This turn makes him at once both disinterested and agreeable; as few of his thoughts are drawn from business, they are most of them fit for conversation. His taste of books is a little too just for the age he lives in; he has read all, but approves of very few. His familiarity with the customs, manners, actions, and writings of the ancients makes him a very delicate observer of what occurs to him in the present world. He is an excellent critic, and the time of the play is his hour of business; exactly at five he passes through New Inn,<sup>7</sup> crosses through Russell Court, and takes a turn at Will's<sup>8</sup> till the play begins; he has his shoes rubbed and his perriwig powdered at the barber's as you go into the Rose.<sup>9</sup> It is for the good of the audience when he is at a play, for the actors have an ambition to please him.

<sup>4</sup> Sir Roger was not only a justice of the peace, or local magistrate, for his county, but he was one of those specially named in the commission authorizing the holding of the court. Magistrates so specially commissioned were called "justices of the quorum" from the words of the writ: Quorum aliquem vestrum unum esse volumus, etc.

The person of next consideration is Sir Andrew Freeport, a merchant of great eminence in the city of London, a person of indefatigable industry, strong reason, and great experience. His notions of trade are noble and generous, and (as every rich man has usually some sly way of jesting which would make no great figure were he not a rich man), he calls the sea the British Common. He is acquainted with commerce in all its parts, and will tell you that it is a stupid and barbarous way to extend dominion by arms; for true power is to be got by power and industry. He will often argue that if this part of our trade were well cultivated, we should gain from one nation; and if another, from another. I have heard him prove that diligence makes more lasting acquisitions than valour, and that sloth has ruined more nations than the sword. He abounds in several frugal maxims, among which the greatest favourite is, "A penny saved is a penny got." A general trader of good sense is pleasanter company than a general scholar; and Sir Andrew having a natural unaffected eloquence, the perspicuity of his discourse gives the same pleasure that wit would in another man. He has made his fortunes himself, and says that England may be richer than other kingdoms by as plain methods as he himself is richer than other men; though at the same time I can say this of him, that there is not a point in the compass but blows home a ship in which he is an owner.

Next to Sir Andrew in the club-room, sits Captain Sentry, a gentleman of great courage, good understanding, but invincible modesty. He is one of those that deserve very well, but are very awkward in putting their talents within the observation of such as should take notice of them. He was some years a captain, and behaved himself with great gallantry in several engagements and at several sieges; but, having a small estate of his own, and being next heir to Sir Roger, he has quitted a way of life in which no man can rise suitably to his merit, who is not something of a courtier as well as a soldier. I have heard him often lament that in a profession where merit is placed in so conspicuous a view, impudence should get the better of modesty. When he had talked to this purpose, I never heard him make a sour expression, but frankly confess he had left the world because he was not fit for it. A strict honesty, and an even, regular behaviour, are in themselves obstacles to him that must press through crowds who endeavour at the same end with himself, the favour of a commander. He will, however, in his way of talk excuse generals for not disposing according to men's desert or inquiring into it; "for," says he "that great man who has a mind to help me has as many to break through to come at me as I have to come at him." Therefore he will conclude that the man who would make a figure, especially in a military way, must get over all false modesty, and assist his patron against the importunity of other pretenders by a proper assurance in his own vindication. He says it is a civil cowardice to be backward in asserting what you ought to expect, as it is a military fear to be slow in attacking when it is your duty. With this candour does the gentleman speak of himself and others. The same frankness runs through all his conversation. The military part of his life has furnished him with many adventures, in the relation of which he is very agreeable to the company; for he is never overbearing, though accustomed to command men in the utmost degree below him; nor ever too obsequious, from a habit of obeying men highly above him.

But that our society may not appear a set of humourists unacquainted with the gallantries and pleasures of the age, we have among us the gallant Will Honeycomb, a gentleman who, according to his years, should be in the decline of his life; but, having been very careful

<sup>8</sup> Will's Coffee-House. There were two coffee-houses of this name, one frequented by members of the legal profession, the other (and the more celebrated one) the resort of the wits, on Russell Street. The Templar, who is represented as preferring literature to law, appears (from the hint Steele gives us of the locality) to have chosen the latter.

of his person, and always had a very easy fortune, time has made but very little impression, either by wrinkles on his forehead or traces in his brain. His person is well turned and of a good height. He is very ready at that sort of discourse with which men usually entertain women. He has all his life dressed very well, and remembers habits as others do men. He can smile when one speaks to him, and laughs easily. He knows the history of every mode, and can inform you from which of the French king's wenches our wives and daughters had this manner of curling their hair, and that way of placing their hoods, whose frailty was covered by such a sort of petticoat, and whose vanity to show her foot made that part of the dress so short in such a year. In a word, all his conversation and knowledge has been in the female world. As other men of his age will take notice to you what such a minister said upon such an occasion, he will tell you, when the Duke of Monmouth danced at court, such a woman was then smitten, another was taken with him at the head of his troop in the Park. In all these important relations he has ever about the same time received a kind glance or a blow of a fan from some celebrated beauty, mother of the present Lord Such-a-one. If you speak of a young commoner that said a lively thing in the House, he starts up: "He has good blood in his veins; Tom Mirabell begot him; the rogue cheated me in that affair; that young fellow's mother used me more like a dog than any woman I ever made advances to." This way of talking of his, very much enlivens the conversation among us of a more sedate turn, and I find that there is not one of the company but myself, who rarely speak at all, but speaks of him as of that sort of man who is usually called a well-bred, fine gentleman. To conclude his character, where women are not concerned, he is an honest, worthy man.

I cannot tell whether I am to account him whom I am next to speak of as one of our company, for he visits us but seldom; but when he does, it adds to every man else a new enjoyment of himself. He is a clergyman, a very philosophic man, of general learning, great sanctity of life, and the most exact good breeding. He has the misfortune to be of a very weak constitution, and consequently cannot accept of such cares and business as preferments in his function would oblige him to; he is therefore among divines what a chamber-counsellor is among lawyers. The probity of his mind and the integrity of his life create him followers as being eloquent or laud<sup>10</sup> advances others. He seldom introduces the subject he speaks upon; but we are so far gone in years that he observes, when he is among us, an earnestness to have him fall on some divine topic, which he always treats with much authority, as one who has no interest in this world, as one who is hastening to the object of all his wishes, and conceives hope from his decays and infirmities. These are my ordinary companions.

ON TESTIMONIALS

(The Spectator, No. 493, September 25, 1712)

*Qualem commendes etiam atque etiam adspice, ne

A rascal prais'd, you make his faults your own.*

ANON.

It is no unpleasant matter of speculation to consider the recommendatory epistles that pass round this town from hand to hand, and the abuse people put upon one another in that kind. It is indeed come to that pass, that, instead of being the testimony of merit in the person recommended, the true reading of a letter of this sort is, "The bearer hereof is so uneasy to me, that it will be an act of charity in you to take him off my hands; whether you prefer him or not, it is all one; for I have no manner of kindness for him, or obligation to him or his; and do what you please as to that." As negligent as men are in this respect, a point of honour is concerned in it; and there is nothing a man should be more ashamed of, than passing a worthless creature into the service or interests of a man who has never injured you. The women indeed are a little too keen in their resentments to trespass often this way; but you shall sometimes know, that the mistress and the maid shall quarrel, and give each other very free language, and at last the lady shall be pacified to turn her out of doors, and give her a very good word to any body else. Hence it is that you see, in a year and a half's time, the same face a domestic in all parts of the town. Good-breeding and good-nature lead people in a great measure to this injustice: when suitors of no consideration will have confidence enough to press upon their superiors, those in power are tender of speaking the exceptions they have against them, and are mortgaged into promises out of their impatience of importunity. In this latter case, it would be a very useful inquiry to know the history of recommendations. There are, you must know, certain abettors of this way of torment, who make it a profession to manage the affairs of candidates. These gentlemen let out their impudence to their clients, and supply any defective recommendation, by informing how such and such a man is to be attacked. They will tell you, get the least scrap from Mr. Such-a-one, and leave the rest to them. When one of these undertakers has your business in hand, you may be sick, absent in town or country, and the patron shall be worried, or you prevail. I remember to have been shown a gentleman some years ago, who punished a whole people for their facility in giving their credentials. This person had belonged to a regiment which did duty in the West Indies, and, by the mortality of the place, happened to be commanding-officer in the colony. He oppressed his subjects with great frankness, till he became sensible that he was heartily hated by every man under his command. When he had carried his point to be thus detestable, in a pretended fit of dis-humour, and feigned uneasiness of living where he found he was so universally unacceptable, he communicated to the chief inhabitants a design he had to return for England, provided they would give him ample testimonials of their approbation. The planters came into it to a man, and, in proportion to his deserving the quite contrary, the words justice, generosity, and courage, were inserted in his commission, not omitting the general good-liking of people of all conditions in the colony. The gentleman returns for England, and within a few months after came back to them their governor, on the strength of their own testimonials.

Such a rebuke as this cannot indeed happen to easy recommenders, in the ordinary course of things, from one hand to another; but how would a man bear to have it said to him, "The person I took into confidence on the credit you gave him, has proved false, unjust, and has not answered any way, the character you gave me of him?"

I cannot but conceive very good hopes of that rake Jack Toper of the Temple, for an honest scrupulousness in this point. A friend of his meeting with a servant that had formerly lived with Jack, and having a mind to take him, sent to him to know what faults the fellow had, since he could not please such a careless fellow as he was. His answer was as follows:—

"Sir,

"Thomas that lived with me was turned away because he was too good for me. You know I live in taverns; he is an orderly sober rascal, and thinks much to sleep in an entry until two in the morning. He told me one day, when he was dressing me, that he wondered I was not dead before now, since I went to dinner in the evening, and went to supper at two in the morning. We were coming down Essex-street one night a little flustered,<sup>1</sup> and I was giving him the word to alarm the watch;<sup>2</sup> he had the impudence to tell me it was against the law. You that are married, and live one day after another the same way, and so on the whole week, I dare say will like him, and he will be glad to have his meat in due season. The fellow is certainly very honest. My service to your lady. Yours,

"J. T."

Now this was very fair dealing. Jack knew very well, that though the love of order made a man very awkward in his equipage, it was a valuable quality among the queer people who live by rule; and had too much good sense and good-nature to let the fellow starve, because he was not fit to attend his vivacities.

I shall end this discourse with a letter of recommendation from Horace to Claudius Nero.<sup>3</sup> You will see in that letter a slowness to ask a favour, a strong reason for being unable to deny his good word any longer, and that it is a service to the person to whom he recommends, to comply with what is asked: all which are necessary circumstances both in justice and good-breeding, if a man would ask so as to have reason to complain of a denial; and indeed a man should not in strictness ask otherwise. In hopes the authority of Horace, who perfectly understood how to live with great men, may have a good effect towards amending this facility in people of condition, and the confidence of those who apply to them without merit, I have translated the epistle.

TO CLAUDIUS NERO

"Sir,

"Septimius, who waits upon you with this, is very well acquainted with the place you are pleased to allow me in your friendship. For when he beseeches me to recommend him to your notice, in such a manner as to be received by you, who are delicate in the choice of your friends and domestics, he knows our intimacy, and understands my ability to serve him better than I do myself. I have defended myself against his ambition to be yours, as long as I possibly could; but fearing the imputation of hiding my power in you out of mean and selfish considerations, I am at last prevailed upon to give you this trouble. Thus to avoid the appearance of a greater fault, I have put on this confidence. If you can forgive this transgression of modesty in behalf of a friend, receive this gentleman into your interests and friendship, and take it from me that he is an honest and a brave man."

FROM REFLECTIONS UPON EXILE

(1716)

Dissipation of mind, and length of time, are the remedies to which the greatest part of mankind trust in their afflictions. But the first of these works a temporary, the second a slow, effect: and both are unworthy of a wise man. Are we to fly from ourselves that we may fly from our misfortunes, and fondly to imagine that the disease is cured, because we find means to get some moments of respite from pain? Or shall we expect from time, the physician of brutes, a lingering and uncertain deliverance? Shall we wait to be happy till we can forget that we are miserable, and owe to the weakness of our faculties a tranquillity which ought to be the effect of their strength? Far otherwise. Let us set all our past and our present afflictions at once before our eyes. Let us resolve to overcome them, instead of flying from them, or wearing out the sense of them by long and ignominious patience. Instead of palliating remedies, let us use the incision-knife and the caustic, search the wound to the bottom, and work an immediate and radical cure.

The recalling of former misfortunes serves to fortify the mind against latter. He must blush to sink under the anguish of one wound, who surveys a body seamed over with the scars of many, and who has come victorious out of 50 all the conflicts wherein he received them. Let sighs and tears, and fainting under the lightest strokes of adverse fortune, be the portion of those unhappy people whose tender minds a long course of felicity has enervated: while such, as have passed through years of calamity, bear up, with a noble and immovable constancy, against the heaviest. Uninterrupted misery has this good effect, as it continually torments, it finally hardens.

Such is the language of philosophy: and happy is the man who acquires the right of holding it. But this right is not to be acquired by pathetic discourse. Our conduct can alone give it us; and therefore, instead of presuming on our strength, the surest method is to confess our weakness, and, without loss of time, to apply ourselves to the study of wisdom. This was the advice which the oracle gave to Zeno,<sup>2</sup> and there is no other way of securing our tranquillity amidst all the accidents to which human life is exposed. Philosophy has, I know, her Thrasos,<sup>3</sup> as well as war: and among her sons many there have been, who, while they aimed at being more than men, became something less. The means of preventing this danger are easy and sure. It is a good rule to examine well before we addict ourselves to any sect: but I think it is a better rule, to addict ourselves to none. Let us hear them all, with a perfect indifferency, on which side the truth lies: and, when we come to determine, let nothing appear so venerable to us as our own understandings. Let us gratefully accept the help of every one who has endeavoured to correct the vices, and strengthen the minds of men; but let us choose for ourselves, and yield universal assent to none. Thus, that I may instance the sect already mentioned, when we have laid aside the wonderful and surprising sentences, and all the paradoxes of the Portique,<sup>4</sup> we shall find in that school such doctrines as our unprejudiced reason submits to with pleasure, as nature dictates, and as experience confirms. Without this precaution, we run the risk of becoming imaginary kings, <sup>2</sup> A Greek stoic philosopher of the third century. Upon Zeno's consulting the oracle, what course was fittest for a man to take that intended to regulate and govern his life after the best manner? The Deity returned for answer that he should keep consorship with the dead. Upon which he fell to reading the lives of the ancients. "Life of Zeno," in Diogenes Laertius' Lives of the Philosophers.

<sup>4</sup> i. e., the Portico, or the Porch. The school of philosophy founded by Zeno of Cyprus, was called Stoic, from the Greek word Stoa, a porch, because Zeno taught in a famous portico in Athens, known as the "Painted Porch," or "the Porch." Hence paradoxes of the Portique=paradoxes of the stoics, or of the philosophers of the Porch.

<sup>1</sup> Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, wit, politician, and philosopher, the friend of Pope, the political ally of Swift, and the political antagonist of Walpole, was one of the most brilliant figures in the England of Queen Anne. Shortly before the Queen's death, he was prominent in an intrigue to secure the succession of the Stuarts, and after the triumph of the house of Hanover, in 1715, he was compelled to take refuge in France. It was during this enforced residence abroad, after the collapse of his political schemes that, endeavoring, or perhaps affecting to console himself with philosophy, he wrote his Reflections Upon Exile.

and real slaves. With it we may learn to assert our native freedom, and live independent on fortune.

In order to which great end, it is necessary that we stand watchful, as sentinels, to discover the secret wiles and open attacks of this capricious goddess, before they reach us. Where she falls upon us unexpected, it is hard to resist; but those who wait for her, will repel her with ease. The sudden invasion of an enemy overthrows such as are not on their guard; but they who foresee the war, and prepare themselves for it before it breaks out, stand, without difficulty, the first and the fiercest onset. I learned this important lesson long ago, and never trusted to fortune even while she seemed to be at peace with me. The riches, the honours, the reputation, all the advantages which her treacherous indulgence poured upon me, I placed so, that she might snatch them away without giving me any disturbance. I kept a great interval between me and them. She took them, but she could not tear them from me. No man suffers by bad fortune, but he who has been deceived by good. If we grow fond of her gifts, fancy that they belong to us, and are perpetually to remain with us, if we lean upon them, and expect to be considered for them; we shall sink into all the bitterness of grief, as soon as these false and transitory benefits pass away, as soon as our vain and childish minds, unfraught with solid pleasures, become destitute even of those which are imaginary. But if we do not suffer ourselves to be transported by prosperity, neither shall we be reduced by adversity. Our souls will be of proof against the dangers of both these states: and, having explored our strength, we shall be sure of it; for in the midst of felicity, we shall have tried how we can bear misfortune.

It is much harder to examine and judge, than to take up opinions on trust; and therefore the far greatest part of the world borrow, from others, those which they entertain concerning all the affairs of life and death. Hence it proceeds that men are so unanimously eager in the pursuit of things, which, far from having any inherent real good, are vanished over with a specious and deceitful gloss, and contain nothing answerable to their appearances. Hence it proceeds, on the other hand, that, in those things which are called evils, there is nothing so hard and terrible as the general cry of the world threatens. The word exile comes indeed harsh to the ear, and strikes us like a melancholy and execrable sound, through a certain persuasion which men have habitually concurred in. Thus the multitude has ordained. But the greatest part of their ordinances are abrogated by the wise.

Rejecting therefore the judgment of those who determine according to popular opinions, and the first appearances of things, let us examine what exile really is. It is then, a change of place; and, lest you should say that I diminish the object, and conceal the most shocking parts of it, I add, that this change of place is frequently accompanied by some or all of the following inconveniences: by the loss of the estate which we enjoyed, and the rank which we held; by the loss of that consideration and power which we were in possession of; by a separation from our family and our friends; by the contempt which we may fall into; by the ignominy with which those who have driven us abroad, will endeavour to sully the innocence of our characters, and to justify the injustice of their own conduct. . . .

Banishment, with all its train of evils, is so far from being the cause of contempt, that he who bears up with an undaunted spirit against them, while so many are dejected by them, erects on his very misfortunes a trophy to his honour: for such is the frame and temper of our minds, that nothing strikes us with greater admiration than a man intrepid in the midst of misfortunes. Of all ignominies an ignominious death must be allowed to be the greatest; and yet where is the blasphemer who will presume to defame the death of Socrates? This saint entered the prison with the same countenance with which he reduced thirty tyrants, and he took off ignominy from the place: for how could it be deemed a prison when Socrates was there? Phocion<sup>5</sup> was led to execution in the same city. All those who met the sad procession, cast their eyes to the ground, and with throbbing hearts bewailed, not the innocent man, but Justice herself, who was in him condemned. Yet there was a wretch found, for monsters are sometimes produced in contradiction to the ordinary rules of nature, who spit in his face as he passed along. Phocion wiped his cheek, smiled, turned to the magistrate, and said, "Admonish this man not to be so nasty for the future."

Ignominy then can take no hold on virtue; for virtue is in every condition the same, and challenges the same respect. We applaud the world when she prospers; and when she falls into adversity we applaud her. Like the temples of the gods, she is venerable even in her ruins. After this must it not appear a degree of madness to defer one moment acquiring the only arms capable of defending us against attacks which at every moment we are exposed to? Our being miserable, or not miserable, when we fall into misfortunes, depends on the manner in which we have enjoyed prosperity. If we have applied ourselves betimes to the study of wisdom, and to the practice of virtue, these evils become indifferent; but if we have neglected to do so, they become necessary. In one case they are evils, in the other they are remedies for greater evils than themselves. Zeno<sup>6</sup> rejoiced that a shipwreck had thrown him on the Athenian coast: and he owed to the loss of his fortune the acquisition which he made of virtue, of wisdom, of immortality. There are good and bad airs for the mind, as well as for the body. Prosperity often irritates our chonical distempers, and leaves no hopes of finding any specific but in adversity. In such cases banishment is like change of air, and the evils we suffer are like rough medicines applied to inveterate diseases. What Anacharsis<sup>7</sup> said of the vine, may aptly enough be said of prosperity. She bears the three grapes of drunkenness, of pleasure, and of sorrow: and happy it is if the last can cure the mischief which the former work. When afflictions fail to have their due effect, the case is desperate. They are the last remedy which indulgent Providence uses: and if they fail, we must languish and die in misery and contempt. Vain men! how seldom do we know what to wish or to pray for? When we pray against misfortunes, and when we fear them most, we want them most. It was for this reason that Pythagoras forbid his disciples to ask anything in particular of God. The shortest and the best prayer which we can address to him, who knows our wants, and our ignorance in asking,<sup>8</sup> is this: "Thy will be done."

Tully<sup>9</sup> says, in some part of his works, that as happiness is the object of all philosophy, so the disputes among philosophers arise from their different notions of the sovereign good. Reconcile them in that point, you reconcile them in the rest. The school of Zeno placed this sovereign good in naked virtue, and wound the principle up to an extreme beyond the pitch of nature and truth. A spirit of opposition to another doctrine, which grew into great vogue while Zeno flourished, might occasion this excess. Epicurus<sup>10</sup> placed the sovereign good in pleasure. His terms were wilfully, or accidentally mistaken. His scholars might help to pervert his doctrine, but rivalry enflamed the dispute; for in truth there is not so much difference between stoicism reduced to reasonable intelligible terms, and genuine orthodox epicurism, as is imagined. The felicis animi immota tranquillitas,<sup>11</sup> and the voluptas of the latter, are near enough a-kin: and I much doubt whether the firmest hero of the Portique would have borne a fit of the stone, on the principles of Zeno, with greater magnanimity and patience than Epicurus did on those of his own philosophy. However, Aristotle took a middle way, or explained himself better, and placed happiness in the joint advantages of the mind, of the body, and of fortune. They are reasonably joined; but certain it is, that they must not be placed on an equal foot. We can much better bear the privation of the last, than of the others; and poverty itself, which mankind is so afraid of, per mare pauperiem fugiens, per saxa, per ignes,<sup>12</sup> is surely preferable to madness, or the stone, though Chrysippus<sup>13</sup> thought it better to live mad, than not to live! If banishment therefore, by taking from us the advantages of fortune, cannot take from us the more valuable advantages of the mind and the body, when we have them; and if the same accident is able to restore them to us, when we have lost them, banishment is a very slight misfortune to those who are already under the dominion of reason, and a very great blessing to those who are still plunged in vices which ruin the health both of body and mind. It is to be wished for, in favour of such as these, and to be feared by none. If we are in this case, let us second the designs of Providence in our favour, and make some amends for neglecting former opportunities by not letting slip the last. Si nolis sanus, curres hydropicus.<sup>14</sup> We may shorten the evils which we might have prevented, and as we get the better of our disorderly passions, and vicious habits, we shall feel our anxiety diminish in proportion. All the approaches to virtue are comfortable. With how much joy will the man, who improves his misfortunes in this manner, discover that those evils, which he attributed to his exile, sprung from his vanity and folly, and vanish with them! He will see that, in his former temper of mind, he resembled the effeminate prince<sup>15</sup> who could drink no water 10 but that of the river Choaspes; or the simple queen,<sup>16</sup> in one of the tragedies of Euripides, who complained bitterly, that she had not lighted the nuptial torch, and that the river Ismenus had not furnished the water at her son's wedding. Seeing his former state in this ridiculous light, he will labour on with pleasure towards another as contrary as possible to it; and when he arrives there, he will be convinced by the strongest of all proofs, his own experi- 20 ence, that he was unfortunate because he was vicious, not because he was banished.

If I was not afraid of being thought to refine too much, I would venture to put some advantages of fortune, which are due to exile, 25 into the scale against those which we lose by exile. If you are wise, your leisure will be worthily employed, and your retreat will add new lustre to your character. Imitate Thucydides in Thracia, or Xenophon in his little farm 30 at Scillus. In such a retreat you may sit down, like one of the inhabitants of Elis, who judged of the Olympic games, without taking any part in them. Far from the hurry of the world, and almost an unconcerned spectator 35 of what passes in it, having paid in a public life what you owed to the present age, pay in a private life what you owe to posterity. Write as you live, without passion; and build your reputation, as you build your happiness, on the foundations of truth. If you want the 40 talents, the inclination, or the necessary materials for such a work, fall not however into sloth. Endeavour to copy after the example of Scipio<sup>17</sup> at Linternum. Be able to say to 45 yourself,

Innocuas amo delicias doctamque quietem.<sup>18</sup>

<sup>15</sup> The water of the Choaspes "was so pure that the Persian kings used to carry it with them in silver vessels when on foreign expeditions." The allusion in the text seems to have been suggested by a passage in Plutarch's Morals, in which, after declaring that we should be thankful for those restrictions which we impose on ourselves, Plutarch adds—"yet we mock the Persian Kings, for that if it be true which is reported of them) they drink of all the water only of the river Choaspes," etc.

<sup>17</sup> Publius Cornelius Scipio, the conqueror of Hannibal, who gained the name of Africanus. In spite of his great services, he lost the popular favor, and was forced to retire to his country place at Linternum.

Rural amusements, and philosophical meditations, will make your hours glide smoothly on; and if the indulgence of Heaven has given you a friend like Lælius,<sup>19</sup> nothing is wanting 5 to make you completely happy.

These are some of those reflections which may serve to fortify the mind under banishment, and under the other misfortunes of life, which it is every man's interest to prepare for, because they are common to all men: I say, they are common to all men; because even they who escape them are equally exposed to them. The darts of adverse fortune are always levelled at our heads. Some reach us, some 15 graze against us, and fly to wound our neighbours. Let us therefore impose an equal temper on our minds, and pay without murmuring the tribute which we owe to humanity. The winter brings cold, and we must freeze. The summer returns with heat, and we must melt. The inclemency of the air disorders our health, and we must be sick. Here we are ex- 20 posed to wild beasts, and there to men more savage than the beasts; and if we escape the inconveniencies and dangers of the air and the earth, there are perils by water and perils by fire. This established course of things it is not in our power to change; but it is in our power to assume such a greatness of mind as becomes wise and virtuous men; as may enable us to encounter the accidents of life with fortitude, and to conform ourselves to the order of nature, who governs her great kingdom, the world, by continual mutations. Let us submit to this order, let us be persuaded that whatever does happen ought to happen, and never be so foolish as to expostulate with nature. The best resolution we can take is to suffer what we cannot alter, and to pursue, without repining, the road which Providence, who directs everything, has marked out to us: for it is not enough to follow; and he is but a bad soldier who sighs, and marches on with reluctance. We must receive the orders with spirit and cheerfulness, and not endeavour to sink out of the post which is assigned us in this beautiful disposition of things, whereof even our sufferings make a necessary part. Let us address ourselves to 50 God, who governs all, as Cleanthes<sup>20</sup> did in those admirable verses, which are going to lose part of their grace and energy in my translation of them.

<sup>19</sup> Gaius Lælius, whose wisdom gained for him the name of Sapius, a philosopher, orator, and lover of country life, and a close friend of Scipio Africanus, the younger. Lælius is given a prominent part in Cicero's dialogue on Friendship (De Amicitia).

<sup>20</sup> A Stoic philosopher; disciple and successor of Zeno. His Hymn to Jupiter is all that remains of his numerous works.

Parent of nature! master of the world!
 Where'er thy Providence directs, behold
 My steps with cheerful resignation turn.
 Fate leads the willing, drags the backward on.
 Why should I grieve, when grieving I must bear?
 Or take with guilt, what guiltless I might share?

Thus let us speak, and thus let us act. Resignation to the will of God is true magnanimity. But the sure mark of a pusillanimous and base spirit, is to struggle against, to censure the order of Providence, and instead of mending our own conduct, to set up for correcting that of our Maker.

A NIGHT-PIECE ON DEATH (Published, 1721)

By the blue taper's trembling light,
 No more I waste the wakeful night,
 Intent with endless view to pore
 The schoolmen and the sages o'er:
 Their books from wisdom widely stray,
 Or point at best the longest way.
 I'll seek a readier path, and go
 Where wisdom's surely taught below.

How deep yon azure dyes the sky,
 Where orbs of gold unnumber'd lie,
 While through their ranks in silver pride
 The nether crescent seems to glide!
 The slumbering breeze forgets to breathe,
 The lake is smooth and clear beneath,
 Where once again the spangled show
 Descends to meet our eyes below.
 The grounds which on the right aspire,
 In dimness from the view retire:
 The left presents a place of graves,
 Whose wall the silent water laves.
 That steeple guides thy doubtful sight
 Among the livid gleams of night.
 There pass, with melancholy state,
 By all the solemn heaps of fate,
 And think, as softly-sad you tread
 Above the venerable dead,
 "Time was, like thee they life possest,
 And time shall be, that thou shalt rest."

Those graves, with bending osier bound,
 That nameless heave the crumbled ground,
 Quick to the glancing thought disclose,
 Where toil and poverty repose.
 The flat smooth stones that bear a name,
 The chisel's slender help to fame,
 (Which ere our set of friends decay
 Their frequent steps may wear away),
 A middle race of mortals own,
 Men, half ambitious, all unknown.

The marble tombs that rise on high,
 Whose dead in vaulted arches lie,
 Whose pillars swell with sculptur'd stones,
 Arms, angels, epitaphs, and bones.
 These, all the poor remains of state,
 Adorn the rich, or praise the great;
 Who while on earth in fame they live,
 Are senseless of the fame they give.

Hah! while I gaze, pale Cynthia fades,
 The bursting earth unveils the shades!
 All slow, and wan, and wrapp'd with shrouds,
 They rise in visionary crowds,
 And all with sober accent cry,
 "Think, mortal, what it is to die."

Now from yon black and funeral yew,
 That bathes the charnel-house with dew,
 Methinks I hear a voice begin;
 (Ye ravens, cease your croaking din,
 Ye tolling clocks, no time resound
 O'er the long lake and midnight ground!)
 It sends a peal of hollow groans,
 Thus speaking from among the bones.

"When men my scythe and darts supply,
 How great a king of fears am I!
 They view me like the last of things:
 They make, and then they dread, my stings.
 Fools! If you less provok'd your fears,
 No more my spectre form appears.
 Death's but a path that must be trod,
 If man would ever pass to God;
 A port of calms, a state of ease
 From the rough rage of swelling seas.

"Why then thy flowing sable stoles,
 Deep pendant cypress, mourning poles,
 Loose scarfs to fall athwart thy weeds,
 Long palls, drawn hearses, cover'd steeds,
 And plumes of black, that, as they tread,
 Nod o'er the scutcheons of the dead?"

"Nor can the parted body know,
 Nor wants the soul, these forms of woe.
 As men who long in prison dwell,
 With lamps that glimmer round the cell,
 Whene'er their suffering years are run,
 Spring forth to greet the glittering sun:
 Such joy, though far transcending sense,
 Have pious souls at parting hence.
 On earth, and in the body plac'd,
 A few and evil years they waste;
 But when their chains are cast aside,
 See the glad scene unfolding wide,
 Clap the glad wing, and tower away,
 And mingle with the blaze of day."

A HYMN TO CONTENTMENT (Published, 1721)

Lovely, lasting peace of mind!
 Sweet delight of human kind!
 Heavenly-born, and bred on high,
 To crown the favorites of the sky

With more of happiness below,
Than victors in a triumph know!
Whither, O whither art thou fled,
To lay thy meek, contented head;
What happy region dost thou please
To make the seat of calms and ease!

Ambition searches all its sphere
Of pomp and state, to meet thee there.
Encreasing Avarice would find
Thy presence in its gold enshrin'd.
The bold adventurer ploughs his way
Through rocks amidst the foaming sea,
To gain thy love; and then perceives
Thou wert not in the rocks and waves.
The silent heart, which grief assails,
Treads soft and lonesome o'er the vales,
Sees daisies open, rivers run,
And seeks, as I have vainly done,
Amusing thought; but learns to know
That solitude's the nurse of woe.
No real happiness is found
In trailing purple o'er the ground;
Or in a soul exalted high,
To range the circuit of the sky,
Converse with stars above, and know
All nature in its forms below;
The rest it seeks, in seeking dies,
And doubts at last, for knowledge, rise.

Lovely, lasting peace, appear!
This world itself, if thou art here,
Is once again with Eden blest,
And man contains it in his breast.

'Twas thus, as under shade I stood,
I sung my wishes to the wood,
And lost in thought, no more perceiv'd
The branches whisper as they wav'd:
It seem'd, as all the quiet place
Confess'd the presence of the Grace.
When thus she spoke—"Go rule thy will,
Bid thy wild passions all be still,
Know God—and bring thy heart to know
The joys which from religion flow:
Then every Grace shall prove its guest,
And I'll be there to crown the guest."

Oh! by yonder mossy seat,
In my hours of sweet retreat,
Might I thus my soul employ,
With sense of gratitude and joy!
Rais'd as ancient prophets were,
In heavenly vision, praise, and prayer;
Pleasing all men, hurting none,
Pleas'd and bless'd with God alone:
Then while the gardens take my sight,
With all the colours of delight;
While silver waters glide along,
To please my ear, and court my song;
I'll lift my voice, and tune my string,
And thee, great source of nature, sing.

The sun that walks his airy way,
To light the world, and give the day;
The moon that shines with borrow'd light;
The stars that gild the gloomy night;
The seas that roll unnumber'd waves;
The wood that spreads its shady leaves;
The field whose ears conceal the grain,
The yellow treasure of the plain;
All of these, and all I see,
Should be sung, and sung by me:
They speak their maker as they can,
But want and ask the tongue of man.

Go search among your idle dreams,
Your busy or your vain extremes;
And find a life of equal bliss,
Or own the next begun in this.

A HYMN FOR MORNING

See, the star that leads the day,
Rising shoots a golden ray,
To make the shades of darkness go
From Heaven above and earth below,
And warn us early with the sight
To leave the beds of silent night,
From an heart sincere and sound,
From its very deepest ground,
Send devotion up on high,
Wing'd with heat, to reach the sky.
See the time for sleep has run,
Rise before or with the sun,
Lift thine hands, and humble pray
The Fountain of eternal day,
That as the light serenely fair
Illustrates all the tracts of air,
The sacred Spirit so may rest
With quickening beams upon thy breast,
And kindly clean it all within
From darker blemishes of sin,
And shine with grace, until we view
The realm it gilds with glory too.
See the day that dawns in air,
Brings along its toil and care,
From the lap of Night it springs
With heaps of business on its wings;
Prepare to meet them in a mind
That bows submissively resign'd,
That would to works appointed fall,
And knows that God has order'd all.
And whether with a small repast
We break the sober morning fast,
Or in our thoughts and houses lay
The future methods of the day,
Or early walk abroad to meet
Our business, with industrious feet,
Whate'er we think, whate'er we do,
His glory still be kept in view.
O Giver of eternal bliss!
Heavenly Father! grant me this,
Grant it all as well as me,
All whose hearts are fix'd on Thee,
Who revere thy Son above,
Who thy sacred Spirit love.

ON LIFE, DEATH AND IMMORTALITY

(From The Complaint; or Night Thoughts, 1742-1745)

Tir'd Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!
He, like the world, his ready visit pays
Where Fortune smiles; the wretched he forsakes:

Swift on his downy pinion flies from woe,
And lights on lids unsully'd with a tear. . . . 5

Night, sable goddess! from her ebon throne,
In rayless majesty, now stretches forth
Her leaden sceptre o'er a slumb'ring world.
Silence, how dead! and darkness, how profound!

Nor eye, nor list'ning ear, an object finds; 10
Creation sleeps. 'Tis as the gen'ral pulse
Of life stood still, and Nature made a pause;
An awful pause! prophetic of her end.
And let her prophecy be soon fulfill'd:

Fate! drop the curtain; I can lose no more. 15
Silence and Darkness! solemn sisters! twins
From ancient Night, who nurse the tender thought

To reason, and on reason build resolve,
(That column of true majesty in man),
Assist me: I will thank you in the grave; 20
The grave, your kingdom: there this frame shall fall

A victim sacred to your dreary shrine.
But what are ye?—

Thou who didst put to flight
Primeval silence, when the morning stars, 25
Exulting, shouted o'er the rising ball;
O Thou! whose word from solid darkness struck

That spark, the sun; strike wisdom from my soul;

My soul, which flies to Thee, her trust, her treasure,

As misers to their gold, while others rest. 30

Through this opaque of nature, and of soul,
This double night, transmit one pitying ray,
To lighten and to cheer. O lead my mind,
(A mind that fain would wander from its woe), Lead it through various scenes of life and death; 35

And from each scene, the noblest truths inspire.

Nor less inspire my conduct, than my song:
Teach my best reason, reason; my best will Teach rectitude; and fix my firm resolve
Wisdom to wed, and pay her long arrears; 40
Nor let the phial of thy vengeance, pour'd
On this devoted head, be pour'd in vain.

The bell strikes one. We take no note of time,
But from its loss. To give it then a tongue,
Is wise in man. As if an angel spoke, 45
I feel the solemn sound. If heard aright,

It is the knell of my departed hours:
Where are they; with the years beyond the flood.

It is the signal that demands dispatch.
How much is to be done? my hopes and fears 50
Start up alarm'd, and o'er life's narrow verge
Look down—on what? a fathomless abyss;
A dread eternity! how surely mine!
And can eternity belong to me,
Poor pensioner on the bounties of an hour? 55

How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
How complicate, how wonderful, is man!
How passing wonder HE, who made him such!
Who center'd in our make such strange extremes!

From different natures marvellously mix'd, 60
Connexion exquisite of distant worlds!
Distinguish'd link in being's endless chain!
Midway from nothing to the Deity!
A beam ethereal, sully'd, and absorpt!
Tho' sully'd and dishonour'd, still divine! 65

Dim miniature of greatness absolute!
An heir of glory! a frail child of dust!
Helpless immortal! insect infinite!
A worm! a god!—I tremble at myself,
And in myself am lost! At home a stranger, 70
Thought wanders up and down, surpriz'd,
aghast,

And wond'ring at her own: how reason reels!
O what a miracle to man is man!
Triumphantly distress'd! what joy, what dread!

Alternately transported, and alarm'd! 75
What can preserve my life? or what destroy?
An angel's arm can't snatch me from the grave;

Legions of angels can't confine me there. . . .

War, famine, pest, volcano, storm, and fire,
Intestine broils, oppression, with her heart 80
Wrapt up in triple brass, besiege mankind.
God's image, disinherited of day,
Here, plung'd in mines, forgets a sun was
made;

There, beings deathless as their haughty lord,
Are hammer'd to the galling oar for life; 85
And plough the winter's wave, and reap despair;
Some, for hard masters, broken under arms,
In battle lopt away with half their limbs,
Beg bitter bread through realms their valour
sav'd,

If so the tyrant, or his minion, doom. 90
Want, and incurable disease (fell pair!)
On hopeless multitudes remorseless seize
At once, and make a refuge of the grave.
How groaning hospitals eject their dead!
What numbers groan for sad admission there! 95
What numbers, once in Fortune's lap high-fed,
Solicit the cold hand of charity!

To shock us more, solicit it in vain!
Ye silken sons of pleasure! since in pains
You rue more modish visits, visit here, 100
And breathe from your debauch: give, and reduce

Surfeit's dominion o'er you: but, so great
Your impudence, you blush at what is right. . . .

By Nature's law, what may be, may be now;
 There's no prerogative in human hours. 105
 In human hearts what bolder thought can rise
 Than man's presumption on to-morrow's dawn?
 Where is to-morrow? In another world.
 For numbers this is certain; the reverse
 Is sure to none: and yet on this perhaps, 110
 This peradventure, infamous for lies,
 As on a rock of adamant, we build
 Our mountain hopes; spin our eternal schemes,
 As we the fatal sisters could out-spin,
 And, big with life's futurities, expire. 115

Not ev'n Philander had bespoke his shroud.
 Nor had he cause; a warning was deny'd,
 How many fall as sudden, not as safe!
 As sudden, though for years admonish'd, home.
 Of human ills, the last extreme beware; 120
 Beware, Lorenzo! a slow sudden death.
 How dreadful that deliberate surprise!
 Be wise to-day, 'tis madness to defer;
 Next day the fatal precedent will plead;
 Thus on, till wisdom is push'd out of life. 125
 Procrastination is the thief of time;
 Year after year it steals, till all are fled,
 And to the mercies of a moment leaves
 The vast concerns of an eternal scene.
 If not so frequent, would not this be strange? 130
 That 'tis so frequent, this is stranger still.

Of man's miraculous mistakes, this bears
 The palm, "That all men are about to live,"
 For ever on the brink of being born.
 All pay themselves the compliment to think 135
 They, one day, shall not drivel; and their pride
 On this reversion takes up ready praise;
 At least, their own, their future selves applauds.
 How excellent that life they ne'er will lead!
 Time lodg'd in their own hands is Folly's vails; 140
 That lodg'd in Fate's, to wisdom they consign;
 The thing they can't but purpose, they postpone;
 'Tis not in Folly, not to scorn a fool;
 And scarce in human wisdom to do more.
 All promise is poor dilatory man, 145
 And that thro' every stage; when young, indeed,
 In full content we sometimes nobly rest,
 Unanxious for ourselves; and only wish
 As duteous sons, our fathers were more wise:
 At thirty, man suspects himself a fool; 150
 Knows it at forty, and reforms his plan;
 At fifty, chides his infamous delay,
 Pushes his prudent purpose to resolve;
 In all the magnanimity of thought
 Resolves, and re-resolves; then dies the same.

And why? because he thinks himself immortal. 156
 All men think all men mortal, but themselves;
 Themselves, when some alarming shock of Fate Strikes through their wounded hearts the sudden dread;

But their hearts wounded, like the wounded
 air, 160
 Soon close; where pass'd the shaft, no trace is found.

As from the wing no scar the sky retains;
 The parted wave no furrow from the keel;
 So dies in human hearts the thought of death.
 Ev'n with the tender tear which Nature sheds
 O'er those we love, we drop it in their grave. 166

VERSES ON THE PROSPECT OF PLANT- ING ARTS AND LEARNING IN AMERICA

The Muse, disgusted at an age and clime,
 Barren of every glorious theme,
 In distant lands now waits a better time,
 Producing subjects worthy fame:

In happy climes, where from the genial sun 5
 And virgin earth such scenes ensue,
 The force of art by nature seems outdone,
 And fancied beauties by the true:

In happy climes, the seat of innocence,
 Where nature guides, and virtue rules, 10
 Where men shall not impose for truth and sense
 The pedantry of courts and schools:

There shall be sung another golden age,
 The rise of empire and of arts,
 The good and great inspiring epic rage, 15
 The wisest heads and noblest hearts.

Not such as Europe breeds in her decay;
 Such as she bred when fresh and young,
 When heavenly flame did animate her clay,
 By future poets shall be sung. 20

Westward the course of empire takes its way;
 The four first acts already past,
 A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
 Time's noblest offspring is the last.

AN ODE TO PH—1

(1721)

Look up to Pentland's tow'ring top,
 Buried beneath great wreaths of snaw,
 O'er ilka cleugh,<sup>2</sup> ilk scar,<sup>3</sup> and slap,<sup>4</sup>
 As high as any Roman wa'.<sup>5</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Gorge, or ravine. <sup>3</sup> A cliff. <sup>4</sup> Wall.
<sup>5</sup> A narrow pass between hills.

Driving their baws<sup>6</sup> frae whins<sup>7</sup> or tee, 5
 There's no nae gowfers<sup>8</sup> to be seen,
 Nor douffer fowk wysing a-jee<sup>9</sup>
 The byast boulds<sup>10</sup> on Tamson's green.

Then fling on coals, and ripe the ribs,<sup>11</sup>
 And beek<sup>12</sup> the house baith but and ben; 10
 That mutchkin<sup>13</sup> stoup it hauds but dribs,<sup>14</sup>
 Then let's get in the tappit hen.<sup>15</sup>

Good claret best keeps out the cauld,
 And drives away the winter soon;
 It makes a man baith gash<sup>16</sup> and bauld, 15
 And heaves his saul beyond the moon. . . .

Be sure ye dinna quat<sup>17</sup> the grip
 Of ilka joy when ye are young,
 Before auld age your vitals nip,
 And lay ye twafold o'er a rung.<sup>18</sup> 20

SONG "MY PEGGY IS A YOUNG THING"

(From The Gentle Shepherd, 1725)

My Peggy is a young thing,
 Just enter'd in her teens,
 Fair as the day and sweet as May,
 Fair as the day and always gay.
 My Peggy is a young thing, 5
 And I'm nae very auld,
 Yet well I like to meet her at
 The wauking of the fauld.<sup>1</sup>

My Peggy speaks sae sweetly,
 Whene'er we meet alane, 10
 I wish nae mair to lay my care,—
 I wish nae mair o' a' that's rare.
 My Peggy speaks sae sweetly,
 To a' the lave<sup>2</sup> I'm cauld,
 But she gars<sup>3</sup> a' my spirits glow,
 At wauking o' the fauld. 15

My Peggy smiles sae kindly,
 Whene'er I whisper love,
 That I look down on a' the town,—
 That I look down upon a crown. 20
 My Peggy smiles sae kindly,
 It makes me blithe and bauld,
 And naething gies me sic delyte,
 As wauking o' the fauld.

My Peggy sings sae saftly,
 When on my pipe I play,
 By a' the rest it is confest,—
 By a' the rest that she sings best.
 My Peggy sings sae saftly,
 And in her sangs are tauld, 30
 Wi' innocence, the wale<sup>4</sup> o' sense,
 At wauking o' the fauld.

<sup>6</sup> Balls. <sup>7</sup> Furze bushes. <sup>8</sup> Golfers.
<sup>9</sup> More sober or sedate folk, directing or sending to one side.

<sup>12</sup> Warm the house, both outer and inner room.

FIELD-SPORTS

(From The Chase, Pub. 1742)

'Tis instinct that directs the jealous hare
 To choose her soft abode: With step revers'd
 She forms the doubling maze: then, ere the morn
 Peeps through the clouds, leaps to her close recess.

As wandering shepherds on th' Arabian plains 5

No settled residence observe, but shift
 Their moving camp, now on some cooler hill
 With cedars crown'd, court the refreshing breeze;

And then, below, where trickling streams distil
 From some penurious source, their thirst allay, 10

And feed their fainting flocks: so the wise hares
 Oft quit their seats, lest some more curious eye
 Should mark their haunts, and by dark treacherous wiles,

Plot their destruction; or perchance in hopes
 Of plenteous forage, near the ranker mead, 15
 Or matted blade, wary and close they sit.

When spring shines forth, season of love and
 joy,

In the moist marsh, 'mong beds of rushes hid,
 They cool their boiling blood: When summer
 suns

Bake the cleft earth, to thick wide waving fields 20

Of corn full grown they lead their helpless
 young:

But when autumnal torrents and fierce rains
 Deluge the vale, in the dry crumbling bank
 Their forms they delve, and cautiously avoid
 The dripping covert: Yet when winter's cold 25
 Their limbs benumbs, thither with speed re-turn'd

In the long grass they skulk, or shrinking creep
 Among the wither'd leaves; thus changing still,
 As fancy prompts them, or as food invites.

But every season carefully observ'd, 30
 Th' inconstant winds, the fickle element,

The wise experienc'd huntsman soon may find
 His subtle, various game, nor waste in vain

His tedious hours, till his impatient hounds,
 With disappointment vex'd, each springing lark 35

Babbling pursue, far scatter'd o'er the fields.
 Now golden Autumn from her open lap
 Her fragrant bounties showers; the fields are shorn;

Inwardly smiling, the proud farmer views
 The rising pyramids that grace his yard, 40
 And counts his large increase; his barns are stor'd

And groaning staddles<sup>1</sup> bend beneath their load.
 All now is free as air, and the gay pack

In the rough bristly stubbles range unblam'd;
 In the rough bristly stubbles range unblam'd;

<sup>1</sup> Props.

No widow's tears o'erflow, no secret curse 45
 Swells in the farmer's breast, which his pale lips
 Trembling conceal, by his fierce landlord aw'd:
 But courteous now he levels every fence,
 Joins in the common cry, and halloos loud, Charm'd with the rattling thunder of the field. 50

Oh bear me, some kind power invisible!
 To that extended lawn, where the gay court
 View the swift racers, stretching to the goal;
 Games more renown'd, and a far nobler train,
 Than proud Elean fields<sup>2</sup> could boast of old. 55
 Oh! were a Theban lyre not wanting here,
 And Pindar's voice, to do their merit right!
 Or to those spacious plains, where the strain'd
 eye

In the wide prospect lost, beholds at last Sarum's<sup>3</sup> proud spire, that o'er the hills ascends, 60
 And pierces through the clouds. Or to thy downs,
 Fair Cotswold, where the well-breath'd beagle climbs

With matchless speed, thy green aspiring brow,
 And leaves the lagging multitude behind.

ADDRESS TO THE AUTHOR'S ELBOW CHAIR NEW-CLOTHED

My dear companion, and my faithful friend!
 If Orpheus taught the listening oaks to bend;
 If stones and rubbish, at Amphion's call,
 Dane'd into form, and built the Theban wall;
 Why shouldst not thou attend my humble
 lays, 5
 And hear my grateful harp resound thy praise?
 True, thou art spruce and fine, a very beau;
 But what are trappings and external show?
 To real worth alone I make my court, Knaves are my scorn, and coxcombs are my sport. 10

Once I beheld thee far less trim and gay;
 Ragged, disjointed, and to worms a prey;
 The safe retreat of every lurking mouse;
 Derided, shunn'd; the lumber of my house!
 Thy robe how chang'd from what it was before! 15

Thy velvet robe, which pleas'd my sires of yore!
 'Tis thus capricious fortune wheels us round;
 Aloft we mount—then tumble to the ground.
 Yet grateful then, my constancy I prov'd;
 I knew thy worth; my friend in rags I lov'd; 20
 I lov'd thee more; nor like a courtier, spurn'd
 My benefactor, when the tide was turn'd.

With conscious shame, yet frankly, I confess,
 That in my youthful days—I lov'd thee less.
 Where vanity, where pleasure call'd, I stray'd;
 And every wayward appetite obey'd. 26

But sage experience taught me how to prize
 Myself; and how, this world; she bade me rise
 To nobler flights regardless of a race
 Of factious emmets; pointed where to place 30

My bliss, and lodg'd me in thy soft embrace.

Here on thy yielding down I sit secure;
 And, patiently, what Heaven has sent endure;
 From all the futile cares of business free;
 Not fond of life, but yet content to be: 35
 Here mark the fleeting hours; regret the past;
 And seriously prepare to meet the last.

So safe on shore the pension'd sailor lies;
 And all the malice of the storm defies:
 With ease of body blest, and peace of mind,
 Pities the restless crew he left behind; 41
 Whilst, in his cell, he meditates alone
 On his great voyage, to the world unknown.

(1727)

Silent Nymph, with curious eye!
 Who, the purple ev'ning, lie
 On the mountain's lonely van,
 Beyond the noise of busy man,
 Painting fair the form of things, 5
 While the yellow linnet sings,
 Or the tuneful nightingale
 Charms the forest with her tale;
 Come, with all thy various dues,
 Come, and aid thy sister Muse; 10
 Now while Phœbus, riding high,
 Gives lustre to the land and sky,
 Grongar Hill invites my song;
 Draw the landscape bright and strong;
 Grongar, in whose mossy cells, 15
 Sweetly musing Quiet dwells;
 Grongar, in whose silent shade,
 For the modest Muses made,
 So oft I have, the ev'ning still,
 At the fountain of a rill 20
 Sat upon a flow'ry bed,
 With my hand beneath my head,
 While stray'd my eyes o'er Towry's flood,
 Over mead and over wood,
 From house to house, from hill to hill, 25
 Till Contemplation had her fill.

About his chequer'd sides I wind,
 And leave his brooks and meads behind,
 And groves and grottoes where I lay,
 And vistles shooting beams of day. 30
 Wide and wider spreads the vale,
 As circles on a smooth canal:
 The mountains round, unhappy fate!
 Sooner or later, of all height,
 Withdraw their summits from the skies, 35
 And lessen as the others rise:
 Still the prospect wider spreads,
 Adds a thousand woods and meads;
 Still it widens, widens still,
 And sinks the newly-risen hill. 40

Now I gain the mountain's brow,
 What a landscape lies below!
 No clouds, no vapours intervene;
 But the gay, the open scene,

<sup>2</sup> The Olympic games were held on a site which had belonged to the Eleans, the inhabitants of Elis, Greece.

Does the face of Nature show, 45
In all the hues of heaven's bow,
And, swelling to embrace the light,
Spreads around beneath the sight.

Old castles on the cliffs arise,
Proudly tow'ring in the skies; 50
Rushing from the woods, the spires
Seem from hence ascending fires;
Half his beams Apollo sheds
On the yellow mountain-heads,
Gilds the fleeces of the flocks, 55
And glitters on the broken rocks.

Below me trees unnumber'd rise,
Beautiful in various dyes;
The gloomy pine, the poplar blue,
The yellow beech, the sable-yew, 60
The slender fir, that taper grows,
The sturdy oak with broad-spread boughs,
And beyond the purple grove,
Haunt of Phyllis, queen of love!

Gaudy as the op'ning dawn, 65
Lies a long and level lawn,
On which a dark hill, steep and high,
Holds and charms the wand'ring eye:
Deep are his feet in Towy's flood,
His sides are cloth'd with waving wood, 70
And ancient towers crown his brow,
That cast an awful look below;
Whose ragged walls the ivy creeps,
And with her arms from falling keeps;

So both a safety from the wind 75
On mutual dependence find.
'Tis now the raven's bleak abode;
'Tis now th' apartment of the toad;
And there the fox securely feeds,
And there the poisonous adder breeds, 80
Conceal'd in ruins, moss, and weeds;
While, ever and anon, there falls
Huge heaps of hoary moulder'd walls.
Yet Time has seen, that lifts the low,
And level lays the lofty brow, 85
Has seen this broken pile compleat,
Big with the vanity of state:
But transient is the smile of Fate!

A little rule, a little sway,
A sunbeam in a winter's day, 90
Is all the proud and mighty have
Between the cradle and the grave.

And see the rivers how they run
Thro' woods and meads, in shade and sun!
Sometimes swift and sometimes slow, 95
Wave succeeding wave, they go
A various journey to the deep,
Like human life, to endless sleep:
Thus is Nature's vesture wrought,
To instruct our wand'ring thought; 100
Thus she dresses green and gay,
To disperse our cares away.

Ever charming, ever new,
When will the landscape tire the view! 105
The fountain's fall, the river's flow,
The woody valleys warm and low;
The windy summit, wild and high,
Roughly rushing on the sky!
The pleasant seat, the ruin'd tow'r,
The naked rock, the shady bow'r; 110

The town and village, dome and farm,
Each gives each a double charm,
As pearls upon an Ethiop's arm.

See on the mountain's southern side, 115
Where the prospect opens wide,
Where the ev'ning gilds the tide,
How close and small the hedges lie!
What streaks of meadows cross the eye!
A step, methinks, may pass the stream,

So little distant dangers seem; 120
So we mistake the future's face,
Ey'd through Hope's deluding glass;
As yon summits soft and fair,
Clad in colours of the air,
Which, to those who journey near, 125
Barren, brown, and rough appear.
Still we tread the same coarse way;
The present's still a cloudy day.

O may I with myself agree, 130
And never covet what I see;
Content me with an humble shade,
My passions tam'd, my wishes laid;
For while our wishes wildly roll,
We banish quiet from the soul;
'Tis thus the busy beat the air, 135
And misers gather wealth and care.

Now, ev'n now, my joys run high,
As on the mountain-turf I lie;
While the wanton Zephyr sings,
And in the vale perfumes his wings; 140
While the waters murmur deep;
While the shepherd charms his sheep;
While the birds unbounded fly,
And with music fill the sky,

Now, ev'n now, my joys run high. 145
Be full, ye courts; be great who will;
Search for peace with all your skill;
Open wide the lofty door,
Seek her on the marble floor.
In vain you search, she is not there; 150
In vain ye search the domes of care!
Grass and flowers quiet treads,
On the meads and mountain-heads,
Along with pleasure, close ally'd,
Ever by each other's side; 155
And often, by the murmuring rill,
Hears the thrush, while all is still,
Within the groves of Grongar Hill.

AN EPISTLE

TO A FRIEND IN TOWN

Have my friends in the town, in the gay busy 100
town,
Forgot such a man as John Dyer?
Or heedless despise they, or pity the clown,
Whose bosom no pageantries fire? 4

No matter, no matter—content in the shades—
(Contented!—why everything charms me)
Fall in tunes all adown the great steep, ye 110 cascades!
Till hence rigid virtue alarms me:

Till outrage arises, or misery needs
 The swift, the intrepid avenger; 10
 Till sacred religion or liberty bleeds,
 Then mine be the deed and the danger.

Alas! what a folly, that wealth and domain
 We heap up in sin and in sorrow!
 Immense is the toil, yet the labour how vain! 15
 Is not life to be over to-morrow?

Then glide on my moments, the few that I have,
 Smooth-shaded, and quiet, and even,
 While gently the body descends to the grave,
 And the spirit arises to heaven. 20

THE FLEECE

(1757)

(Selections, from Book I)

Ah! gentle Shepherd! thine the lot to tend,
 Of all that feel distress, the most assail'd,
 Feeble, defenceless: lenient be thy care;
 But spread around thy tend'rest diligence
 In flow'ry spring-time, when the new-dropp'd 5
 lamb,
 Tott'ring with weakness by his mother's side,
 Feels the fresh world about him; and each thorn,
 Hillock, or furrow, trips his feeble feet:
 O! guard his meek sweet innocence from all
 Th' innumerable ills that rush around his life; 10
 Mark the quick kite, with beak and talons prone,
 Circling the skies to snatch him from the plain;
 Observe the lurking crows; beware the brake,
 There the sly fox the careless minute waits;
 Nor trust thy neighbour's dog, nor earth, nor 15
 sky:

Thy bosom to a thousand cares divide.
 Eurus oft slings his hail; the tardy fides
 Pay not their promis'd food; and oft the dam
 O'er her weak twins with empty udder mourns,
 Or fails to guard when the bold bird of prey 20
 Alights, and hops in many turns around,
 And tires her, also turning: to her aid
 Be nimble, and the weakest, in thine arms,
 Gently convey to the warm cot, and oft,
 Between the lark's note and the nightingale's, 25
 His hungry bleating still with tepid milk:
 In this soft office may thy children join,
 And charitable habits learn in sport:
 Nor yield him to himself ere vernal airs
 Sprinkle thy little croft with daisy flowers: 30
 Nor yet forget him; life has rising ills:
 Various as ether is the past'ral care:
 Thro' slow experience, by a patient breast,
 The whole long lesson gradual is attain'd,
 By precept after precept, oft receiv'd 35
 With deep attention; such as Nuceus<sup>1</sup> sings
 To the full vale near Soar's<sup>2</sup> enamour'd brook,
 While all is silence: sweet Hinclean swain!
 Whom rude obscurity severely clasps:

The Muse, howe'er, will deck thy simple cell 40
 With purple violets and primrose flowers,
 Well-pleas'd thy faithful lessons to repay. . . .

Could I recall those notes which once the Muse
 Heard at a shearing near the woody sides
 Of Blue-topp'd Wreakin!<sup>3</sup> Yet the carols 45
 sweet

Thro' the deep maze of the memorial cell
 Faintly remurmur. First arose in song
 Hoar-headed Damon, venerable swain!
 The soothest shepherd of the flow'ry vale,
 "This is no vulgar scene; no palace roof 50
 Was e'er so lofty, nor so nobly rise
 Their polish'd pillars as these aged oaks,
 Which o'er our Fleecy wealth and harmless sports

Thus have expanded wide their shelt'ring
 arms,
 Thrice told an hundred summers. Sweet
 Content, 55
 Ye gentle shepherds! pillow us at night."

"Yes, tuneful Damon, for our cares are short, Rising and falling with the cheerful day," Colin reply'd; "and pleasing weariness
 Soon our unaching heads to sleep inclines. 60
 Is it in cities so? where, poets tell,
 The cries of Sorrow sadden all the streets,
 And the diseases of intemp'rate wealth.
 Alas! that any ills from wealth should rise!

"May the sweet nightingale on yonder spray, 65
 May this clear stream, these lawns, those snow-white lambs,
 Which, with a pretty innocence of look,
 Skip on the green, and race in little troops;
 May that great lamp which sinks behind the hills,

And streams around variety of lights, 70
 Recall them erring! this is Damon's wish."

"Huge Bredon's<sup>4</sup> stony summit once I climb'd
 After a kidding: Damon, what a scene!
 What various views unnumber'd spread beneath!

Woods, tow'rs, vales, caves, dells, cliffs, and torrent floods, 75
 And here and there, between the spiry rocks,
 The broad flat sea. Far nobler prospects these Than gardens black with smoke in dusty towns,

Where stenchy vapours often blot the sun:
 Yet, flying from his quiet, thither crowds 80
 Each greedy wretch for tardy-rising wealth,
 Which comes too late; that courts the taste in vain,

Or nauseates with distempers. Yes, ye Rich!
 Still, still be rich, if thus ye fashion life;
 And piping, careless, silly shepherds we, 85
 We silly shepherds, all intent to feed
 Our snowy flocks, and wind the silky Fleece!"
 "Deem not, however, our occupation mean," Damon reply'd, "while the Supreme accounts

<sup>4</sup> A hill on the borders of Montgomeryshire.

Well of the faithful shepherd, rank'd alike 90
 With king and priest: they also shepherds are;
 For so th' all-Seeing styles them, to remind Elated man, forgetful of his charge."

TO AURELIA

See, the flowery Spring is blown,
 Let us leave the smoky Town:
 From the Mall, and from the Ring,<sup>1</sup>
 Every one has taken wing;
 Cloe, Strephon, Corydon, 5
 To the meadows all are gone;
 What is left you worth your stay?
 Come, Aurelia, come away.

Come, Aurelia, come and see
 What a lodge I've dress'd for thee, 10
 But the seat you cannot see,
 'Tis so hid with jessamy,
 With the vine that o'er the walls,
 And in every window, crawls;
 Let us there be blithe and gay! 15
 Come, Aurelia, come away.

Come with all thy sweetest wiles,
 With thy graces and thy smiles;
 Come, and we will merry be,
 Who shall be so blest as we? 20
 We will frolic all the day,
 Haste, Aurelia, while we may:
 Ay! and should not life be gay?
 Yes, Aurelia, come away.

SPRING

(1728)

(From The Seasons)

Come, gentle Spring, ethereal mildness, come,
 And from the bosom of yon dropping cloud,
 While music wakes around, veil'd in a shower
 Of shadowing roses, on our plains descend. . . .
 And see where surly Winter passes off, 11
 Far to the north, and calls his ruffian blasts:
 His blasts obey, and quit the howling hill,
 The shatter'd forest, and the ravag'd vale;
 While softer gales succeed, at whose kind touch,
 Dissolving snows in livid torrents lost, 16
 The mountains lift their green heads to the sky.
 As yet the trembling year is unconfirm'd,
 And Winter oft at eve resumes the breeze,
 Chills the pale morn, and bids his driving sleets
 Deform the day delightless; so that scarce 21
 The bitter knows his time, with bill engulf'd
 To shake the sounding marsh; or from the shore
 The plovers when to scatter o'er the heath,
 And sing their wild notes to the listening
 waste. 25

At last from Aries' rolls the bounteous Sun,
 And the bright Bull<sup>2</sup> receives him. Then no
 more
 Th' expansive atmosphere is cramp'd with cold;
 But, full of life and vivifying soul,
 Lifts the light clouds sublime, and spreads them thin, 30
 Fleecy and white, o'er all-surrounding heaven.
 Forth fly the tepid airs; and unconfin'd,
 Unbinding earth, the moving softness strays.
 Joyous, the impatient husbandman perceives
 Relenting Nature, and his lusty steers 35
 Drives from their stalls, to where the well-us'd plough
 Lies in the furrow, loosen'd from the frost.
 There, unrefusing, to the harness'd yoke
 They lend their shoulder, and begin their toil,
 Cheer'd by the simple song and soaring lark. 40
 Meanwhile incumbent o'er the shining share
 The master leans, removes th' obstructing clay, Winds the whole work, and sidelong lays the glebe.
 While thro' the neighb'ring fields the sower stalks,
 With measur'd step; and liberal throws the grain 45
 Into the faithful bosom of the ground:
 The harrow follows harsh, and shuts the scene.
 Be gracious, Heaven! for now laborious Man
 Has done his part. Ye fostering breezes, blow!
 Ye softening dews, ye tender showers, descend!
 And temper all, thou world-reviving sun, 51
 Into the perfect year! Nor ye who live
 In luxury and ease, in pomp and pride,
 Think these lost themes unworthy of your ear:
 Such themes as these the rural Maro<sup>3</sup> sung 55
 To wide imperial Rome, in the full height
 Of elegance and taste, by Greece refin'd.
 In ancient times, the sacred plough employ'd
 The kings and awful fathers of mankind:
 And some, with whom compar'd your insect-tribes 60
 Are but the beings of a summer's day,
 Have held the scale of empire, rul'd the storm
 Of mighty war; then, with victorious hand,
 Disdaining little delicacies, seiz'd
 The plough, and greatly independent, scorn'd 65
 All the vile stores Corruption can bestow.
 Ye generous Britons, venerate the plough;
 And o'er your hills, and long-withdrawing vales,
 Let Autumn spread his treasures to the sun,
 Luxuriant and unbounded: as the Sea, 70
 Far thro' his azure turbulent domain,
 Your empire owns, and from a thousand shores
 Wafts all the pomp of life into your ports;
 So with superior boon may your rich soil,
 Exuberant, Nature's better blessings pour 75
 O'er every land, the naked nations clothe,
 And be th' exhaustless granary of a world! . . .
 From the moist meadow to the wither'd hill,
 Led by the breeze, the vivid verdure runs 88

<sup>1,2</sup> Aries, the Ram, is the first of the Zodiac Signs, and Taurus, the Bull, the second. The date the poet indicates is the latter part of April.

<sup>3</sup> Vergil, whose full name was Publius Vergilius Maro.

And swells, and deepens, to the cherish'd eye.
The hawthorn whitens; and the juicy groves 90
Put forth their buds, unfolding by degrees,
Till the whole leafy forest stands display'd,
In full luxuriance to the sighing gales;
Where the deer rustle through the twining
brake,

And the birds sing conceal'd. At once array'd 95
In all the colours of the flushing year,
By Nature's swift and secret-working hand,
The garden glows, and fills the liberal air
With lavish fragrance; while the promis'd fruit
Lies yet a little embryo, unperceiv'd, 100
Within its crimson fold. Now from the town, Buried in smoke, and sleep, and noisome
damps,

Oft let me wander o'er the dewy fields,
Where freshness breathes, and dash the trembling drops

From the bent bush, as thro' the verdant maze
Of sweet-briar hedges I pursue my walk; 106
Or taste the smell of dairy, or ascend
Some eminence, AUGUSTA,<sup>4</sup> in thy plains,
And see the country, far diffused around,
One boundless blush, one white empurpled
shower 110
Of mingled blossoms; where the raptur'd eye
Hurries from joy to joy, and, hid beneath
The fair profusion, yellow Autumn spies.

SUMMER (1727)

From brightening fields of ether fair disclos'd, Child of the Sun, refulgent Summer comes,
In pride of youth, and felt through Nature's depth:

He comes attended by the sultry Hours,
And ever-fanning breezes, on his way; 5
While, from his ardent look, the turning Spring,
Averts her blushful face; and earth, and skies,
All-smiling, to his hot dominion leaves.

Hence, let me haste into the mid-wood shade,
Where scarce a sunbeam wanders thro' the gloom; 10

And on the dark-green grass, beside the brink
Of haunted stream, that by the roots of oak
Rolls o'er the rocky channel, lie at large,
And sing the glories of the circling year. . . . 14

Now swarms the village o'er the joyful
mead: 352

The rustic youth, brown with meridian toil,
Healthful and strong; full as the summer rose
Blown by prevailing suns, the ruddy maid, 355
Half naked, swelling on the sight, and all
Her kindled graces burning o'er her cheek.
E'en stooping age is here; and infant hands
Trail the long rake, or, with the fragrant load
O'ercharg'd, amid the kind oppression roll. 360
Wide flies the tugged grain;<sup>1</sup> all in a row
Advancing broad, or wheeling round the field,

<sup>1</sup> i. e., grain which is spread to dry.

They spread their breathing harvest to the sun,
That throws refreshful round a rural smell.
Or, as they take the green-appearing ground, 365
And drive the dusky wave along the mead,
The russet hay-cock rises thick behind,
In order gay: While, heard from dale to dale,
Waking the breeze, resounds the blended voice
Of happy labour, love, and social glee. 370

Or rushing thence, in one diffusive band,
They drive the troubled flocks, by many a dog
Compell'd, to where the mazy-running brook
Forms a deep pool: this bank abrupt and high,
And that fair spreading in a pebbled shore. 375
Urg'd to the giddy brink, much is the toil,
The clamour much, of men, and boys, and dogs,

Ere the soft fearful people to the flood
Commit their woolly sides. And oft the swain,
On some impatient seizing, hurls them in: 380
Embolden'd then, nor hesitating more,
Fast, fast, they plunge amid the flashing wave,
And, panting, labour to the farther shore.
Repeated this, till deep the well-wash'd fleece
Has drunk the flood, and from his lively haunt
The trout is banish'd by the sordid stream; 386
Heavy, and dripping to the breezy brow Slow move the harmless race; where, as they spread

Their swelling treasures to the sunny ray,
Inly disturb'd, and wond'ring what this wild 390
Outrageous tumult means, their loud complaints

The country fill; and, tost from rock to rock,
Incessant bleatings run around the hills.

At last, of snowy white, the gather'd flocks
Are in the wattled pen innumerable press'd, 395
Head above head: and, rang'd in lusty rows,
The shepherds sit, and whet the sounding shears.

The housewife waits to roll her fleecy stores,
With all her gay-drest maids attending round.
One, chief, in gracious dignity enthron'd, 400 Shines o'er the rest, the pastoral queen, and rays

Her smiles, sweet beaming, on her shepherd
king;

While the glad circle round them yield their souls

To festive mirth, and wit that knows no gall.

AUTUMN (1730)

Crown'd with the sickle and the wheaten sheaf,
While Autumn, nodding o'er the yellow plain,
Comes jovial on; the Doric reed<sup>1</sup> once more,
Well pleas'd, I tune. Whate'er the Wintry frost

Nitrous prepar'd, the various-blossom'd Spring
Put in white promise forth; and Summer's
suns 6

Concocted strong; rush boundless now to view,
Full, perfect all, and swell my glorious
theme. . . . 8

<sup>1</sup> The pipe, or oaten reed, of the poet.

But see, the fading many-colour'd woods, 949
Shade deepening over shade, the country round Imbrown; a crowded umbrage, dusk, and
dun,

Of every hue, from wan declining green
To sooty dark. These now the lonesome Muse, Low-whispering, lead into their leaf-strown walks,

And give the season in its latest view. 955

Meantime, light shadowing all, a sober calm
Fleeces unbounded ether;<sup>2</sup> whose least wave
Stands tremulous, uncertain where to turn
The gentle current; while, illumin'd wide,
The dewy-skirted clouds imbibe the sun, 960
And thro' their lucid veil his soften'd force Shed o'er the peaceful world. Then is the time,

For those whom Wisdom and whom Nature charm,

To steal themselves from the degenerate crowd,
And soar above this little scene of things; 965
To tread low-thoughted Vice beneath their feet;

To soothe the throbbing passions into peace,
And woo lone Quiet in her silent walks.

Thus solitary, and in pensive guise,
Oft let me wander o'er the russet mead, 970
And thro' the sadden'd grove, where scarce is heard

One dying strain, to cheer the woodman's toil.
Haply some widow'd songster pours his plaint,
Far, in faint warblings, thro' the tawny copse;
While congregated thrushes, linnets, larks, 975
And each wild throat, whose artless strains so late

Swell'd all the music of the swarming shades,
Robb'd of their tuneful souls, now shivering sit

On the dead tree, a dull despondent flock;
With not a brightness waving o'er their plumes,
And nought save chattering discord in their
note. 981

Oh, let not, aim'd from some inhuman eye,
The gun the music of the coming year
Destroy; and harmless, unsuspecting harm,
Lay the weak tribes a miserable prey, 985
In mingled murder, fluttering on the ground!

The pale descending year, yet pleasing still,
A gentler mood inspires; for now the leaf
Incessant rustles from the mournful grove;
Oft startling such as, studious, walk below, 990
And slowly circles thro' the waving air.

But should a quicker breeze amid the boughs
Sob, o'er the sky the leafy deluge streams;
Till chok'd, and matted with the dreary shower,
The forest-walks, at every rising gale, 995
Roll wide the wither'd waste, and whistle bleak.

Fled is the blasted verdure of the fields:
And, shrunk into their beds, the flowery race
Their sunny robes resign. Even what remain'd
Of stronger fruits fall from the naked tree; 1000
And woods, fields, gardens, orchards, all around
The desolated prospect thrills the soul.

<sup>2</sup> The calm spreads over the atmosphere as soft as a fleece of wool.

WINTER

(1726)

See, Winter comes, to rule the varied year,
Sullen and sad, with all his rising train—Vapours, and clouds, and storms. Be these my theme;

These, that exalt the soul to solemn thought,
And heavenly musing. Welcome, kindred glooms! 5

Congenial horrors, hail! With frequent foot,
Pleas'd have I, in my cheerful morn of life,
When nurs'd by careless Solitude I liv'd,
And sung of Nature with unceasing joy,— Pleas'd have I wander'd through your rough domain; 10

Trod the pure virgin-snows, myself as pure;
Heard the winds roar, and the big torrent burst;
Or seen the deep-fermenting tempest brew'd,
In the grim evening sky. Thus pass'd the
time,

Till through the lucid chambers of the South Look'd out the joyous Spring, look'd out, and smil'd. . . . 16

The keener tempests come: and fuming! dun
From all the livid East, or piercing North, 224
Thick clouds ascend; in whose capacious womb
A vapoury deluge lies, to snow congeal'd.
Heavy they roll their fleecy world along,
And the sky saddens with the gather'd storm.
Thro' the hush'd air the whitening shower descends,

At first thin-wavering; till at last the flakes 230 Fall broad and wide, and fast, dimming the day

With a continual flow. The cherish'd fields
Put on their winter-robe of purest white.
'Tis brightness all; save where the new snow melts

Along the mazy current. Low the woods 235
Bow their hoar head; and, ere the languid Sun
Faint from the West emits his evening ray,
Earth's universal face, deep-hid, and chill,
Is one wild dazzling waste, that buries wide
The works of Man. Drooping, the labourer-ox Stands cover'd o'er with snow, and then demands 247

The fruit of all his toil. The fowls of heaven,
Tam'd by the cruel season, crowd around
The winnowing store, and claim the little boon
Which Providence assigns them. One alone, 245
The red-breast, sacred to the household gods,
Wisely regardful of th' embroiling sky,
In joyless fields and thorny thickets leaves
His shivering mates, and pays to trusted man
His annual visit. Half afraid, he first 250
Against the window beats; then, brisk, alights
On the warm hearth; then, hopping o'er the floor,

Eyes all the smiling family askance,
And pecks, and starts, and wonders where he is:
Till, more familiar grown, the table-crumbs 255
Attract his slender feet. The foodless wilds
Pour forth their brown inhabitants. The hare Though timorous of heart, and hard beset

<sup>1</sup> The dark colored clouds fume or swirl from the East.

By death in various forms—dark snares, and
 dogs,
 And more unpitied men—the garden seeks, 260
 Urg'd on by fearless want. The bleating kind Eye the bleak heaven, and next the glistening
 earth,
 With looks of dumb despair; then, sad-dispers'd Dig for the wither'd herb thro' heaps of snow. . . . 264

Ah! little think the gay licentious proud, 322
 Whom pleasure, pow'r, and affluence surround;
 They who their thoughtless hours in giddy mirth

And wanton, often cruel, riot waste;— 325
 Ah! little think they, while they dance along,
 How many feel, this very moment, death
 And all the sad variety of pain.

How many sink in the devouring flood,
 Or more devouring flame; how many bleed, 330
 By shameful variance betwixt man and man:
 How many pine in want and dungeon glooms,
 Shut from the common air, and common use
 Of their own limbs: How many drink the cup

Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread 335
 Of misery: sore pierc'd by wintry winds,
 How many shrink into the sordid hut
 Of cheerless poverty: how many shake
 With all the fiercer tortures of the mind,—

Unbounded passion, madness, guilt, remorse;
 Whence tumbled headlong from the height of life, 341

They furnish matter for the tragic Muse:
 Ev'n in the vale where wisdom loves to dwell,
 With Friendship, Peace, and Contemplation
 join'd,

How many, rack'd with honest passions, droop
 In deep-retir'd distress: how many stand 346
 Around the death-bed of their dearest friends,
 And point the parting anguish. Thought fond man

Of these, and all the thousand nameless ills,
 That one incessant struggle render life, 350
 One scene of toil, of suff'ring, and of fate;
 Vice in his high career would stand appall'd,

And heedless rambling Impulse learn to think;
 The conscious heart of Charity would warm,
 And her wide wish Benevolence dilate; 355

The social tear would rise, the social sigh;
 And into clear perfection, gradual bliss,
 Refining still, the social passions work.

And here can I forget the generous band,<sup>2</sup>
 Who, touch'd with human woe, redressive search'd 360

Into the horrors of the gloomy jail?
 Unpitied and unheard, where misery moans;
 Where Sickness pines; where Thirst and Hunger burn,

And poor Misfortune feels the lash of Vice. 365
 While in the land of liberty—the land
 Whose every street and public meeting glow
 With open freedom—little tyrants rag'd;

Snatch'd the lean morsel from the starving mouth;

Tore from cold wintry limbs the tatter'd weed;
 Even robb'd them of the last of comforts,
 sleep; 370

The free-born Briton to the dungeon chain'd,
 Or, as the lust of cruelty prevail'd,
 At pleasure mark'd him with inglorious stripes;
 And crush'd out lives, by secret barbarous

ways,
 That for their country would have toil'd, or bled. 375

Oh great design! if executed well,
 With patient care and wisdom-temper'd zeal.

Ye sons of mercy! yet resume the search;
 Drag forth the legal monsters into light,
 Wrench from their hands Oppression's iron rod, 380

And bid the cruel feel the pangs they give.
 Much still untouch'd remains; in this rank age,

Much is the patriot's weeding hand requir'd.
 The toils of law,—what dark insidious men
 Have cumbrous added, to perplex the truth, 385
 And lengthen simple justice into trade,— How glorious were the day that saw these broke,

And every man within the reach of right!

RULE BRITANNIA

(1740)

When Britain first at Heaven's command
 Arose from out the azure main,
 This was the charter of her land,
 And guardian angels sung the strain:
 Rule, Britannia! Britannia rules the waves! 5
 Britons never shall be slaves.

The nations not so blest as thee
 Must in their turn to tyrants fall,
 While thou shalt flourish great and free,
 The dread and envy of them all. 10

Still more majestic shalt thou rise,
 More dreadful from each foreign stroke;
 As the loud blast that tears the skies
 Serves but to root thy native oak.

Thee haughty tyrants ne'er shall tame; 15
 All their attempts to bend thee down
 Will but arouse thy generous flame,
 And work their woe and thy renown.

To thee belongs the rural reign;
 Thy cities shall with commerce shine; 20
 All thine shall be the subject main,
 And every shore it circles thine!

The Muses, still with Freedom found,
 Shall to thy happy coast repair;
 Blest Isle, with matchless beauty crown'd 25
 And many hearts to guard the fair:—
 Rule, Britannia! Britannia rules the waves!
 Britons never shall be slaves!

THE CASTLE OF INDOLENCE

(1748)

(Selections)

*The castle hight<sup>1</sup> of indolence,
And its false luxury;
Where for a little time, alas!
We liv'd right jollily.*

I

O mortal man, who livest here by toil,
Do not complain of this thy hard estate;
That like an emmet thou must ever moil,
Is a sad sentence of an ancient date;
And, certes, there is for it reason great; 5
For, though sometimes it makes thee weep
And wail,
And curse thy star, and early drudge and
late,
Withouten that would come an heavier bale,
Loose life, unruly passions, and diseases pale.

II

In lowly dale, fast by a river's side, 10
With woody hill o'er hill encompass'd round,
A most enchanting wizard did abide,
Than whom a fiend more fell is nowhere
found.
It was, I ween, a lovely spot of ground;
And there a season atween June and May, 15
Half prankt with spring, with summer half imbrown'd,
A listless climate made, where, sooth to say,
No living wight could work, ne cared even for play.

III

Was nought around but images of rest:
Sleep-soothing groves, and quiet lawns between; 20
And flowery beds that slumbrous influence kest,<sup>2</sup>
From poppies breath'd; and beds of pleasant
green,
Where never yet was creeping creature seen.
Meantime, unnumber'd glittering streamlets
play'd,
And hurl'd everywhere their waters sheen; 25
That, as they bicker'd through the sunny
glade,
Though restless still themselves, a lulling murmur made.

IV

Join'd to the prattle of the purling rills,
Were heard the lowing herds along the vale,
And flocks loud-bleating from the distant
hills, 30
And vacant shepherds piping in the dale:
And now and then sweet Philomel would wail
Or stock-doves plain amid the forest deep,
That drowsy rustled to the sighing gale;
And still a coil the grasshopper did keep; 35
Yet all these sounds yblent inclin'd all to sleep.

<sup>1</sup> Called.<sup>2</sup> Cast.

V

Full in the passage of the vale above,
A sable, silent, solemn forest stood;
Where nought but shadowy forms was seen to move,
As Idless fancy'd in her dreaming mood: 40
And up the hills, on either side, a wood
Of blackening pines, aye waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood;
And where this valley winded out, below,
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard, to flow. 45

VI

A pleasing land of drowsy-nead it was,
Of dreams that wave before the half-shut
eye;
And of gay castles in the clouds that pass,
Forever flushing round a summer-sky:
There eke the soft delights, that witchingly 50
Instil a wanton sweetness through the breast,
And the calm pleasures always hover'd nigh;
But whate'er smack'd of noyance, or unrest,
Was far, far off expell'd from this delicious nest.

VII

The landscape such, inspiring perfect ease, 55
Where INDOLENCE (for so the wizard hight)
Close-hid his castle mid embowering trees,
That half shut out the beams of Phoebeus
bright,
And made a kind of checker'd day and night;
Meanwhile, unceasing at the massy gate, 60
Beneath a spacious palm, the wicked wight
Was plac'd; and to his lute, of cruel fate,
And labour harsh, complain'd, lamenting man's estate.

VIII

Thither continual pilgrims crowded still,
From all the roads of earth that pass there
by: 65
For, as they chan'd to breathe on neighbouring hill,
The freshness of this valley smote their eye,
And drew them ever and anon more nigh;
'Till clustering round th' enchanter false
they hung,
Ymolten with his syren melody; 70
While o'er th' enfeebling lute his hand he
flung,
And to the trembling chords these tempting verses sung:

IX

"Behold! ye pilgrims of this earth, behold!
See all but man with unearn'd pleasure gay:
See her bright robes the butterfly unfold, 75
Broke from her wintry tomb in prime of May!
What youthful bride can equal her array?
Who can with her for easy pleasure vie?
From mead to mead with gentle wing to
stray,
From flower to flower on balmy gales to fly, 80
Is all she has to do beneath the radiant sky.

X

"Behold the merry minstrels of the morn,
 The swarming songsters of the careless grove,
 Ten thousand throats! that, from the flowering thorn,
 Hymn their good God, and carol sweet of
 love; 85
 Such grateful kindly raptures them emove:
 They neither plough, nor sow; ne, fit for flail,
 E'er to the barn the nodding sheaves they drove;
 Yet theirs each harvest dancing in the gale,
 Whatever crowns the hill, or smiles along the vale. 90

XI

"Outcast of nature, man! the wretched thrall
 Of bitter-dropping sweat, of sweltry pain,
 Of cares that eat away thy heart with gall,
 And of the vices, an inhuman train,
 That all proceed from savage thirst of gain: 95
 For when hard-hearted Interest first began
 To poison earth, Astræa left the plain;
 Guile, violence, and murder seiz'd on man,
 And, for soft milky streams, with blood the rivers ran.

XII

"Come, ye, who still the cumbrous load of life 100
 Push hard up hill; but, as the farthest steep
 You trust to gain, and put an end to strife, Down thunders back the stone with mighty
 sweep,
 And hurls your labours to the valley deep,
 For ever vain: come, and withouten fee 105
 I in oblivion will your sorrows steep,
 Your cares, your toils, will steep you in a sea
 Of full delight: O come, ye weary wights, to me!

XIII

"With me, you need not rise at early dawn,
 To pass the joyless day in various stounds;<sup>3</sup>
 Or, louting low, on upstart fortune fawn, 111
 And sell fair honour for some paltry pounds;
 Or through the city take your dirty rounds,
 To cheat, and dun, and lie, and visit pay;
 Now flatt'ring base, now giving secret wounds; 115
 Or prowl in courts of law for human prey,
 In venal senate thief, or rob on broad highway.

XIV

"No cocks, with me, to rustic labour call,
 From village on to village sounding clear;
 To tardy swain no shrill-voic'd matrons squall; 120
 No dogs, no babes, no wives, to stun your ear;
 No hammers thump; no horrid blacksmith
 sear,

<sup>3</sup> Troubles, efforts.

Ne noisy tradesman your sweet slumbers start,
 With sounds that are a misery to hear:
 But all is calm, as would delight the heart 125
 Of Sybarite<sup>4</sup> of old, all nature, and all art. . . .

XIX

"O grievous folly! to heap up estate, 163
 Losing the days you see beneath the sun;
 When, sudden, comes blind unrelenting fate,
 And gives th' untasted portion you have won 166
 With ruthless toil, and many a wretch undone
 To those who mock you, gone to Pluto's
 reign,
 There with sad ghosts to pine, and shadows
 dun:
 But sure it is of vanities most vain, 170
 To toil for what you here untoiling may obtain."

XX

He ceas'd. But still their trembling ears retain'd
 The deep vibrations of his witching song:
 That, by a kind of magic power, constrain'd
 To enter in, pell-mell, the listening throng.
 Heaps pour'd on heaps, and yet they slipt
 along, 177
 In silent ease: as when beneath the beam
 Of summer-moons, the distant woods among,
 Or by some flood all silver'd with the gleam,
 The soft-embodied Fays through airy portal stream.

XXI

By the smooth demon so it order'd was, 182
 And here his baneful bounty first began:
 Though some there were who would not further pass,
 And his alluring baits suspected han.<sup>5</sup> 185
 The wise distrust the too fair-spoken man.
 Yet through the gate they cast a wishful eye
 Not to move on, perdie,<sup>6</sup> is all they can;
 For do their very best they cannot fly, 189
 But often each way look, and often sorely sigh.

XXII

When this the watchful wizard saw,
 With sudden spring he leaped upon them straight;
 And soon as touch'd by his unhallow'd paw,
 They found themselves within the cursed
 gate; 195
 Full hard to be repass'd, like that of fate.
 Not stronger were of old the giant-crew,
 Who sought to pull high Jove from regal
 state;
 Though feeble wretch he seem'd, of sallow hue: 200
 Certes, who bides his grasp, will that encounter
 rue. . . .

<sup>4</sup> Inhabitants of Sybaris, a Greek city in southern Italy, were proverbial for their luxurious living.

<sup>5</sup> Have.

<sup>6</sup> Truly.

XXVI

Mean time the master-porter wide display'd
Great store of caps, of slippers, and of gowns;
Wherewith he those who enter'd in, array'd 231
Loose, as the breeze that plays along the downs,
And waves the summer-woods when evening
frowns.
O fair undress, best dress! it checks no vein,
But every flowing limb in pleasure drowns,
And heightens ease with grace. This done, right fain, 236
Sir porter set him down, and turned to sleep
again. . . .

XXVIII

This rite perform'd, all inly pleas'd and still,
Withouten tromp,<sup>7</sup> was proclamation made.
"Ye sons of INDOLENCE, do what you
will; 258
"And wander where you list, thro' hall or glade!
"Be no man's pleasure for another staid;
"Let each as likes him best his hours employ,
"And curs'd be he who minds his neighbour's trade!
"Here dwells kind ease and unreprieving joy:
"He little merits bliss who others can annoy."

XXIX

Straight of these endless numbers, swarming
round, 265
As thick as idle motes in sunny ray,
Not one eftsoons in view was to be found,
But every man stroll'd off his own glad way,
Wide o'er this ample court's blank area,
With all the lodges that thereto pertain'd, 270
No living creature could be seen to stray;
While solitude, and perfect silence reign'd:
So that to think you dreamt you almost was constrain'd.

XXX

As when a shepherd of the Hebrid Isles,
Plac'd far amid the melancholy main, 275
(Whether it be lone fancy him beguiles;
Or that aerial beings sometimes deign
To stand, embodied, to our senses plain)
Sees on the naked hill, or valley low,
The whilst in ocean Phoebus dips his wain,
A vast assembly moving to and fro: 281
Then all at once in air dissolves the wondrous show.

XXXI

Ye gods of quiet, and of sleep profound!
Whose soft dominion o'er this castle sways,
And all the widely-silent places round, 285
Forgive me, if my trembling pen displays
What never yet was sung in mortal lays.
But how shall I attempt such arduous string,
I who have spent my nights, and nightly
days, 289
In this soul-deadening place, loose-loitering?
Ah! how shall I for this uprear my moulted wing?

<sup>7</sup> Trump, trumpet.

XXXII

Come on, my muse, nor stoop to low despair,
Thou imp of Jove, touch'd by celestial fire!
Which yet shall sing of war, and actions fair, 294
Which the bold sons of Britain will inspire;
Of ancient bards thou yet shalt sweep the lyre;
Thou yet shall tread in tragic pall the stage,
Paint love's enchanting woes, the hero's ire,
The sage's calm, the patriot's noble rage, 299
Dashing corruption down through every worthless age.

AGE OF JOHNSON

Samuel Johnson

1709-1784

LONDON: A POEM

(1738)

IN IMITATION OF THE THIRD SATIRE
OF JUVENAL—Quis iniquae

Tam patiens urbis, tam ferreus ut teneat se?
Juv. 1. 30, 1.

(Who so patient of the unjust town, so unfeeling as to restrain himself?)

Though grief and fondness in my breast rebel,
When injured Thales<sup>1</sup> bids the town farewell, Yet still my calmer thoughts his choice commend,

(I praise the hermit, but regret the friend,)
Who now resolves, from vice and London far, 5
To breathe in distant fields a purer air;
And, fix'd on Cambria's<sup>2</sup> solitary shore,
Give to St. David's one true Briton more.

For who would leave, unbrib'd, Hibernia's land,<sup>4</sup>

Or change the rocks of Scotland for the Strand?<sup>5</sup>
There none are swept by sudden fate away, 11
But all, whom hunger spares, with age decay:
Here malice, rapine, accident, conspire,
And now a rabble rages, now a fire;
Their ambush here relentless ruffians lay, 15
And here the fell attorney prowls for prey;
Here falling houses thunder on your head,
And here a female atheist talks you dead.

While Thales waits the wherry that contains
Of dissipated wealth the small remains, 20
On Thames's banks in silent thought we stood,
Where Greenwich smiles upon the silver flood;
Struck with the seat that gave Eliza's birth,
We kneel, and kiss the consecrated earth;
In pleasing dreams the blissful age renew, 25
And call Britannia's glories back to view;
Behold her cross triumphant on the main,
The guard of Commerce and the dread of Spain,

<sup>1</sup> Presumably Johnson's unfortunate friend Richard Savage, the poet, who was forced to retire from London to Swansea in Wales.<sup>2</sup> Ancient name of Wales.<sup>3</sup> Patron saint of Wales.<sup>4</sup> Ireland.<sup>5</sup> In Johnson's time, one of the most fashionable streets of London.<sup>6</sup> Queen Elizabeth was born at Greenwich, 1533.

Ere masquerades debauch'd, excise oppress'd,<sup>7</sup>
Or English honour grew a standing jest. 30

A transient calm the happy scenes bestow,
And for a moment lull the sense of woe.

At length awaking, with contemptuous frown
Indignant Thales eyes the neighb'ring town.

"Since worth," he cries, "in these degen'rate
days, 35

Wants ev'n the cheap reward of empty praise;
In those curs'd walls, devote to vice and gain,

Since unrewarded science<sup>8</sup> toils in vain;
Since hope but soothes to double my distress,

And ev'ry moment leaves my little less; 40
While yet my steady steps no staff sustains,

And life still vig'rous revels in my veins,
Grant me, kind Heaven, to find some happier

place,
Where honesty and sense are no disgrace;

Some pleasing bank where verdant osiers
play, 45

Some peaceful vale with Nature's paintings
gay,

Where once the harass'd Briton found repose,
And safe in poverty defy'd his foes;

Some secret cell, ye Pow'rs indulgent give.
Let — live here, for — has learn'd to live. 50

Here let those reign, whom pensions can incite
To vote a patriot black, a courtier white;

Explain their country's dear-bought rights
away,

And plead for pirates in the face of day;
With slavish tenets taint our poison'd youth, 55

And lend a lie the confidence of truth.
Let such raise palaces, and manors buy,

Collect a tax, or farm a lottery;<sup>9</sup>
With warbling eunuchs fill our licens'd stage, 10

And lull to servitude a thoughtless age. 60
"Heroes, proceed! what bounds your pride shall hold?

What check restrain your thirst of pow'r and
gold?

Behold rebellious Virtue quite o'erthrown, Behold our fame, our wealth, our lives your

own. 65
To such the plunder of a land is giv'n,

When public crimes inflame the wrath of Heav'n;

But what, my friend, what hope remains for me,
Who start at theft, and blush at perjury?

Who scarce forbear, though Britain's court he sing,

To pluck a titled poet's borrow'd wing; 70
A statesman's logic unconvinc'd can hear,

And dare to slumber o'er the Gazetteer;<sup>11</sup>

Despise a fool in half his pension dress'd,
And strive in vain to laugh at Clodio's jest.<sup>12</sup>

"Others, with softer smiles and subtler art, 75
Can sap the principles, or taint the heart;

With more address a lover's note convey,
Or bribe a virgin's innocence away.

Well may they rise, while I, whose rustic
tongue

Ne'er knew to puzzle right, or varnish wrong, 80
Spurn'd as a beggar, dreading as a spy,

Live unregarded, unlamented die.
"For what but social guilt the friend endears?

Who shares Orgilio's<sup>13</sup> crimes, his fortune shares.

But thou, should tempting villany present 85
All Marlborough<sup>14</sup> hoarded, or all Villiers<sup>15</sup>

spent,
Turn from the glitt'ring bribe thy scornful eye,

Nor sell for gold what gold could never buy,
The peaceful slumber, self-approving day,

Unsullied fame, and conscience ever gay. 90
"The cheated nation's happy fav'rites, see!

Mark whom the great caress, who frown on me!
LONDON! the needy villain's gen'ral home,

The common sewer of Paris and of Rome;
With eager thirst, by folly or by fate, 95

Sucks in the dregs of each corrupted state.
Forgive my transports on a theme like this,

I cannot bear a French metropolis.
"Illustrious EDWARD!<sup>16</sup> from the realms of

day,
The land of heroes and of saints survey; 100

Nor hope the British lineaments to trace,
The rustic grandeur, or the surly grace;

But, lost in thoughtless ease and empty show,
Behold the warrior dwindled to a beau;

Sense, freedom, piety, refin'd away, 105
Of France the mimic, and of Spain the prey.

"All that at home no more can beg or steal,
Or like a gibbet<sup>17</sup> better than a wheel;<sup>18</sup>

Hiss'd from the stage, or hooted from the court,
Their air, their dress, their politics import; 110

Obsequious, artful, voluble, and gay,
On Britain's fond credulity they prey.

No gainful trade their industry can 'scape,
They sing, they dance, clean shoes, their fiddles scrape:

All sciences a fasting Monsieur knows, 115

And, bid him go to hell, to hell he goes.
"Ah! what avails it that, from slavery far,

I draw the breath of life in English air;
Was early taught a Briton's right to prize,

And lisp the tale of Henry's victories;<sup>19</sup> 120

<sup>7</sup> Excise duties, which began in the reign of Charles I., were very unpopular in England, and in 1733 Walpole's Excise Bill was withdrawn in consequence of general opposition.

<sup>9</sup> To take the profits or proceeds by a lottery, on payment of a fixed sum. Lotteries were most popular at the time and even came to be established by acts of Parliament.

<sup>10</sup> The famous Playhouse Bill had recently been enacted, declaring that "every actor without a legal settlement or license from the Lord Chamberlain should be deemed a rogue and a vagabond."

<sup>12</sup> There is a bragging character of this name, given to strange oaths, in Cibber's play, Love makes a Man. Johnson may, however, have had one of his own contemporaries in mind.

<sup>14</sup> The Duke of Marlborough (d. 1722) who has been called "the greatest and meanest of mankind."

If the gull'd conqueror receives the chain,
And flattery prevails when arms are vain?

"Studious to please, and ready to submit,

The supple Gaul was born a parasite:

Still to his int'rest true, where'er he goes, 125

Wit, brav'ry, worth, his lavish tongue bestows;

In ev'ry face a thousand graces shine,

From ev'ry tongue flows harmony divine.

These arts in vain our rugged natives try,

Strain out with falt'ring diffidence a lie, 130

And gain a kick for awkward flattery.

"Besides, with justice, this discerning age

Admires their wondrous talents for the stage:

Well may they venture on the mimic's art,

Who play from morn till night a borrow'd part; 135

Practis'd their master's notions to embrace,

Repeat his maxims, and reflect his face;

With ev'ry wild absurdity comply,

And view each object with another's eye;

To shake with laughter ere the jest they hear,

To pour at will the counterfeited tear; 141

And, as their patron hints the cold or heat,

To shake in dog days, in December sweat.

"How, when competitors like these contend,

Can surly Virtue hope to fix a friend? 145

Slaves that with serious impudence beguile,

And lie without a blush, without a smile; . . .

Can Balbo's<sup>20</sup> eloquence applaud, and swear 150

He gropes<sup>21</sup> his breeches with a monarch's air!

"For arts like these preferr'd, admir'd,

caress'd,

They first invade your table, then your breast;

Explore your secrets with insidious art,

Watch the weak hour, and ransack all the

heart; 155

Then soon your ill-placed confidence repay,

Commence your lords, and govern or betray.

"By numbers here from shame or censure free,

All crimes are safe but hated poverty:

This, only this, the rigid law pursues, 160

This, only this, provokes the snarling Muse.

The sober trader at a tatter'd cloak

Wakes from his dream, and labours for a joke;

With brisker air the silken courtiers gaze,

And turn the varied taunt a thousand ways. 165

Of all the griefs that harass the distress'd,

Sure the most bitter is a scornful jest;

Fate never wounds more deep the gen'rous

heart,

Than when a blockhead's insult points the dart,

"Has Heaven reserv'd, in pity to the poor, 170

No pathless waste, or undiscover'd shore?

No secret island in the boundless main?

No peaceful desert yet unclaim'd by Spain?

Quick let us rise, the happy seats explore,

And bear Oppression's insolence no more. 175

This mournful truth is everywhere confess'd,

SLOW RISES WORTH, BY POVERTY DEPRESS'D:

But here more slow, where all are slaves to gold,

Where looks are merchandise, and smiles are sold:

Where, won by bribes, by flatteries implor'd, 180

The groom retails the favors of his lord.

"But hark! th' affrighted crowd's tumultuous
cries

Roll through the streets, and thunder to the skies:

Rais'd from some pleasing dream of wealth and
pow'r,

Some pompous palace, or some blissful bow'r,

Aghast you start, and scarce with aching

sight 186

Sustain th' approaching fire's tremendous

light;

Swift from pursuing horrors take your way,

And leave your little ALL to flames a prey;

Then through the world a wretched vagrant

roam, 190

For where can starving Merit find a home?

In vain your mournful narrative disclose,

While all neglect, and most insult your woes.

"Should Heaven's just bolts Orgilio's wealth

confound,

And spread his flaming palace on the ground, 195

Swift o'er the land the dismal rumour flies,

And public mournings pacify the skies;

The laureat tribe<sup>22</sup> in venal verse relate,

How Virtue wars with persecuting fate;

With well-feign'd gratitude the pension'd

band 200

Refund the plunder of the beggar'd land.

See! while he builds, the gaudy vassals come,

And crowd with sudden wealth the rising dome;

The price of boroughs and of souls restore,

And raise his treasures higher than before: 205

Now blessed with all the baubles of the great,

The polish'd marble and the shining plate,

Orgilio sees the golden pile aspire,

And hopes from angry Heaven another fire.

"Could'st thou resign the park and play content, 210

For the fair banks of Severn or of Trent;

There might'st thou find some elegant retreat,

Some hireling senator's deserted seat;

And stretch thy prospects o'er the smiling

land,

For less than rent the dungeons of the Strand; <sup>23</sup>

There prune thy walks, support thy drooping

flow'rs, 216

Direct thy rivulets, and twine thy bow'rs;

And, while thy grounds a cheap repast afford,

Despise the dainties of a venal lord:

There ev'ry bush with Nature's music rings, 220

There ev'ry breeze bears health upon its wings;

On all thy hours security shall smile,

And bless thine evening walk and morning toil.

"Prepare for death, if here at night you

room,

And sign your will before you sup from home.

Some fiery top, with new commission vain, 226

Who sleeps on brambles till he kills his man;

Some frolic drunkard, reeling from a feast,

Provokes a broil, and stabs you for a jest.

Yet ev'n these heroes, mischievously gay, 233

Lords of the street, and terrors of the way;

<sup>20</sup> Lat. balbus, stammering, stuttering.

<sup>22</sup> The crowd of poetasters who sought favor by flattering the great in verse.

<sup>23</sup> The mansions and palaces of the wealthy on the Strand.

Flush'd as they are with folly, youth, and wine,
 Their prudent insults to the poor confine;
 Afar they mark the flambeau's bright approach,
 And shun the shining train and golden coach. 235
 "In vain, these dangers past, your doors you close,
 And hope the balmy blessings of repose;
 Cruel with guilt, and daring with despair,
 The midnight murd'rer bursts the faithless bar;
 Invades the sacred hour of silent rest, 240
 And plants, unseen, a dagger in your breast.
 "Scarce can our fields, such crowds at Tyburn<sup>24</sup> die,
 With hemp the gallows and the fleet supply.
 Propose your schemes, ye senatorian band,
 Whose ways and means support the sinking land: 245
 Lest ropes be wanting in the tempting spring,
 To rig another convoy for the king.<sup>25</sup>
 "A single gaol, in ALFRED's golden reign,
 Could half the nation's criminals contain;
 Fair Justice, then, without constraint ador'd,
 Held high the steady scale, but sheath'd the sword; 251
 No spies were paid, no special juries known;
 Blest age! but ah, how different from our own!
 "Much could I add, but see the boat at hand,
 The tide retiring calls me from the land: 255
 Farewell!—When youth, and health, and fortune spent,
 Thou fly'st for refuge to the wilds of Kent
 And, tir'd like me with follies and with crimes,
 In angry numbers warn'st succeeding times;
 Then shall thy friend, nor thou refuse his aid,
 Still foe to vice, forsake his Cambrian shade;
 In Virtue's cause once more exert his rage, 262
 Thy satire point, and animate thy page."

PROLOGUE

SPOKEN BY MR. GARRICK AT THE OPENING OF
 THE THEATRE ROYAL, DRURY LANE, 1747

When Learning's triumph o'er her barb'rous foes
 First rear'd the stage, immortal Shakespeare rose;
 Each change of many-color'd life he drew,
 Exhausted worlds, and then imagin'd new:
 Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign, 5
 And panting Time toil'd after him in vain.
 His pow'ful strokes presiding Truth impress'd,
 And unresisted Passion storm'd the breast.
 Then Jonson came, instructed from the school,
 To please in method, and invent by rule; 10
 His studious patience and laborious art,
 By regular approach, assail'd the heart:
 Cold Approbation gave the ling'ring bays,
 For those, who durst not censure, scarce could praise.

A mortal born, he met the gen'ral doom, 15
 But left, like Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb.
 The wits of Charles found easier ways to fame,
 Nor wish'd for Jonson's art, or Shakespeare's flame.
 Themselves they studied; as they felt, they writ;
 Intrigue was plot, obscenity was wit. 20
 Vice always found a sympathetic friend;
 They pleas'd their age, and did not aim to mend.
 Yet bards like these aspir'd to lasting praise,
 And proudly hoped to pimp in future days.
 Their cause was gen'ral, their supports were strong, 25
 Their slaves were willing, and their reign was long:
 Till Shame regain'd the post that Sense betray'd,
 And Virtue call'd Oblivion to her aid.
 Then, crush'd by rules, and weaken'd as refin'd,
 For years the power of Tragedy declin'd; 30
 From bard to bard the frigid caution crept,
 Till Declamation roar'd whilst Passion slept;
 Yet still did Virtue deign the state to tread,
 Philosophy remain'd, though Nature fled,
 But forc'd, at length, her ancient reign to quit, 35
 She saw great Faustus<sup>1</sup> lay the ghost of Wit;
 Exulting Folly hail'd the joyful day,
 And Pantomime and Song confirm'd her sway.
 But who the coming changes can presage,
 And mark the future periods of the Stage? 40
 Perhaps, if skill could distant times explore,
 New Behns,<sup>2</sup> new Durfey's,<sup>3</sup> yet remain in store;
 Perhaps where Lear has rav'd, and Hamlet died,
 On flying cars new sorcerers may ride:
 Perhaps (for who can guess th' effects of chance?) 45
 Here Hunt<sup>4</sup> may box, or Mahomet<sup>5</sup> may dance.

Hard is his lot that here by Fortune plac'd
 Must watch the wild vicissitudes of taste;
 With ev'ry meteor of caprice must play,
 And chase the new-blown bubbles of the day. 50
 Ah! let not Censure term our fate our choice,
 The stage but echoes back the public voice;
 The drama's laws, the drama's patrons give,
 For we that live to please, must please to live.
 Then prompt no more the follies you decry, 55
 As tyrants doom their tools of guilt to die;

<sup>1</sup> The story of Dr. Faustus was made the subject of a farcical pantomime by Thurmond, produced at Drury Lane in 1724. Similar farces were much in vogue for several seasons in London, and were satirized by Pope in the Dunciad, III, ll. 233, ff.

<sup>2</sup> Aphra Behn (1640–1689), a novelist and playwright. Her plays were noted for their low moral tone.

<sup>3</sup> Thomas Durfey (1653–1723) a minor poet, and a writer of comedies and songs.

<sup>25</sup> A reference to the frequent and unpopular visits of George II. to his continental possessions.

'Tis yours, this night, to bid the reign commence
 Of rescued Nature and reviving Sense;
 To chase the charms of Sound, the pomp of Show,
 For useful Mirth and salutary Woe; 60
 Bid scenic Virtue form the rising age,
 And Truth diffuse her radiance from the stage.

THE ART OF PRESERVING HEALTH (1744)

Ye, who amid this feverish world would wear
 A body free of pain, of cares a mind;
 Fly the rank city, shun its turbid air;
 Breathe not the chaos of eternal smoke
 And volatile corruption, from the dead, 5
 The dying, sick'ning and the living world
 Exhal'd, to sully Heaven's transparent dome
 With dim mortality. It is not air
 That from a thousand lungs reeks back to thine,
 Sated with exhalations rank and fell, 10
 The spoils of dunghills, and the putrid thaw
 Of nature; when from shape and texture she Relapses into fighting elements:
 It is not air, but floats a nauseous mass
 Of all obscene, corrupt, offensive things. 15
 Much moisture hurts; but here a sordid bath,
 With oily rancour fraught, relaxes more
 The solid frame, than simple moisture can.
 Besides, immur'd in many a sullen bay
 That never felt the freshness of the breeze, 20
 This slumb'ring deep remains, and ranker grows
 With sickly rest; and (though the lungs abhor
 To drink the dun fuliginous abyss)<sup>1</sup>
 Did not the acid vigor of the mine,
 Roll'd from so many thundering chimneys,
 tame 25
 The putrid steams that overswarm the sky;
 This caustic venom would perhaps corrode
 Those tender cells that draw the vital air,
 In vain with all their unctuous rills bedew'd. . . .
 While yet you breathe, away; the rural wilds
 Invite; the mountains call you, and the vales; 35
 The woods, the streams, and each ambrosial
 breeze
 That fans the ever undulating sky;
 A kindly sky! whose fost'ring pow'r regales
 Man, beast, and all the vegetable reign. . . . 39
 Behold the laborer of the glebe, who toils
 In dust, in rain, in cold and sultry skies!
 Save but the grain from mildews and the flood,
 Nought anxious he what sickly stars ascend. 45
 He knows no laws by Esculapius<sup>2</sup> given;
 He studies none. Yet him nor midnight fogs
 Infest, nor those venom'd shafts that fly
 When rabid Sirius<sup>3</sup> fires th' autumnal noon.

His habit pure with plain and temperate meals,
 Robust with labour, and by custom steel'd 51
 To every casualty of varied life;
 Serene he bears the peevish eastern blast,
 And uninfected breathes the mortal south.
 Such the reward of rude and sober life; 55
 Of labor such. By health the peasant's toil
 Is well repaid: if exercise were pain
 Indeed, and temperance pain. By arts like these
 Laconia<sup>4</sup> nurs'd of old her hardy sons;
 And Rome's unconquer'd legions urg'd their
 way 60
 Unhurt, through every toil, in every clime.
 Toil, and be strong. By toil the flaccid nerves
 Grow firm, and gain a more compacted tone;
 The greener juices, are by toil subdu'd,
 Mellow'd and subtiliz'd, the vapid old 65
 Expell'd, and all the rancor of the blood.
 Come, my companions, ye who feel the charms
 Of Nature and the year; come, let us stray
 Where chance or fancy leads our roving walk.
 Come, while the soft voluptuous breezes fan 70
 The fleecy heavens, enwrap the limbs in balm,
 And shed a charming languor o'er the soul.
 Nor when bright Winter sows with prickly
 frost
 The vigorous ether, in unmanly warmth
 Indulge at home; nor even when Eurus' blasts 75
 This way and that convolve the lab'ring woods.
 My liberal walks, save when the skies in rain
 Or fogs relent, no season should confine
 Or to the cloister'd gallery or arcade.
 Go, climb the mountain; from th' ethereal source 80
 Imbibe the recent gale. The cheerful morn Beams o'er the hills; go, mount th' exulting steed.
 Already, see, the deep-mouth'd beagles catch
 The tainted mazes; and, on eager sport
 Intent, with emulous impatience try 85
 Each doubtful trace. Or, if a nobler prey
 Delight you more, go chase the desperate deer;
 And through its deepest solitude awake
 The vocal forest with the jovial horn.
 But if the breathless chase o'er hill and dale 90
 Exceed your strength, a sport of less fatigue,
 Not less delightful, the prolific stream
 Affords. The crystal rivulet, that o'er
 A stony channel rolls its rapid maze, Swarms with the silver fry. Such, through the bounds 95
 Of pastoral Stafford,<sup>5</sup> runs the brawling Trent;
 Such Eden,<sup>6</sup> sprung from Cumbrian mountains;
 such
 The Esk, o'erhung with woods; and such the stream
 On whose Arcadian banks I first drew air,
 Liddel;<sup>7</sup> till now, except in Doric lays 100
 Tun'd to her murmurs by her love-sick swains,
 Unknown in song; though not a purer stream,

<sup>2</sup> A physician mentioned by Homer, afterwards considered to be the god of medicine.

<sup>6</sup> A small river in Roxburghshire. Armstrong was born at Castleton in that shire.

<sup>7</sup> Used for Staffordshire.

Through meads more flowery, or more romantic groves,
Rolls toward the western main. Hail, sacred flood!

May still thy hospitable swains be blest 105
In rural innocence; thy mountains still Teem with the fleecy race; thy tuneful woods
For ever flourish; and thy vales look gay
With painted meadows, and the golden grain!
Oft, with thy blooming sons, when life was new,
Sportive and petulant, and charm'd with toys,
In thy transparent eddies have I lav'd: 112
Oft trac'd with patient steps thy fairy banks,
With the well-imitated fly to hook
The eager trout, and with the slender line 115
And yielding rod solicit to the shore
The struggling, panting prey: while vernal clouds

And tepid gales' obscur'd the ruffled pool,
And from the deeps called forth the wanton swarms.

Form'd on the Samian school,<sup>s</sup> or those of Ind, 120
There are who think these pastimes scarce humane:

Yet in my mind (and not relentless)
His life is pure that wears no fouler stains. . . .

Ah! in what perils is vain life engag'd!
What slight neglects, what trivial faults
destroy 125

The hardest frame! of indolence, of toil,
We die; of want, of superfluity:
The all-surrounding Heaven, the vital air,
Is big with death. And, though the putrid
South

Be shut: though no convulsive agony 130
Shake, from the deep foundations of the world,
Th' imprisoned plagues; a secret venom oft
Corrupts the air, the water, and the land.
What livid deaths has sad Bysantium seen!
How oft has Cairo, with a mother's woe, 135 Wept o'er her slaughter'd sons, and lonely streets!

Even Albion, girt with less malignant skies,
Albion the poison of the gods has drunk,
And felt the sting of monsters all her own.

THE SCHOOLMISTRESS

(From The Schoolmistress, 1742)

Ah me! full sorely is my heart forlorn,
To think how modest worth neglected lies!
While partial fame doth with her blast adorn
Such deeds alone, as pride and pomp disguise;
Deeds of ill sort, and mischievous emprise! 5
Lend me thy clarion, goddess! let me try
To sound the praise of merit, ere it dies;
Such as I oft have chanced to espy,
Lost in the dreary shades of dull obscurity.

<sup>s</sup> The school of Pythagoras, who prescribed abstinence from animal food, as did many of the Hindus and Buddhists.

In ev'ry village mark'd with little spire, 10
Embow'rd in trees, and hardly known to
fame,

There dwells, in lowly shed, and mean attire,
A matron old, whom we school-mistress name;
Who boasts unruly brats with birch to tame;
They griev'd sore, in piteous durance pent, 15
Aw'd by the pow'r of this relentless dame;
And oft times, on vag'ries idly bent,
For unkempt hair, or task unconn'd, are sorely shent.<sup>1</sup>

And all in sight doth rise a birchen tree,
Which learning near her little dome<sup>2</sup> did stowe; 20

Whilom a twig of small regard to see,
Though now so wide its waving branches
flow;

And work the simple vassal mickle woe;
For not a wind might curl the leaves that
blew,

But their limbs shudder'd, and their pulse beat low; 25

And, as they look'd, they found their horror grew,
And shap'd it into rods, and tingled at the view.

So have I seen (who has not, may conceive),
A lifeless phantom near a garden plac'd;
So doth it wanton birds of peace bereave, 30
Of sport, of song, of pleasure, of repast;
They start, they stare, they wheel, they look
aghast;

Sad servitude! such comfortless annoy
May no bold Briton's riper age e'er taste!
Ne superstition clog his dance of joy, 35
Ne vision empty, vain, his native bliss destroy.

Near to his dome is found a patch so green,
On which the tribe their gambols do display;
And at the door impris'ning board is seen,
Lest weakly wights of smaller size should
stray; 40

Eager, perdie,<sup>3</sup> to bask in sunny day!
The noises intermix'd, which thence resound,
Do learning's little tenement betray:
Where sits the dame, disguis'd in look profound,

And eyes her fairy throng, and turns her wheel
around. 45

Her cap, far whiter than the driven snow,
Emblem right meet of decency does yield:
Her apron dy'd in grain, as blue, I trow,
As is the hare-bell that adorns the field:
And in her hand, for sceptre, she does wield 50
Tway<sup>4</sup> birchen sprays; with anxious fear en-twin'd;

With dark distrust, and sad repentance
fill'd;
And stedfast hate, and sharp affliction
join'd,
And fury uncontroll'd, and chastisement un-
kind. . . .

<sup>1</sup> Disgraced.
<sup>3</sup> Forsooth.

<sup>2</sup> Home.
<sup>4</sup> Two.

A russet stole was o'er her shoulders thrown;
 A russet kirtle fenc'd the nipping air; 65
 'Twas simple russet, but it was her own;
 'Twas her own country bred the flock so fair;
 'Twas her own labour did the fleece prepare;
 And, sooth to say, her pupils, rang'd around,
 Through pious awe, did term it passing rare!
 For they in gaping wonderment abound, 71
 And think, no doubt, she been the greatest wight<sup>5</sup> on ground.

Albeit ne flatt'ry did corrupt her truth,
 Ne pompous title did debauch her ear;
 Goody,<sup>6</sup> good-woman, gossip, n'aunt, for-
 sooth, 75
 Or dame, the sole additions she did hear;
 Yet these she challeng'd, these she held right
 dear!
 Ne would esteem him act as mought behove,
 Who should not honour'd eld with these revere;<sup>7</sup>
 For never title yet so mean could prove,
 But there was eke a mind which did that title
 love. 81

One ancient hen she took delight to feed,
 The plodding pattern of the busy dame;
 Which ever and anon, impell'd by need, 84
 Into her school, begirt with chickens, came!
 Such favour did her past deportment claim:
 And, if neglect had lavish'd on the ground Fragment of bread, she would collect the same;
 For well she knew, and quaintly could expound,
 What sin it were to waste the smallest crumb
 she found. 90

Herbs too she knew, and well of each could speak
 That in her garden sipt the silv'ry dew;
 Where no vain flow'r disclos'd a gaudy streak;
 But herbs for use, and physic, not a few, 94
 Of grey renown, within those borders grew:
 The tufted basil, pun-provoking thyme,
 Fresh balm, and marygold of cheerful hue;
 The lowly gill, that never dares to climb;
 And more I fain would sing, disdaining here to
 rhyme. . . . 99

In elbow-chair, like that of Scottish stem,<sup>8</sup>
 By the sharp tooth of cank'ring eld defac'd,
 In which, when he receives his diadem,
 Our sov'reign prince and liefast liege is plac'd,
 The matron sat; and some with rank she grac'd, 140
 (The source of children's and of courtier's pride!)
 Redress'd affronts, for vile affronts there pass'd;

And warn'd them not the fretful to deride,
 But love each other dear, whatever them betide

<sup>5</sup> Person.

<sup>6</sup> Goodwife: gossip=godmother, also a term of respect.

<sup>8</sup> In a chair like that in which the English Kings are crowned, containing the Stone of Scone. It was the stone, however, not the chair which was of Scottish origin or stem.

Right well she knew each temper to descry;
 To thwart the proud, and the submiss to
 raise; 146
 Some with vile copper prize exalt on high,
 And some entice with pittance small of praise!
 And other some with baleful sprig she
 'frays;<sup>9</sup>
 Ev'n absent, she the reins of pow'r doth hold, While with quaint arts the giddy crowd she sways; 151
 Forewarn'd, if little bird their pranks behold,
 'Twill whisper in her ear, and all the scene unfold.

Lo now with state she utters the command!
 Eftsoons the urchins to their tasks repair; 155
 Their books of stature small they take in hand,
 Which with pellucid horn<sup>10</sup> secur'd are;
 So save from finger wet the letters fair:
 The work so gay, that on their back is seen,
 St. George's high achievements does declare;
 On which thilk wight<sup>11</sup> that has y-gazing been, 161
 Kens the forth-coming rod, unpleasing sight, I ween!

Ah luckless he, and born beneath the beam
 Of evil star! it irks me whilst I write!
 As erst the bard<sup>12</sup> by Mulla's silver stream,
 Oft, as he told of deadly dolourous plight, 166
 Sigh'd as he sung, and did in tears indite.
 For brandishing the rod, she doth begin
 To loose the brogues,<sup>13</sup> the stripling's late delight!
 And down they drop; appears his dainty skin, 170
 Fair as the furry coat of whitest erminin.<sup>14</sup>

O ruthless scene! when from a nook obscure,
 His little sister doth his peril see:
 All playful as she sat, she grows demure;
 She finds full soon her wonted spirits flee; 175
 She meditates a pray'r to set him free:
 Nor gentle pardon could this dame deny,
 (If gentle pardon could with dames agree),
 To her sad grief that dwells in either eye,
 And wrings her so that all for pity she could
 die. 180

No longer can she now her shrieks command;
 And hardly she forbears, thro' awful fear,
 To rushen forth, and, with presumptuous
 hand,
 To stay harsh justice in its mid career.
 On thee she calls, on thee her parent dear! 185
 (Ah! too remote to ward the shameful blow!)
 She sees no kind domestic visage near,
 And soon a flood of tears begins to flow;
 And gives a loose at last to unavailing woe.

<sup>9</sup> Terrifics.

<sup>11</sup> Each one. <sup>12</sup> Spenser. <sup>13</sup> Trousers. <sup>14</sup> Ermine.

But ah! what pen his piteous plight may trace? 190

Or what device his loud laments explain?
The form uncouth of his disguised face?

The pallid hue that dyes his looks amain?
The plenteous show'r that does his cheek dis-
tain? 195

When he, in abject wise, implores the dame,
Ne hopeth aught of sweet reprieve to gain;
Or when from high she levels well her aim,
And, thro' the thatch, his cries each falling stroke proclaim.

The other tribe, aghast, with sore dismay,
Attend, and conn their tasks with mickle
care: 201

By turns, astony'd, ev'ry twig survey,
And, from their fellow's hateful wounds,
beware;

Knowing, I wist, how each the same may share;

Till fear has taught them a performance
meet,

And to the well-known chest the dame repair; 206

Whence oft with sugar'd cates<sup>18</sup> she doth 'em greet,

And ginger-bread y-rare; now, certes, doubly
sweet! . . .

His face besprent<sup>17</sup> with liquid crystal shines,
His blooming face that seems a purple
flow'r,

Which low to earth its drooping head declines, 220

All smeared and sully'd by a vernal show'r.
O the hard bosoms of despotic pow'r!

All, all, but she, the author of his shame,
All, all, but she, regret this mournful hour:

Yet hence the youth, and hence the flow'r, shall claim, 225

If so I deem aright, transcending worth and fame.

Behind some door, in melancholy thought,
Mindless of food, he, dreary caitiff! pines;

Ne for his fellow's joyance careth aught,
But to the wind all merriment resigns; 230

And deems it shame, if he to peace inclines;
And many a sullen look askance is sent,

Which for his dame's annoyance he designs;
And still the more to pleasure him she's bent,

The more doth he, perverse, her haviour past resent. 235

Ah me! how much I fear lest pride it bel
But if that pride it be, which thus inspires,

Beware, ye dames, with nice discernment see,
Ye quench not too the sparks of nobler fires:

Ah! better far than all the muses' lyres, 240
All coward arts, is valour's gen'rous heat;

The firm fix'd breast which fit and right requires,

Like Vernon's<sup>18</sup> patriot soul; more justly great

Than craft that pimps for ill, or flow'ry false deceit.

Yet nurs'd with skill, what dazzling fruits appear! 245

Ev'n now sagacious foresight points to show
A little bench of heedless bishops here,

And there a chancellor in embryo,
Or bard sublime, if bard may e'er be so,

As Milton, Shakespeare, names that ne'er shall die! 250

Tho' now he crawl along the ground so low,
Nor weeting<sup>19</sup> how the muse should soar on
high,

Wisheth, poor starv'ling elf! his paper-kite may fly.

And this perhaps, who, cens'ring the design,
Low lays the house which that of cards doth build, 255

Shall Dennis<sup>20</sup> be! if rigid fates incline,
And many an epic to his rage shall yield;

And many a poet quit th' Aonian field;<sup>21</sup>
And, sour'd by age, profound he shall appear,

As he who now with 'sdainful fury thrill'd 260
Surveys mine work; and levels many a sneer,

And furls his wrinkly front, and cries, "What stuff is here?"

But now Dan Phæbus<sup>22</sup> gains the middle sky,
And liberty unbars her prison-door;

And like a rushing torrent out they fly, 265
And now the grassy cirque han<sup>23</sup> cover'd o'er

With boistrous revel-rout and wild uproar;
A thousand ways in wanton rings they run,

Heav'n shield their short-liv'd pastimes, I implore!

For well may freedom, erst so dearly won, 270 Appear to British elf more gladsome than the sun.

Enjoy, poor imps! enjoy your sportive trade;
And chase gay flies, and cull the fairest
flow'rs;

For when my bones in grass-green sods are laid;

For never may ye taste more careless hours
In knightly castles, or in ladies bow'rs. 276

O vain to seek delight in earthly thing!
But most in courts where proud ambition
tow'rs;

Deluded wight! who weens fair peace can
spring

Beneath the pompous dome of kesar<sup>24</sup> or of king. 280

WRITTEN AT AN INN AT HENLEY

To thee, fair Freedom! I retire
From flatt'ry, cards, and dice, and din;
Nor art thou found in mansions higher
Than the low cot, or humble inn.

'Tis here with boundless pow'r I reign; 5
And ev'ry health which I begin,
Converts dull port to bright champaigne;
Such freedom crowns it, at an inn.

I fly from pomp, I fly from plate!
I fly from falsehood's specious grin! 10
Freedom I love, and form I hate,
And choose my lodgings at an inn.

Here, waiter, take my sordid ore,
Which lacqueys else might hope to win;
It buys what courts have not in store; 15
It buys me freedom, at an inn.

Whoe'er has travell'd life's dull round,
Where'er his stages may have been,
May sigh to think he still has found 20
The warmest welcome, at an inn.

THE DESERTED VILLAGE

(1770)

Sweet Auburn!<sup>1</sup> loveliest village of the plain,
Where health and plenty cheer'd the labouring
swain,

Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's lingering blooms delay'd:

Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease, 5
Seats of my youth, when every sport could
please,

How often have I loiter'd o'er thy green,
Where humble happiness endear'd each scene!
How often have I paus'd on every charm,

The shelter'd cot, the cultivated farm, 10
The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that topt the neighbouring
hill,

The hawthorn bush with seats beneath the
shade,

For talking age and whispering lovers made!
How often have I blest the coming day 15
When toil remitting lent its turn to play,

<sup>1</sup> Some of the details of the poem are thought to have been suggested by the village of Lissoy in Ireland, where Goldsmith's childhood was spent; but in his account of the desertion of the village, the poet is true to conditions that actually prevailed in England at that time. Throughout the land a new aristocracy of wealth was pushing aside the small farmer (ll. 270-280); the harvests were correspondingly diminished; and even the commons, formerly opened to the poor, were shut off, or "denied" (l. 307). Luxury, which Goldsmith regards as the source of national corruption, was also increasing in consequence of a rapid growth in material prosperity.

And all the village train from labour free,
Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree;

While many a pastime circled in the shade,
The young contending as the old survey'd, 20
And many a gambol frolick'd o'er the ground,
And sleights of art and feats of strength went round!

And still, as each repeated pleasure tir'd,
Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspir'd;
The dancing pair that simply sought renown 25
By holding out to tire each other down,
The swain mistrustless of his smutt'd face,
While secret laughter titter'd round the place,
The bashful virgin's sidelong looks of love,
The matron's glance that would those looks reprove. 30

These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like these,
With sweet succession, taught even toil to please;

These round thy bowers their cheerful influence
shed;

These were thy charms—but all these charms are fled.

Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn, 35
Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn;

Amidst thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green:

One only master grasps the whole domain,
And half a tillage stints thy smiling plain. 40

No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
But chok'd with sedges, works its weedy way;
Along thy glades, a solitary guest,

The hollow-sounding bittern guards its nest;
Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies, 45
And tires thy echoes with unvaried cries:

Sunk are thy bowers in shapeless ruin all,
And the long grass o'ertops the mouldering wall;
And, trembling, shrinking from the spoiler's
hand,

Far, far away thy children leave the land. 50

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade—
A breath can make them, as a breath has made—

But a bold peasantry, their country's pride, 55
When once destroy'd, can never be supplied.

A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
When every rood of ground maintain'd its man:
For him light labour spread her wholesome
store,

Just gave what life requir'd, but gave no
more;

His best companions, innocence and health, 61
And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.

But times are alter'd; trade's unfeeling train
Usurp the land, and dispossess the swain:

Along the lawn where scatter'd hamlets rose, 65
Unwieldy wealth and cumbrous pomp repose,

And every want to opulence allied,
And every pang that folly pays to pride.

Those gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
Those calm desires that ask'd but little room, 70

Those healthful sports that grac'd the peaceful scene,
Liv'd in each look and brighten'd all the green—

These, far departing, seek a kinder shore,
And rural mirth and manners are no more.

Sweet Auburn! parent of the blissful hour, 75
Thy glades forlorn confess the tyrant's power.
Here, as I take my solitary rounds
Amidst thy tangling walks and ruin'd grounds,
And, many a year elaps'd, return to view
Where once the cottage stood, the hawthorn
grew, 80

Remembrance wakes with all her busy train,
Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.

In all my wanderings round this world of care
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—

I still had hopes, my latest hours to crown, 85
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting by repose.
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learn'd skill, 90

Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And as an hare whom hounds and horns pursue
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past, 95
Here to return—and die at home at last.

O blest retirement, friend to life's decline,
Retreats from care, that never must be mine!
How happy he who crowns, in shades like these,
A youth of labour with an age of ease; 100
Who quits a world where strong temptations try,

And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly!
For him no wretches, born to work and weep,
Explore the mine, or tempt the dangerous deep;
Nor surly porter stands, in guilty state, 105
To spurn imploring famine from the gate;
But on he moves to meet his latter end,
Angels around befriending virtue's friend,
Bends to the grave with unperceiv'd decay,
While resignation gently slopes the way, 110
And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
His heaven commences ere the world be past.

Sweet was the sound, when oft at evening's close

Up yonder hill the village murmur rose.
There as I passed with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came soften'd from below: 116

The swain responsive as the milkmaid sung,
The sober herd that low'd to meet their young,
The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
The playful children just let loose from school,
The watch-dog's voice that bay'd the whispering wind, 121

And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant
mind—

These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,
And fill'd each pause the nightingale had made.
But now the sounds of population fail, 125
No cheerful murmurs fluctuate in the gale,

No busy steps the grass-grown footway tread,
For all the bloomy flush of life is fled—
All but yon widow'd, solitary thing,
That feebly bends beside the plashy spring; 130
She, wretched matron—forc'd in age, for bread,
To strip the brook with mantling cresses spread,
To pick her wintry faggot from the thorn,
To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn—
She only left of all the harmless train, 135
The sad historian of the pensive plain!

Near yonder copse, where once the garden
smil'd,

And still where many a garden-flower grows wild,

There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,

The village preacher's modest mansion rose. 140
A man he was to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year.
Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
Nor e'er had chang'd, nor wish'd to change his
place;

Unpractis'd he to fawn, or seek for power 145
By doctrines fashion'd to the varying hour;
Far other aims his heart had learn'd to prize,
More skill'd to raise the wretched than to rise.
His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings, but reliev'd their
pain; 150

The long-remember'd beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
The ruin'd spendthrift, now no longer proud,
Claim'd kindred there, and had his claims al-
low'd;

The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay, 155
Sat by his fire, and talk'd the night away,
Wept o'er his wounds, or, tales of sorrow done, Shoulder'd his crutch and show'd how fields were won.

Pleas'd with his guests, the good man learn'd to glow,

And quite forgot their vices in their woe; 160
Careless their merits or their faults to scan,
His pity gave ere charity began.

Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And even his failings lean'd to virtue's side;
But in his duty prompt at every call, 165
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for
all:

And, as a bird each fond endearment tries
To tempt its new-fledg'd offspring to the skies,
He tried each art, reprov'd each dull delay,
Allur'd to brighter worlds, and led the way. 170

Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
And sorrow, guilt, and pain by turns dismay'd,
The reverend champion stood: at his control
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
Comfort came down the trembling wretch to
raise, 175

And his last faltering accents whisper'd praise.

At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorn'd the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
And fools who came to scoff remained to pray.
The service past, around the pious man, 181
With ready zeal, each honest rustic ran;

Even children follow'd, with endearing wile,
And pluck'd his gown, to share the good man's smile:

His ready smile a parent's warmth exprest, 185
Their welfare pleas'd him, and their cares dis-trest.

To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,

But all his serious thoughts had rest in heaven:
As some tall cliff, that lifts its awful form, Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm, 190

Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,

Eternal sunshine settles on its head.

Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the
way,

With blossom'd furze unprofitably gay,
There, in his noisy mansion, skill'd to rule, 195

The village master taught his little school.
A man severe he was, and stern to view;
I knew him well, and every truant knew:

Well had the boding tremblers learn'd to trace
The day's disasters in his morning face; 200

Full well they laugh'd with counterfeited glee
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;

Full well the busy whisper, circling round,
Convey'd the dismal tidings when he frown'd;

Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught, 205
The love he bore to learning was in fault.

The village all declar'd how much he knew;
'Twas certain he could write, and cipher too,

Lands he could measure, terms and tides
presage,

And even the story ran that he could gauge. 210
In arguing too the parson own'd his skill,

For even though vanquish'd, he could argue still;
While words of learned length and thundering
sound

Amaz'd the gazing rustics rang'd around;
And still they gaz'd, and still the wonder grew
That one small head could carry all he knew. 216

But past is all his fame: the very spot,
Where many a time he triumph'd, is forgot.

Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on high,
Where once the sign-post caught the passing
eye, 220

Low lies that house where nut-brown draughts
inspir'd,

Where gray-beard mirth and smiling toil retir'd,
Where village statesmen talk'd with looks pro-
found,

And news much older than their ale went round.

Imagination fondly stoops to trace 225
The parlour splendours of that festive place:
The whitewash'd wall, the nicely sanded floor,
The varnish'd clock that click'd behind the door;

The chest contriv'd a double debt to pay,
A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day; 230

The pictures plac'd for ornament and use,
The twelve good rules,<sup>2</sup> the royal game of goose;

The hearth, except when winter chill'd the day,
With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel
gay,

While broken tea-cups, wisely kept for show, 235
Rang'd o'er the chimney, glisten'd in a row.

Vain transitory splendours! could not all
Relieve the tottering mansion from its fall?
Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart
An hour's importance to the poor man's heart.

Thither no more the peasant shall repair 241
To sweet oblivion of his daily care;
No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale,
No more the woodman's ballad shall prevail;
No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to
hear; 246

The host himself no longer shall be found
Careful to see the mantling bliss go round;
Nor the coy maid, half willing to be prest,
Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest. 250

Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain,
These simple blessings of the lowly train;
To me more dear, congenial to my heart,
One native charm, than all the gloss of art;
Spontaneous joys, where nature has its play,
The soul adopts, and owns their first-born
sway; 256

Lightly they frolic o'er the vacant mind,
Unenvied, unmolested, unconfin'd.

But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
With all the freaks of wanton wealth array'd,
In these, ere triflers half their wish obtain, 261
The toiling pleasure sickens into pain;
And, even while fashion's brightest arts decoy,
The heart distrusting asks, if this be joy?

Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen who survey
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand 267
Between a splendid and a happy land.
Proud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore,
And shouting Folly hails them from her shore;
Hoards even beyond the miser's wish abound,
And rich men flock from all the world around;
Yet count our gains: this wealth is but a name
That leaves our useful products still the same.
Not so the loss. The man of wealth and pride
Takes up a space that many poor supplied—276
Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds:
The robe that wraps his limbs in silken sloth
Has robbed the neighbouring fields of half their growth; 280

His seat, where solitary spots are seen,
Indignant spurns the cottage from the green;
Around the world each needful product flies,
For all the luxuries the world supplies.
While thus the land, adorn'd for pleasure, all 285
In barren splendour feebly waits the fall.

As some fair female, unadorn'd and plain,
Secure to please while youth confirms her reign,
Slights every borrow'd charm that dress supplies,
Nor shares with art the triumph of her eyes; 290
But when those charms are past, for charms are frail,
When time advances, and when lovers fail,

<sup>2</sup> Twelve rules of conduct, ascribed to Charles I and frequently displayed in public houses and inns.

She then shines forth, solicitous to bless,
 In all the glaring impotence of dress:
 Thus fares the land, by luxury betray'd; 295
 In nature's simplest charms at first array'd,
 But verging to decline, its splendours rise,
 Its vistas strike, its palaces surprise;
 While, scourg'd by famine from the smiling
 land,
 The mournful peasant leads his humble band;
 And while he sinks, without one arm to save, 301

The country blooms—a garden, and a grave.
 Where then, ah! where shall poverty reside,
 To 'scape the pressure of contiguous pride?
 If to some common's fenceless limits stray'd 305
 He drives his flock to pick the scanty blade,
 Those fenceless fields the sons of wealth divide,
 And even the bare-worn common is denied.

If to the city sped—what waits him there?
 To see profusion that he must not share; 310
 To see ten thousand baneful arts combin'd
 To pamper luxury, and thin mankind;
 To see each joy the sons of pleasure know,
 Extorted from his fellow-creature's woe.
 Here, while the courtier glitters in brocade, 315
 There the pale artist plies the sickly trade;
 Here, while the proud their long-drawn poms display,

There, the black gibbet glooms beside the way.
 The dome where pleasure holds her midnight
 reign,
 Here, richly deck'd, admits the gorgeous
 train; 320

Tumultuous grandeur crowds the blazing
 square,
 The rattling chariots clash, the torches glare.
 Sure scenes like these no troubles e'er annoy!
 Sure these denote one universal joy!
 Are these thy serious thoughts? Ah, turn thine
 eyes 325

Where the poor houseless shivering female lies.
 She once, perhaps, in village plenty blest,
 Has wept at tales of innocence distress;
 Her modest looks the cottage might adorn,
 Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn;
 Now lost to all—her friends, her virtue fled—331
 Near her betrayer's door she lays her head,
 And, pinch'd with cold, and shrinking from the shower,

With heavy heart deploras that luckless hour
 When idly first, ambitious of the town, 335
 She left her wheel, and robes of country brown.

Do thine, sweet Auburn, thine, the loveliest
 train,

Do thy fair tribes participate her pain?
 Even now, perhaps, by cold and hunger led,
 At proud men's doors they ask a little bread. 340

Ah, no! To distant climes, a dreary scene,
 Where half the convex world intrudes between,
 Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,

Where wild Altama<sup>3</sup> murmurs to their woe.
 Far different there from all that charm'd
 before, 345

The various terrors of that horrid shore:

Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
 And fiercely shed intolerable day;
 Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
 But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling; 350
 Those poisonous fields with rank luxuriance
 crown'd,

Where the dark scorpion gathers death around;
 Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
 The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake;
 Where crouching tigers wait their hapless prey,
 And savage men more murderous still than they; 356

While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
 Mingling the ravag'd landscape with the skies.
 Far different these from every former scene,
 The cooling brook, the grassy-vested green, 360
 The breezy covert of the warbling grove,
 That only shelter'd thefts of harmless love.

Good Heaven! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,

That call'd them from their native walks away;
 When the poor exiles, every pleasure past, 365
 Hung round the bowers, and fondly look'd
 their last,

And took a long farewell, and wish'd in vain
 For seats like these beyond the western main;
 And shuddering still to face the distant deep,
 Return'd and wept, and still return'd to weep.
 The good old sire the first prepar'd to go 371
 To new-found worlds, and wept for other's woe;
 But for himself, in conscious virtue brave,
 He only wish'd for worlds beyond the grave.

His lovely daughter, lovelier in her tears, 375
 The fond companion of his helpless years,
 Silent went next, neglectful of her charms,
 And left a lover's for a father's arms.
 With louder plaints the mother spoke her woes,
 And blest the cot where every pleasure rose, 380
 And kiss'd her thoughtless babes with many a tear,

And clasp'd them close, in sorrow doubly dear;
 Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief
 In all the silent manliness of grief.

O Luxury! thou curst by Heaven's decree, 385
 How ill exchang'd are things like these for thee!
 How do thy potions, with insidious joy,
 Diffuse their pleasures only to destroy!

Kingdoms by thee, to sickly greatness grown,
 Boast of a florid vigour not their own: 390

At every draught more large and large they grow,

A bloated mass of rank, unwieldy woe;
 Till sapp'd their strength, and every part un-
 sound,

Down, down they sink, and spread a ruin round.
 Even now the devastation is begun, 395

And half the business of destruction done;
 Even now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
 I see the rural Virtues leave the land.

Down where yon anchoring vessel spreads the sail

That idly waiting flaps with every gale, 400
 Downward they move, a melancholy band,
 Pass from the shore, and darken all the strand.
 Contented Toil, and hospitable Care,
 And kind connubial Tenderness are there:

<sup>3</sup> The river Altamaha, or Alahamha, in Georgia.

And Piety with wishes placed above, 405
 And steady Loyalty, and faithful Love.
 And thou, sweet Poetry, thou loveliest maid,
 Still first to fly where sensual joys invade;
 Unfit in these degenerate times of shame 409
 To catch the heart, or strike for honest fame;
 Dear, charming nymph, neglected and decried,
 My shame in crowds, my solitary pride,
 Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
 Thou found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me
 so;
 Thou guide by which the noble arts excel, 415
 Thou nurse of every virtue, fare thee well!
 Farewell! and O where'er thy voice be tried,
 On Torno's<sup>4</sup> cliffs or Pambamarca's<sup>5</sup> side,
 Whether where equinoctial fervours glow,
 Or winter wraps the polar world in snow, 420
 Still let thy voice, prevailing over time,
 Redress the rigours of the inclement clime;
 Aid slighted truth with thy persuasive strain;
 Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain;
 Teach him, that states of native strength posset, 425
 Though very poor, may still be very blest;
 That trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,
 As ocean sweeps the labour'd mole away;
 While self-dependent power can time defy,
 As rocks resist the billows and the sky. 430

THE HERMIT

A BALLAD

(1766)

"Turn, gentle Hermit of the dale,
 And guide my lonely way,
 To where yon taper cheers the vale
 With hospitable ray.
 "For here forlorn and lost I tread, 5
 With fainting steps and slow;
 Where wilds, immeasurably spread,
 Seem length'ning as I go."
 "Forbear, my son," the Hermit cries,
 "To tempt the dangerous gloom; 10
 For yonder faithless phantom flies
 To lure thee to thy doom.
 "Here to the houseless child of want
 My door is open still;
 And though my portion is but scant, 15
 I give it with good will.
 "Then turn to-night, and freely share
 Whate'er my cell bestows,
 My rushy couch and frugal fare,
 My blessing and repose. 20
 "No flocks that range the valley free
 To slaughter I condemn;
 Taught by that Power that pities me,
 I learn to pity them.

<sup>4</sup> Possibly the river Torno, flowing into the Gulf of Bothnia; or Lake Torno in Northern Sweden.

<sup>5</sup> Said to be a mountain near Quito, Ecuador.

"But from the mountain's grassy side 25
 A guiltless feast I bring;
 A scrip with herbs and fruits supplied,
 And water from the spring.
 "Then pilgrim, turn; thy cares forego;
 All earth-born cares are wrong; 30
 Man wants but little here below,
 Nor wants that little long."
 Soft as the dew from heaven descends,
 His gentle accents fell:
 The modest stranger lowly bends, 35
 And follows to the cell.
 Far in a wilderness obscure
 The lonely mansion lay,
 A refuge to the neighb'ring poor
 And strangers led astray. 40
 No stores beneath its humble thatch
 Required a master's care;
 The wicket, opening with a latch,
 Received the harmless pair.
 And now, when busy crowds retire 45
 To take their evening rest,
 The Hermit trimm'd his little fire,
 And cheer'd his pensive guest:
 And spread his vegetable store,
 And gaily pressed, and smiled; 50
 And, skill'd in legendary lore,
 The lingering hours beguiled.
 Around in sympathetic mirth
 Its tricks the kitten tries;
 The cricket chirrups in the hearth, 55
 The crackling faggot flies.
 But nothing could a charm impart
 To soothe the stranger's woe;
 For grief was heavy at his heart,
 And tears began to flow. 60
 His rising cares the Hermit spied,
 With answering care oppress;
 "And whence, unhappy youth," he cried,
 "The sorrows of thy breast?
 "From better habitations spurn'd, 65
 Reluctant dost thou rove?
 Or grieve for friendship unreturn'd
 Or unregarded love?
 "Alas! the joys that Fortune brings
 Are trifling, and decay; 70
 And those who prize the paltry things,
 More trifling still than they.
 "And what is friendship but a name,
 A charm that lulls to sleep;
 A shade that follows wealth or fame, 75
 But leaves the wretch to weep?"

"And love is still an emptier sound,
The modern fair-one's jest;
On earth unseen, or only found
To warm the turtle's nest. 80

"For shame, fond youth, thy sorrows hush,
And spurn the sex," he said;
But while he spoke, a rising blush
His love-lorn guest betray'd.

Surprised he sees new beauties rise, 85
Swift mantling to the view:
Like colours o'er the morning skies,
As bright, as transient too.

The bashful look, the rising breast,
Alternate spread alarms; 90
The lovely stranger stands confest
A maid in all her charms.

"And ah! forgive a stranger rude,
A wretch forlorn," she cried;
"Whose feet unhallow'd thus intrude 95
Where heaven and you reside.

"But let a maid thy pity share,
Whom love has taught to stray;
Who seeks for rest, but finds despair
Companion of her way. 100

"My father lived beside the Tyne;
A wealthy lord was he;
And all his wealth was mark'd as mine,—
He had but only me.

"To win me from his tender arms, 105
Unnumber'd suitors came;
Who praised me for imputed charms,
And felt or feign'd a flame.

"Each hour a mercenary crowd
With richest proffers strove; 110
Amongst the rest young Edwin bow'd
But never talk'd of love.

"In humble, simplest habit clad,
No wealth nor power had he;
Wisdom and worth were all he had, 115
But these were all to me.

"And when beside me in the dale
He carroll'd lays of love,
His breath lent fragrance to the gale,
And music to the grove. 120

"The blossom opening to the day,
The dews of heaven refined,
Could nought of purity display,
To emulate his mind.

"The dew, the blossom on the tree, 125
With charms inconstant shine;
Their charms were his, but, woe to me!
Their constancy was mine.

"For still I tried each fickle art,
Importunate and vain;
And while his passion touch'd my heart,
I triumph'd in his pain: 130

"Till quite dejected with my scorn,
He left me to my pride;
And sought a solitude forlorn, 135
In secret, where he d'ied.

"But mine the sorrow, mine the fault,
And well my life shall pay;
I'll seek the solitude he sought,
And stretch me where he lay. 140

"And there forlorn, despairing hid,
I'll lay me down and die;
'Twas so for me that Edwin did,
And so for him will I."

"Forbid it, Heaven!" the Hermit cried, 145
And clasp'd her to his breast:
The wondering fair one turn'd to chide,—
'Twas Edwin's self that press'd.

"Turn, Angelina, ever dear,
My charmer, turn to see 150
Thy own, thy long-lost Edwin here,
Restored to love and thee.

"Thus let me hold thee to my heart,
And every care resign;
And shall we never, never part, 155
My life—my all that's mine?

"No, never from this hour to part,
We'll live and love so true,
The sigh that rends thy constant heart
Shall break thy Edwin's too." 160

MANNERS MAKYTH MAN

(Letter LXXIV., from Letters to His Son, 1774)

Spa, 25th July, 1741.

Dear Boy—I have often told you in my former letters (and it is most certainly true) that the strictest and most scrupulous honour and virtue can alone make you esteemed and valued by mankind; that parts and learning can alone make you admired and celebrated by them; but that the possession of lesser talents was most absolutely necessary towards making you liked, beloved, and sought after in private life. Of these lesser talents good breeding is the principal and most necessary one, not only as it is very important in itself, <sup>1</sup> A well known wit, politician, orator, and "fine-gentleman," in the age of Pope and of Johnson. He was a typical product of early 18th century England, in which essential coarseness and materialism were too often covered with a superficial veneer of polish and refinement. His early repulse of Dr. Johnson, and belated offer of patronage occasioned Johnson's famous letter of rebuke, which is given on p. 385. His Letters, which were not written for publication but intended to serve as a practical guide to his son in conduct and manners, reflect with a terrible truthfulness the views and standards of their author.

but as it adds lustre to the more solid advantages both of the heart and mind. I have often touched upon good breeding to you before; so that this letter shall be upon the next necessary qualification to it, which is a genteel, easy manner, and carriage, wholly free from those odd tricks, ill habits, and awkwardnesses, which even many very worthy and sensible people have in their behaviour. However trifling a genteel manner may sound, it is of very great consequence towards pleasing in private life, especially the women; which, one time or other, you will think worth pleasing; and I have known many a man from his awkwardness, give people such a dislike of him at first, that all his merit could not get the better of it afterwards. Whereas a genteel manner prepossesses people in your favour, bends them towards you, and makes them wish to like you. Awkwardness can proceed from two causes; either from not having kept good company, or from not having attended to it. As for your keeping good company, I will take care of that; do you take care to observe their ways and manners, and to form your own upon them. Attention is absolutely necessary to this, as indeed it is for everything else; and a man without attention is not fit to live in the world. When an awkward fellow first comes into the room, it is highly probable, that his sword gets between his legs, and throws him down, or makes him stumble at least; when he has recovered this accident, he goes and places himself in the very place of the whole room where he should not; then he soon lets his hat fall down, and, in taking it up again, throws down his cane; in recovering his cane, his hat falls down a second time; so that he is a quarter of an hour before he is in order again. If he drinks tea or coffee, he certainly scalds his mouth, and lets either the cup or the saucer fall, and spills the tea or coffee in his breeches. At dinner, his awkwardness distinguishes itself particularly as he has more to do: there he holds his knife, fork, and spoon differently from other people; eats with his knife to the great danger of his mouth, picks his teeth with his fork, and puts his spoon which has been in his throat twenty times, into the dishes again. If he is to carve, he can never hit the joint; but, in his vain efforts to cut through the bone, scatters the sauce in everybody's face. He generally daubs himself with soup and grease, though his napkin is commonly stuck through a button-hole and tickles his chin. . . . All this, I own, is not in any degree criminal; but it is highly disagreeable and ridiculous in company, and ought most carefully to be avoided by whoever desires to please.

From this account of what you should not do, you may easily judge of what you should do; and a due attention to the manners of people of fashion, and who have seen the world, will make it habitual and familiar to you.
